[Text] Why do you want Begin, Peres or Rabin for the next prime minister? This question was posed to respondents during the current poll of the Israel Institute for Applied Social Research and the Hebrew University Communications Institute, conducted this month. This question was presented at the request of YEDI'OT AHARONOT. The following are the results in percentages:

Characteristics	Begin	Peres	Rabin
The best suitable man	21	22	17
Authority and leadership	19	17	11
Credibility, morality	14	1	29
Good judgment, intelligence	4	7	3
Experience, good functioning	17	16	13
Other qualities	13	11	14
Other reasons	12	26	13

It should be pointed out that the respondents were those who have already made a decision for their preferred candidate among Begin, Peres and Rabin. Those who had not expressed an opinion were not taken into account.

The poll also showed that without any connection to the preference for one candidate or another, the public thinks that authority and ability to perform are the major qualities a prime minister needs (46 percent). From among the respondents, 27 percent pointed to morality and integrity as major qualities, while 18 percent attached more importance to intelligence and wisdom.

As regards the percentage of preference for the different candidates, in October there has been no substantial deviation from the findings of the previous month.

BURG DISCUSSES AUTONOMY TALKS

Tel Aviv DAVAR in Hebrew 5 Sep 80 p 13

[Interview with Interior Minister Dr Yosef Burg: "After The Elections, A National Unity Government"]

[Text] It is difficult to interview Interior Minister Dr Yosef Burg. The most veteran of cabinet ministers in Israel, a statesman and politician of rich and varied experience, he knows how to answer. It is impossible to trap him or to get him to say something which he does not intend to say. He carefully chooses his words, he walks between the drops without getting wet. One can see that he is the man for his job. Burg is loyal to the government and the prime minister. If he has a criticism, one must read it between the lines. He says: "For years they did not recognize my character. They thought that I was drawn by MAPAI. But I was not drawn. I am Burg. and in every government in which I serve, I conduct myself in the same manner." Burg does not hide his desire to continue to be active in political life, to lead the NRP in the coming elections, and to serve on its behalf as a minister in the next government. Under present circumstances, there is no doubt that his desire will be realized.

[Question] Does the affair of the investigation of minister Aharom Abu-Khatsira affect the position of the NRP and internal relations within it?

[Answer] The matter of procedures of investigations within a governmental ministry is for the NRP. It has demanded an acceleration of the investigation so that there should not be a perversion of the law. It has spoken out against a smear campaign against religious judaism and parts of it, and it has expressed confidence that the correctness of the people involved in the investigation will come to light. Since we are united in our assessment of the situation, there are no differences of opinion which could disturb the internal peace of the NRP.

[Question] As the minister in charge of the police, have you already drawn some conclusions regarding the form of the investigation?

[Answer] The matter of procedures of investigations within a governmental ministry will be clarified in an appropriate forum. In the meantime we have issued strict orders against leaks. It is unthinkable that the media could make a decision without a trial.

[Question] How do you evaluate the results of Ambassador Linowitz's discussions in Israel?

[Answer] I can say that on our part, a real intellectual effort has been made so that the discussions can continue. On the day that this interview is published. Mr Linowitz will already have finished his discussions with the Egyptians, and everyone will know what the situation is.

[Question] At this point, do you see a serious prospect for progress in the talks, if the Egyptians agree to renew them?

[Answer] If I may distinguish between administrative and political questions, I can say that this year we have progressed on administrative questions in negotiations, but differences remain on the political questions. We must remember that this year was a "leap" year, and that since 8 May 1980, the talks were stopped four times by the Egyptians. There were also many personnel changes in the negotiating teams; in the U.S. Ambassador Strauss was replaced by Ambassador Linowitz. In Egypt, Prime Minister Khalil was released from his post. General Ali was appointed to take his place in the talks, and for our part, our foreign minister, defense minister, and minister of justice were replaced. But essentially, the difficult political questions have remained.

Personally, from the exchange of letters between Prime Minister Begin and President Sadat, as well as the exchange of letters between myself and General Ali, I felt that the Egyptians are raising three principal things, and they are: Jerusalem, settlements, and the general situation in Judea, Samaria, and Gaza. These issues appear and reappear from time to time, with different emphasis, and they are the true problem.

The U.S. is concerned that the momentum of the talks not be left to die, and Israel, in all honesty, has expressed its desire to continue the talks. Apparently, the Egyptians have preferred not to hold substantive talks until after the presidential elections in the U.S., and at the same time to demand concessions from Israel, in order to renew the talks that were halted by Egypt. At this time, it is difficult for me to decide what the guiding line of Egyptian policy is on this issue. It is possible that Khomeinism is influencing Egypt from the east, just as propoganda from Lybia came from the west. In any event, the theoretical gates have not been locked.

[Question] What has been the true effect of the Jerusalem legislation on the Egyptian position?

[Answer] It is possible that the Jerusalem legislation passed by the Knesset acted as a kind of catalyst. However, the positions were clear before, and the Egyptians have attempted to raise them from time to time during the autonomy talks.

[Question] And yet, wouldn't it have been worth delaying the Jerusalem legislation so as to prevent a slowdown in the process?

[Answer] The debates in the General Assembly and the Security Council justify the expression of unified national opinion in the matter of Jerusalem. On 6 June I wrote to Ambassador Sol Linowitz and suggested to him that the government would not intervene in the process of the Jerusalem legislation, either to accelerate or decelerate it. In addition, I reminded him of the resolution of the Egyptian National Assembly on 1 April, which spoke of "Arab Jerusalem." I also reminded him of that resolution on 2 July, and in another form I spoke of it to high ranking officials in the U.S. and said that they had no right to condemn Knesset for passing the Jerusalem law when for years, and especially in recent months, an organized campaign has been conducted against Jerusalem, together with verbal pogroms against the state of Israel.

[Question] In view of the harsh reaction to the Jerusalem law, isn't there room for halting the shift of the prime minister's office to East Jerusalem?

[Answer] Since Jerusalem is united, the office can be located anywhere....

[Question] When you accepted your position as negotiator on autonomy, did you ever imagine that our political position would reach such a low point?

[Answer] Our life is composed of processes which are both for the good as well as the bad, in various spheres. The autonomy talks did not cause the low point. But it may be that what you call the low point has affected the talks. The oil weapon and the money from oil were known from before. France has not changed its position for the better within the year. There was from before an European initiative, which crystallized further after the Venetian resolutions, and did nothing to calm the oil consuming nations--all of this has created a very difficult package. Our propoganda activity has to be reinforced in light of the many trips by people from the Egyptian government to African and European capitals. We should renew our struggle for understanding in all countries of the free world. This includes, especially, those countries whose ambassadors left Jerusalem, against the profound recognition of their peoples and the uniqueness of Jerusalem in the history of the world and the Jewish people.

[Question] With your permission, let us move to the area of domestic politics. After Prof Aron's refusal to serve as minister of defense, would you have any preference for filling the position?

[Answer] There are only two possibilities: either a quick solution or a slow one. Only time will tell how the prime minister deals with the problem.

[Question] Will the NRP pressure him?

[Answer] The NRP wants the maximum security for the country. This maximum requires a maximum of good administration of the defense ministry. More I cannot say for the present.

[Question] Minister Moda'i accused you of foiling his appointment as foreign minister for fear that the conduct of the autonomy talks would be taken from you?

[Answer] I am surprised at such talk. Several months ago Minister Moda'i, at his initiative, met with me and said to me that if I had any fears that his appointment as foreign minister would hurt my position as chairman of the Ministerial Committee on Autonomy, he wanted me to know that there was no basis for such a fear. I told him that I had no such fear, and that I was not born to be the minister of autonomy. Since then we have not discussed the issue.

[Question] If so, why then did you oppose his appointment?

[Answer] I, and most of the members of the party were of the opinion that government is not a matter of musical chairs, and that Mr Yitshaq Shamir was well suited to the foreign ministry and that it would be a shame to remove him.

[Question] The NRP supported the proposal to appoint Prof Arens as defense minister. Wasn't there a fear of a government in which the foreign minister, the finance minister, and the (intended) defense minister had opposed the peace treaty? Wouldn't this have seriously damaged the foreign image of the government?

[Answer] I do not like to publicly debate the opinions of colleagues. Your question is perhaps important, though not in the direction which you pointed, by the expressions and actions of Minister Yitshaq Shamir. To be a member of a government it is incumbent upon the minister not to betray his views, but also to take into account reality--be it political, economic, social, national, or international reality. It may be said that in general, a cabinet is united around an average line.

[Question] You have been quoted as one who predicts elections in the spring. Is that prophecy still in effect?

[Answer] In the first weeks of the winter session of the Knesset, the parliamentary picture will become clear. I assume that immediately after the by individuals whose party addresses for the tenth Knesset are not, for the moment known. The disintegration of several factions in the Knesset will no doubt leave its mark on this matter. It may be assumed that immediately after the beginning of the winter session, discussion will begin of several laws which belong to the election, such as increasing the cutoff percentage or a renewed determination of the various times in connection with the "decisive" day of the elections. In debates of this sort, two interesting things will be clarified: first, if there are common interests among the large factions (such as the Badar-Ofer Law), and secondly, at what pace the election will legislation be approached.

[Question] Is the interior ministry ready for the elections at any time?

[Answer] As minister of the interior, I can say that the central election committee exists and is operating. The voter rolls are maintained, polling stations are determined, and the technical aspect is all ready.

[Question] Why is it impossible to hold elections within a month of the dissolving of the Knesset, as is done in Britain and Western Europe?

[Answer] Technically, it is possible. But there are some factors which make such a procedure difficult: there is a law that a senior official or an army man who wants to be a candidate for the Knesset must resign his position 100 days in advance. Some Knesset members also want to update the voter rolls beyond the decisive day, which is the 15th of Av, and to include all those who will be 18 years old as of election day.

[Question] Do you see a renewal of the historic alliance between the NRP and the Labor party after the next elections?

[Answer] Together we wrote many pages of Zionism, realization, defense. We did not reject Jews, Zionists, when they were in the Herut movement, and there is certainly no basis for rejecting cooperation with the workers' camp. I was very sorry about the separation in December 1976, and the manner in which it occurred. The Israeli voter will determine the possibility of various coalition combinations. The NRP, which is a constructive party, sees no reason for rejecting what has been called a historic partnership. However, it may be that after the elections, the parliamentary picture will not be clear, or it may be that the political situation will be such that the establishment of a national unity government will be necessary.

WEIZMAN REJECTS CRITICISM OF HIS SUPPORT FOR CARTER

TA282115 Jerusalem Domestic Television Service in Hebrew 1900 GMT 28 Oct 80

[Interview with 'Ezer Weizman, former defense minister, by Dan Shilon, Israeli television correspondent in New York--videotaped--date not given]

[Excerpt] [Question] Mr Weizman, these days Air Force 1 is not only the plane of a president but that of a presidential candidate. Your joining that plane has been interpreted as interfering in the internal affairs of the United States and in the election campaign here. How do you explain this?

[Answer] It is true that Air Force 1 is the plane of a presidential candidate--incidentally, it is the plane of a president--Air Force 1 is also the plane of a friend, a friend of the State of Israel and a personal friend. Second, there is quite a bit of hypocrisy when people say that what I did was to interfere in the internal affairs of the State of Israel. [sentence as heard] A large part of our foreign and defense policies rely to a large extent on interference in the internal affairs of the United States.

[Answer] It seems to me that from time to time we--past, present and future foreign ministers and prime ministers--are trying to influence--pressure is a bad word--and also to pressure certain parts of the United States to attain, and justifiably so, achievements for the State of Israel.

[Question] However, they do this with republicans and democrats at the same time. They do not say--just as you said yesterday that were I to make my recommendations as an Israeli....

[Answer] That is true, and I reiterate what I said yesterday. I regard the peace process between Israel and Egypt as one of the most important, basic, historic and largest processes for the State of Israel. I know that there are those who do not think so, several of my friends in the party. Whoever contributed to this process--the prime minister, the Egyptian president and the U.S. President--is, as far as I am concerned, a person who contributed a great deal. It seems to me that the U.S. President's contribution to this process has been made light of to such an extent that, lately, when you ask people both in Israel and in the United States what wrong did Carter do to Israel, they--not everybody but some of them--will tell you: He imposed peace with Egypt on us. This is one of the most inaccurate things I have ever heard in my life.

When I came here I saw that Carter was being pushed on the issue of the Middle East as if he had done us some wrong. I spent time with him at Camp David with the prime minister and the former foreign minister and during the entire lengthy process of the last 2-1/2 years, I cannot pinpoint any wrong that he has done to us. I know there was a vote at the United Nations, a serious and difficult vote, and Carter admitted his fault.

Therefore, when a friend who has made such a fundamental contribution to an exceptional process--and in view of our relations with the United States, which are not regular relations--when such a friend asks me to fly with him aboard Air Force 1, I fly with him. Whenever any questions were posed to me I only replied on matters concerning the State of Israel and not about the unemployment situation in the United States or about the economic situation there or about the U.S. attitude toward SALT and so on.

[Question] Yet, you still aroused--or may have aroused--many of Reagan's supporters against you, and Reagan still stands a chance of being elected.

[Answer] Whatever I did was not intended to arouse Reagan's supporters against me. I did what I did out of appreciation for President Carter's actions and deeds and out of the feeling that, to a certain extent, people were incited against him, and his actions in this process, which I regard as a fundamental, important and historic process for the people of Israel, were made light of.

[Question] Would it not have been better to thank President Carter by means other than interfering in the election campaign in the United States?

[Answer] First, I do not think that I interfered. I admit, it is true, that my presence on the scene had some influence. The fact is that you are interviewing me, otherwise you would not have interviewed me. Had I come as a regular guest, as a Knesset member, to the United States, I think that you would not have interviewed me perhaps.

I still think that President Carter is a friend of the State of Israel. I think that he has made a vast contribution to the peace process. I think that Carter's value has been made light of. Incidentally, I am not the only one to have said so; the prime minister always lauds him. I do not know if it makes much difference whether this is done 6 months or 1 week before the election. I believe that if Reagan is elected president there will be several good Jews close to him and we will continue to interfere in the internal affairs of the United States in order to have a favorable influence upon the State of Israel.

COMMENTATOR FAVORABLY APPRAISES NAVON VISIT TO EGYPT

TA291634 Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 29 Oct 80 p 9

[Commentary by Yo'el Marcus: "Another Bit of History"]

[Text] As the years go by (yes, it has already been years) the Israeli pubic's heart has become somewhat hardened to the flood of enthusiastic descriptions of trips along the Cairo-Tel Aviv-Cairo axis. There is not a single superlative that has not been used to describe the "depth of emotion" at the sight of the Israeli flag flying in Cairo or the meeting with Egyptians in Israel and so on. It even seems that we can no longer be surprised by remarks expressing reservations that al-Sadat in fact "does not mean it" and everything he does--the official receptions, the mutual visits, playing "Hatiqwah" [Israeli national anthem] on Egyptian soil--all of this is nothing but scheming to cheat naive Israel, as in the well-known joke, in which the Israeli journalist reports to his reading public by referring to a list of standardized reports, since everything is known.

And yet....

When you see the honor official Egypt is giving President Navon, even the most "blase" Israeli can only pinch himself. It is true that we will not go as far as 'AL HAMISHMAR, which gave its editorial about the president's visit the title: "And Tears Come Again To Our Eyes." But we must admit that we are seeing history in the making. It cannot be disputed that Navon is receiving in Egypt everything that Begin dreamed of getting there and did not achieve on any of his five visits. Perhaps for this reason--spiteful people will say--television coverage of Navon's visit to Egypt was given less time than the report on the completion of the Hebrew encyclopedia. It makes no difference that the masses were not organized to come out along the trip's routes. It is impossible to complain if he is not being given the same honor given to Carter, for example. Organized transport of the masses from their places of employment and villages costs a great deal of money, and this is reserved for only President al-Sadat's special domestic needs.

I do not know if, with Navon's visit, we have broken the "human isolation" from which Israel has been suffering in addition to its political isolation, as it was put by one of the papers, but it is a fact that there is no country in the world that has ever given such honor to a president of Israel or any other Israeli leader as that being given to Navon by Arab Egypt. This is true despite the fact that, from al-Sadat's viewpoint, every single month there have been fewer and fewer reasons to give an Israeli the "red carpet" treatment, nor did anybody force him to invite Navon for such a provocative visit. Certain Arab leaders were obviously close to having a heart attack at what they saw on television precisely at this time.

Obviously al-Sadat had a whole series of political motives justifying the visit for him. After all, al-Sadat is a professional, it not an artist, in politics. He is very well aware of the political limitations of an Israeli president, and so he did not invite him for the purpose of political talks. It may be that the article in the weekly AL-SIYASAH about Navon's chances of being prime minister and his influence over the Israelis of eastern origin, who make up 60 percent of the Israeli population, exposes one of al-Sadat's motives. Throughout the years, especially during the war waged by the media, the Egyptians believed that it would be easier for them to find a common language with the Israelis of eastern origin, more than with the ruling Ashkenazi class. And I am convinced that Navon won over his listeners' with his colorful speech and his images that appeal to any oriental soul, more than the dozens of clever moralizing speeches Begin made on his official visits to Egypt. There is a double long-term political investment here by al-Sadat, not only against the ethnic background and a gamble on Navon's personal future, but also on the assumption that Navon--whose views are well known to him--will have a substantial personal influence on the alinement government.

[TA291707] All the signs indicate that al-Sadat has decided to take a deep breath and wait, not only until after the U.S. election, or until the new president gets into the swing of things during the first quarter of 1981, but also until the Israeli regime is changed. That is why his latest interlocutors have formed the impression that he is in no hurry at the moment. During this time-out period of almost a year, he is committed to take action in three fields:

--To show his aides and the Egyptian intellectuals, who have reservations about his moves, that he has not dropped the Palestinian issue;

--To show the United States that he has not retreated from the peace initiative, in order to deepen the relations that are being formed with it and upon which not only al-Sadat, but also the Egyptian people, are pinning many (economic) hopes; and

--To eliminate Israeli public suspicions and to prepare the ground for flexibility on the part of the next government. Through his invitation to Navon and the enthusiastic reception--and it certainly is an enthusiastic official reception--he wants to make the Israeli public understand that he has accepted the State of Israel and that his quarrel and criticism involve the militant Begin government alone. He is aware of the fact that only 4 months after a new government is established in Israel, it will be time for the second stage of the evacuation of the Sinai (March 1982), and of course he wants the public to be convinced that his peace is sincere and stands firm even under the stress of the misunderstandings.

It is clear that al-Sadat had, and still has, political intentions behind all his moves, but these are legitimate and do not detract from the value of facts and events being interwoven into a "bit of history." From visit to visit, from event to event, whether a trick or not, al-Sadat's deep involvement in the peace processes is more firmly entrenched and, in my opinion, there is no going back as long as he is alive and well. But while al-Sadat is thinking of the future, about "after Begin," pinning his hopes on Israel's next government, one can hardly say that Israel, for its part, is giving any thought at all to the period after al-Sadat. Israel could have secured Egypt's involvement in peace even more firmly, even after the al-Sadat era, by advancing the autonomy and striving for an agreement. Those people in Egypt today who are influential skeptics may be its leaders tomorrow.

But who in Israel lifts his eyes higher than the turgid swamp of mutual slander and the rest of the nonsense in which the heads of state are currently occupied?

'HA'ARETZ' COMMENTATOR ON KING HUSAYN'S ROLE, ACTIONS

TA141657 Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 14 Oct 80 p 11

[Commentary by Yo'el Marcus: "The Professional 'Survivor'"]

[Text] The Israeli Government has been performing a strange trick: First it blows the alarm and only later asks itself why it did so. As if Israelis' nerves were not sufficiently strained, the government's official spokesmen time and again speak about "the gravity of the situation" in the wake of the Iran-Iraq war and King Husayn's involvement in the war alongside Iraq. The prime minister has declared that King Husayn has not acted wisely. The transportation minister--who in his times of leisure, after dealing with roads and airports, serves as an amateur defense minister--has cautioned that Husayn is "playing with fire." Minister Sharon has already reached the conclusion that the "Jordanian option" is dead. The general scenario portrayed by the government is that Iraq will win an all-out victory over Iran and this newly-born giant together with Jordan will create an unprecedented danger on the eastern front.

In my opinion, such a scenario is exaggerated and unfounded. An "all-out" Iraqi victory is altogether impossible. At best, Iraq will hold onto the disputed strip of land until the Iranians redeploy their forces and launch a counterattack. Even if a cease-fire is achieved the border dispute will require both sides to maintain forces on their joint border, far from Israel--thank God.

Our experience in upheavals in this region should have made us realize that no conflict or alliance lasts in the Arab world. Not long ago we were concerned about the creation of a Syrian-Jordanian front. Israeli officials said Syrian-Jordanian preparations were under way to launch a joint military action. This view also did not prevail for long. In fact, the danger of the eastern front faded away dramatically in spite of the macabre prophesies. Therefore, we should not be overly excited now because of the new "romance" between Jordan and Iraq. Husayn is much wiser than what we think.

Intrigue and warmongering have never been King Husayn's most outstanding qualities. His outstanding feature is his ability to survive. Husayn has turned his personal survival into his exclusive profession and occupation. People analyzing his moves, decisions, alliances and seasonal disputes will find out that they all stem from this quality. It may be said that his successful survival is impressive--he has been sitting on the royal throne for 28 years. He has certainly not broken Dr Yosef Burg's record for state service. However, he has certainly broken the record of leaders in the Middle East and the entire world. There have been 11 unsuccessful attempts to assassinate him and cemeteries in the Middle East are full of people who said Husayn did not stand a chance of holding out.

In a kingdom lacking oil and natural resources, where a large section of the population is of Palestinian extraction and aspires to national independence, where 60 percent of the state budget comes from external sources, the king has successfully managed to keep his head above water. He has never been exceedingly involved in disputes or friendships. Because of our arrogance we tend to ridicule him for joining the wrong war in 1967 and staying out of the war where he could have won in 1973 and maneuvering himself out of the Camp David accord. All these descriptions are not accurate and it is a shame that we do believe them and make light of a possible future ally.

Husayn got carried into the Six-Day War by the Egyptian Army commander in the West Bank who ordered the opening of fire without consulting the Jordanian monarch. In 1973 the Egyptians and the Syrians did not tell him about the secret war plans and it was already too late to join the war when it emerged that Israel was in distress. He was not invited to Camp David not because he did not want to attend but because al-Sadat did not want him there. However, except for these "accidents"--which were not exactly slips on the part of Husayn--the king acts as a professional "juggler" simultaneously keeping several balls in the air.

He made exaggerated statements against Israel but was not [as published] the first Arab leader to hold direct talks with it. During his period of great tension with Syria in 1960 (the Syrians planted a time bomb that exploded during the cabinet session) he had a direct meeting with Israel and begged Israel not to use his distress in order to attack him. During his conflict with the Palestinians in 1970 he again asked Israel to consider his situation. Long before al-Sadat arrived in Jerusalem (Husayn initially welcomed this move and later withdrew his support when it emerged that al-Sadat did not intend to let him join it) he maintained a de facto and peaceful modus vivendi with Israel: cooperation by means of the open bridges, preventing terrorist actions from Jordanian territory and funneling many millions of dollars to the West Bank to pay salaries and provide budgets.

[TA141725] As a professional "survivor" Husayn changes alliances and loyalties in the Arab world at the same rate he changes his shirts, according to his needs. His changes are dictated, as already said, by his chances for surviving. When the Syrians sent two MIG's to attack his private plane and threatened to invade his country he did not hestiate to ask for U.S. aid and Israeli support. However, when he saw that Israel was also sharing its cake with Egypt he turned to Syria. When the United States did not give him "Hawk" missiles, Husayn did not hesitate in going to Moscow and creating the impression that he was on the brink of changing allegiances. Yet, he did not purchase a SAM missile system as he had pledged to do. He is a very capable acrobat but he is not a clown. He is for the PLO but on the condition that they do not live within his boundaries. He is for a Palestinian State as long as such a state does not exist. As long as he keeps out of practical negotiations he does not lower what he demands from the PLO and al-Sadat. He speaks about peace but flirts with the rejectionist states, maybe because he has not yet made up his mind about what will better serve his survival--either retrieving the West Bank or leaving the situation unchanged.

Husayn is referred to as a man playing with fire. The U.S. State Department is of the opinion that he is undergoing a difficult psychological problem stemming from his involvement in a maze with no logical way out. Respected journalists who met him are surprised to learn that Husayn aspires to become the leader of the Arab world. The truth is that Husayn takes an interest only in himself. Therefore, he is very cautious. He never goes to the very end and he is very good on turning his back on alliances. However, there is a certain method in his actions: He wants to keep his pro-Western link without severing his ties with the Arab "mainstream" which is currently led by the rejectionist states. He has held close relations with Saudi Arabia, then with Egypt, later with Syria and Iraq. The latter relationship was initiated by Iraq, both against Syria and in order to guarantee a "land lift" (in the wake of the possible blockade of Basra) in the wake of the military operation it recently planned. In exchange, Jordan enjoys Iraqi financial aid. In his own way, Husayn believes that he is not entirely acting against U.S. interests by maintaining his relations with Iraq, and it is not at all certain that he is mistaken.

The assumption that these relations will develop into a new front against Israel is not likely. Trust Husayn, it will not even occur to him to open the gates of his country to Iraqi Army troops. By the same token, I would not rush to dismiss the "Jordanian option." A leader whose main occupation is to survive has all the alternatives open before him. This is the secret of Husayn's strength.

OPPOSITION TO ANNEXATION OF GOLAN HEIGHTS SCORED

Yadin Calls for Governmental Stand

TA230630 Jerusalem Domestic Service in English 0500 GMT 23 Oct 80

[Text] Deputy Prime Minister Yiga'el Yadin wants the government to take a stand against a parliamentary bill to annex the Golan Heights. Yadin told ISRAEL RADIO that the executive of his Democratic Party will meet today and is expected to adopt its own decision opposing such a bill. Yadin says it is inconceivable that the Knesset would pass a bill which would close the option of negotiation with Syria and make it impossible, should the time come, for a withdrawal of even 200 metres on the Golan Heights.

The American ambassador in Israel, Samuel Lewis, has expressed to Prime Minister Begin his government's concern over the intention of passing a law to annex the Golan Heights. The American concern was expressed at a meeting between the prime minister and the ambassador. Lewis was told by Washington to clarify to Israel that the U.S. views the proposed Golan law with grave concern. The American Government believes the proposed law is far more serious than the Jerusalem law; this because Jerusalem was in actual fact united in 1967, while in the case of the Golan its sovereignty is clearly recognized and therefore such a law would be in direct conflict with UN Resolution 242.

Our reporter has learned that the prime minister clarified to the ambassador that the Israeli Government has not intervened in parliamentary process in the Knesset. Official circles told our reporter that they did not believe the proposed law would be brought before the Knesset. They said the prime minister and the cabinet would find a way to convince the Knesset members to express their position and their support for the Golan in a way other than a law.

Mapam Party Voices Disapproval

TA291307 Tel Aviv 'AL HAMISHMAR in Hebrew 29 Oct 80 p 1

[Report: "Mapam Will Regard Support for the Annexation of the Golan as a Violation of the Alinement Platform"]

[Text] During clarifications made yesterday by the Mapam Knesset faction, with the participation of the three party secretaries, it was decided to demand that the Labor Party adhere to the alinement platform which supports territorial compromise with each of the neighboring countries. Any legislative initiative--to which members of the Labor Party are partners--changing the political situation in the Golan Heights will be regarded as a breach of the alinement platform.

Mapam demands that urgent clarifications be made on this issue in the supreme institutions common to the two alinement parties.

In order to avoid a situation in which we would be faced with parliamentary faits accompli in the Knesset, the Mapam faction decided to demand that the clarifications be made within the next few days.

The announcement issued yesterday by Mapam regarding the opposition to the annexation of the Golan Heights says that "in order to contain any legislative initiative for the annexation of the Golan Heights--something that contradicts the political interests of the State of Israel and of the Golan Heights settlements--Mapam put forward an urgent motion for the Knesset agenda. The Knesset executive did not approve that motion.

"During the alinement Knesset faction executive's clarifications, the Labor Party demanded that no normal motion for the agenda be submitted on this issue until the end of the clarifications in the Labor Party's institutions. A normal motion, as is well known, requires the approval of all the alinement factions."

IMPROVEMENT OF ARAB-JEWISH RELATIONS SOUGHT

Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew 7 Sep 80 p 5

[Article by Aluf Hareven: "Israeli Arabs as a Jewish Problem"]

[Text] One in every six Israeli citizens is an Arab; that means he belongs to a non-Jewish minority in a Jewish state, which in its declaration of independence declared the principle of equality of rights for every citizen. By the year 2000, there will be more than one million Arab citizens of Israel. Even today, with their number at 600,000 about 70 percent have been born after the establishment of the state, meaning that those Arabs are Israeli citizens by birth. The question regarding the mutual relations between Jews and Arabs should thus be one of the critical questions for the second generation of the country.

In relations between the majority and the minority, who is it that determines the forms of relations? Certainly these relations are determined in the manner of reciprocal relations, of interaction; but we can assume that the majority, since it is the decisive factor in the country, has more power than the minority to shape the forms of this relationship, since the minority does not have the power to determine. Therefore, it is important that the Jewish majority try to focus on the components of its attitude toward the non-Jewish minority; only when we are informed of these factors will we be able to be clear regarding ourselves, as to whether we are satisfied with the situation or whether there is room for change.

In a survey commissioned by the Van Leer Institute on the attitude of the Jewish majority towards the non-Jewish minority, and which was directed by Mina Tsemakh, the following discoveries are prominent:

The Jewish majority in Israel is not unambiguous in its attitude toward Israeli Arabs. There are three principal groups: a minority of Jews whose attitude toward Israeli Arabs is essentially negative; a minority of Jews whose attitude is essentially positive; and between them a group comprising the majority of Jews in Israel, whose attitude toward Israeli Arabs is not clear cut (not stereotypical, but a mixture of both positive and negative positions.)

The group which attributes only negative qualities to the Arabs comprises about 14 percent of the respondents. Most prominent in this group are those Jews who come from Arab countries, age 18 to 22 years, who vote for Likud and the NRP (although of course not all belonging to these categories are so negative in their attitudes toward Israeli Arabs). This group is a minority; in contrast, 84 percent of the Jewish community hold positive or mixed attitudes toward Israeli Arabs.

The group which attributes only positive qualities to the Arabs comprises 13 percent of the respondents. This group, too, is a minority, and prominent in it are those people who come from western countries, or the children of westerners, having a high level of education, and living in cities where there is an Arab population.

The largest group, which comprises 70 percent of Israeli Jews, is that which has mixed attitudes, i.e. they attribute to Israeli Arabs positive qualities (e.g. industry, devotion to family) and negative qualities (e.g. violence).

The compositness of positions of the Jewish public is testified to by several divisions, such as:

The "dirty"Arab--36 percent; "clean" or "neither clean nor dirty"--64 percent. The Arab is "devoted to his family"--69 percent; "not devoted"--8 percent (the remainder is between the poles). Human life is important to them--42 percent; is not important--33 percent. Most Israeli Arabs engage in espionage--15 percent; only an isolated few engage in espionage--60 percent. Most Israeli Arabs are happy when the country suffers harm--53 percent; other opinions--47 percent. Most Israeli Arabs are torn between loyalty to the country and loyalty to their people--45 percent; other opinions--55 percent.

The whole survey exposes internal tensions in the positions of the Jewish public. So for example the tension between the principled position of 90 percent of those interviewed regarding the necessity of displaying tolerance to minority groups, whichever they are, and the readiness of only 40 percent to apply full equality of rights to the Israeli Arab minority, while the principal claim of those opposed to the application of full equality of rights is based on considerations of security.

In contrast to these tensions, one of the most encouraging discoveries was the readiness for social contacts with Israeli Arabs. About 40 percent are ready to live in the same building with Arabs; more than half of the respondents are ready for social contacts with Arabs in the cities in which they live; about 60 percent are ready to work on the same job. This date testifies to the fact that a substantial segment of the Jewish public is not racist in its attitude toward Israeli Arabs; it does not reserve itself from such contacts with them, in that manner that whites relate to blacks in South Africa. On the contrary, the high degree of readiness for close social contact shows the potential for excellent relations which has not been realized. This rate is important because of studies made of Israeli Arabs which also show a high rate of interest in social contacts with Jews, although the rate of credibility regarding Jewish readiness for such relations is low among Arabs.

The practical conclusions which stem from this study are in three areas; first and foremost, the impression that most Israeli Jews have a negative attitude toward Israeli Arabs is false. The rate of Jews in Israel whose attitude toward Arab citizens of the country is purely racist is only 15 percent, which is about 3 out of every 20 Jews. All those to whom Israel is dear as both a Jewish state which is concerned for the rights of its minorities, as well as a democratic country whose citizens enjoy equal rights will be concerned to define himself outside of that group, as well as to isolate it.

Secondly, there are in the positions of the Jewish majority of Israel bases which are positive, and upon which can be built with the goal of limiting negative attitudes, and of improving the general attitude toward Arab citizens of Israel. This activity is especially important in the area of education. As of today, there is no component in the education of Jewish students which teaches them how to relate to one sixth of the citizens of Israel who are not Jewish. It is possible that the absence of such a program is one of the factors in the fact that particularly among Jewish youth there is a high rate of negative attitude toward Israeli Arabs, as compared to many adult groups.

Thirdly, there is enough data in this survey to strengthen the hope of developing in Israel relations between the majority and minority based on the mutual respect of civil rights, even when there is a difference of opinion as to the way to solve political problems. But such a development will not occur by itself, and the resolution to move to it must first be a resolution of the Jewish majority, for the image of the Arab minority which we see is to a great extent a reflection of the image which we project of ourselves to them. To the extent, that we hold a negative view of them (as "dirty" or "spies") so we will strengthen their negative view of us; and to the extent that we strengthen positive bases which already exist among part of the Jewish majority, we will be able to strengthen the Israeli Arabs' view of themselves as citizens of the country.

This is certainly no easy task, and the difficulties in settling the Israeli-Arab dispute will not make it any easier. But if we do not, as soon as possible, turn to the task of clarifying our attitudes toward the non-Jewish minority, then even if we do settle the external Arab-Israeli dispute, we will still have an internal dispute which will be both painful and debilitating. There is within the Jewish majority a sufficient basis for the growth of positive attitudes between us and the Arab minority. What is lacking in the meantime is a policy which is ready to face up to the problem. It is lacking in the present government and was lacking in its predecessors, and is still lacking in the opposition which will someday replace the present government.

'HIGH-RANKING' OFFICIAL INTERVIEWED ON FRG MIDEAST POLICY

LD282158 Hamburg DPA in German 1749 GMT 28 Oct 80

[Report on interview with unidentified Israeli official by DPA on 28 Oct 80, place not given]

[Text] Jerusalem, 28 Oct (DPA)--It is the official view in Jerusalem that the Federal Government, like other West European countries, allows itself to be "blackmailed" by the Arab oil states and disregards the sympathies felt by Germans for Israel. This view was expressed in a DPA conversation today by a high-ranking Israel Government official who did not want his name published.

He criticized the Mideast policy of the European community, and specifically the Federal Republic. He said: "Even leaving aside motives and only looking at results, I am bound to say that Germany has so far not achieved anything positive in this respect. The West Europeans as a whole have failed to make the Arabs understand that they must sit round the table with Israel if they really want peace."

The Federal Government, he added, "understandably" will not admit that, for the sake of its energy supplies, it is looking to the Arabs and is therefore open to blackmail. With this policy Bonn disregards the fact that the Germans sympathize with Israel for three reasons: "First, the Germans know that Israel is a democratic state. Second, they feel that Israel is having to pay for the mistakes of western politicians and is being thrown to the dogs for the sake of good relations with the Arabs. Third, the Germans well remember that the Jews had to pay the highest price in World War II."

Bonn, 28 Oct (DPA)--In Bonn's view, the Israel statement ignores the facts. A Bonn foreign office spokesman said today that the federal government is not taking sides and is not pursuing a policy at the expense of Israel. Nor are its efforts to secure peace in the Middle East motivated by its energy supply interests.

The spokesman said that the federal government supported the decisions taken by the EC summit meeting in Venice for the very reason that it wants to support the peace process.

Bonn is making every effort in bilateral contacts to get the major groups, that in Israel, Egypt and the Arab League, to move closer. The federal government's efforts to achieve a comprehensive peace in the Middle East are in the interests of Israel. The spokesman referred in this connection to the visit which Israeli Foreign Minister Shamir is due to pay to Bonn this year.

'DIVERGENCES' BETWEEN DANISH-ISRAELI GOVERNMENTS REVEALED

LD290929 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 23 Oct 80 part 1 p 5

[Dispatch by Mogens Kofod-Hansen: "Kjeld Olesen Did Not Convince Begin"]

[Text] Jerusalem--Israel's concern over the EEC's position on the Middle East, especially on the Palestine problem, was a major topic at the meeting yesterday between Prime Minister Menachem Begin and Foreign Minister Kjeld Olesen. Begin found that the nine are motivated by oil and other short-term economic interests in the Arab countries to adopt a position which hurts Israel and favors Yasir 'Arafat's PLO.

Kjeld Olesen replied that the so-called Middle East initiative from the EEC Venice summit in June is not directed against Israel, is not intended to be an alternative to the Camp David peace process between Israel, Egypt and the United States and does not go further in support of the PLO than earlier EEC statements. He said that in his opinion it is only a catalyst, a sounding and an analysis, which is intended to make a contribution to the continuation of the peace process.

Begin did not let himself be convinced. On the contrary he stressed that the EEC by accepting the PLO as the negotiator for the Palestinians and by talking of Palestinian self-determination has gone further than before and much further than the Camp David agreements, which do not mention the PLO and only speak of self-government, which is less than self-determination. The Prime Minister has said several times in recent weeks that this European position has contributed to anti-Israeli feeling which could have been a factor in the creation of new anti-Semitic trends in Europe.

The question has occupied Israelis a lot in recent weeks. Both official circles and the general public have listened with great attention to what Kjeld Olesen has had to say, for he is the first EEC foreign minister to visit the country since the controversial statement from the Venice summit. There is great satisfaction that several times during the visit, among other things in connection with the resumption of the Euro-Arab dialogue, he has said, "Our feelings toward Israel are unchanged."

But the majority of Israelis are afraid that the moderate Danish interpretation of the EEC initiative is not representative of what all the nine and especially the larger and stronger members of the community really intend. Many Israelis are also afraid of the contents of the new Middle East declaration that will come from the next EEC summit in December, when the results of Council of Ministers Chairman Gaston Thorn's soundings in the Middle East have been analyzed.

After the meeting with Begin and after talks later in the day with the Israeli Labor Party leader, Kjeld Olesen has now wound up 2 days of intensive political discussions on the situation in the Middle East and relations between Israel and the Arabs. Without this in any way affecting the close friendship between Denmark and the Jewish state, the conclusion is that as expected there are certain divergences between the parties' views, not only between the governments but also over a smaller statement [as published] between Kjeld Olesen and his friends from the Israeli Labor Party.

Apart from the disagreement on the Jerusalem law and the heralded law on the Golan Heights it has been said that there are differing views on the PLO. It has given rise to Israeli satisfaction that Kjeld Olesen has said that Denmark cannot recognize the PLO, partly because only states are recognized, partly because of the PLO's insistence that Israel must be destroyed. But none of the Israeli parties think that the PLO should be included in the negotiations as the representatives of the Palestinians. Neither of them has answered Kjeld Olesen's question: "Who is then going to represent the Palestinians?"

Labor Party Chairman Shimon Peres told his Danish guest yesterday that when his party forms a government again--this is expected to be next year--it would go in for a territorial compromiser, that is to say the clearing of a large part of the West Bank and Gaza with a drawing of borders only dependent on security considerations. It would not agree to the surrendering of East Jerusalem, the return of the Golan Heights to the Syrian military, or the establishment of a Palestinian state there, which would inevitably fall under the control of the PLO.

"There is already one Palestinian state in Jordan. This must be enough. The solution will therefore have to be found with Jordan, when negotiations take place," Peres said. These ideas will be included in a newly formulated party program to be approved in December as the foundation for the Labor Party campaign for the next election in Israel in 1981. An important point in this program is that the Labor Party does not want a Jewish state with a large number of Arabs as its citizens, who may form a majority at some point in the future. For this reason the Labor Party is ready to surrender a large part of the occupied areas.

After the political problems the official visit's brighter sides follow today: A striking public manifestation of Danish-Israeli friendship. This will take place after a visit to the Denmark school in Jerusalem with the dedication of a new forest, planted in Queen Margrethe's name with funds collected by Danes and Israelis and this evening with a large thanksgiving party in memory of the saving of Danish Jews in October 1943. It will take place symbolically in the Beth Ha'am House (the house of the people) in Jerusalem. Anti-Semitism's German overseer Adolf Eichmann received his death sentence there in 1961. Those who cheated the Hitler reich of a few thousand of its intended victims will be celebrated there tonight.

BRIEFS

CEMENT DISPUTE--The construction of the airbases in the Negev will not be adversely affected by the sanctions in the cement industry now that the Nesher Company has worked out a special arrangement on this matter. Our military correspondent Shmu'el Tal learned this from the cement factory management. A U.S. engineer corps source said that thus there would be no need to import cement to Israel. A few days ago it was feared that the sanctions would adversely affect the construction of the airbases and even bring it to a halt. NEW SETTLEMENT PROBLEMS--The Gush Enunim Settlement Movement is not succeeding in enlisting a nucleus of settlers for the new settlement of Mikhmash, near Ma'ale Adummim, the establishment of which has been recently authorized. This was learned by our correspondent Avraham Ben-Melekh. Our correspondent notes that several new settlements in Judaea are now encountering manpower shortage problems. New settlers prefer to join the established settlements. Nevertheless, a nucleus of the Ihud Haqla'i Movement will be set up next week in Vered Yeriho, south of Jericho. KNESSET 'CONCERN' OVER AUTONOMY DOCUMENT--Today Prime Minister Begin presented the latest Israeli document submitted to the United States on the autonomy issue to the Knesset Foreign Affairs and Security Committee. Our Knesset correspondent Arye Golan reports that Moshe Arens, Yosef Rom, Mikha'el Deqel and Hayim Druckman expressed concern at the clause in the Israeli document pledging that the Autonomy Administrative Council will participate in decision-making on matters of land and water in the territories. According to these Knesset members this clause jeopardizes the Israeli settlement in Judaea and Samaria. The prime minister said that the Israeli document does not contain any concessions. On a different issue Prime Minister Begin said that President Navon's visit to Egypt is a success story and makes a great contribution to the strengthening of relations between the two states. IMMIGRATION DATA--A drastic decline in the number of immigrants arriving in Israel in 1980 compared with their number in 1979 emerges from the latest immigration report compiled by the Jewish agency Aliyah and Absorption Department. A rise of 17 percent was only registered in the number of immigrants arriving from Romania. From January to September 1980 there was a decline of 48 percent in the number of immigrants from the Soviet Union, 64 percent in the number of immigrants from South Africa and 26 percent in the number of immigrants from Argentina. Immigration from France declined by 16 percent and from the United States by 25 percent compared to 1979. [TA250643 Tel Aviv DAVAR in Hebrew 25 Oct 80 p 3 TA]

MECCA PILGRIMAGE--This year 4,700 Muslims from Israel made the pilgrimage to Mecca. Our correspondent Arye Gus comments that 10 of the pilgrims from Israel and the territories died while on their way and several of them were buried in the holy city. EXTERNAL DEBTS--In the first half of 1980, a $1.76 billion deficit was recorded in Israel's goods and services account, similar to the deficit in the parallel period last year, though 16 percent less than in the second half of 1979. In the first half of 1980, Israel imported goods and services worth $6.6 billion, an increase of 2 percent over the second half of 1979. Direct defense imports in the first half of the year totalled $632 million, or 7 percent more than the parallel period last year. In the first 6 months of 1980, exports of goods and services totalled $2.86 billion, an increase of 29 percent as compared with the parallel period last year. The country's external debts (not including stocks and debentures held by foreigners) stood at $20.1 billion at the end of June 1980. [TA270945 Tel Aviv DAVAR in Hebrew 27 Oct 80 p 3 TA]

NEW SETTLEMENT IN GOLAN--The World Zionist Organization has begun building a new settlement on the Central Golan Heights near the village Juwayzah. Several bulldozers are about to complete clearing the ground, eyewitnesses said. Four other settlements will be established along the border between the West Bank and pre-1967 Israel, but a Jewish agency source said they will be located on the western side of the green line. The settlement near Juwayzah is one of three new settlements the government decided a year ago to establish on the Golan Heights. Work on the second, near (Yaqusa), in the southern sector of the Golan is still under way. However, construction of the third, near Qawlah has been postponed until the government decides on the kind of settlement it will be. [Text] [TA300938 Jerusalem POST in English 30 Oct 80 p 2]

PLO INVITES POPE TO VISIT COUNTRY

London 8 DAYS in English 4 Oct 80 p 28

[Text] POPE John Paul II has been invited to visit Palestinian refugee camps in Lebanon and to 'take the lead in a worldwide movement to help the Palestinians return to their homeland'. The invitation, from PLO leader Yasser Arafat, was contained in a confidential message delivered to the Vatican on 17 September by Hafif Safyeh, Arafat's personal envoy.

The message, which was revealed exclusively to 8 Days by diplomatic sources in Rome, was reportedly given considerable consideration by the Pope, who is said to have told Safyeh that 'Palestine, the Palestinians and Jerusalem are at the centre of all our preoccupations'.

Safyeh's Rome visit highlights the increasing interest being taken by the Vatican in the Middle East conflict. King Hussein of Jordan visited the Pope in early September and he was followed by Egyptian Vice President Hosni Mubarak. The Egyptian secured from the Pope a clear commitment to the defence of Jerusalem's 'multinational status' and of the Palestinians' 'legitimate national rights'. Mubarak is thought to have sought the Vatican's backing for Camp David.

When Pope John Paul II came to office, there were Israeli hopes of a change in the Vatican's 'understanding' of the Arab and Palestinian situation, which was first declared by Pope Paul VI. Such hopes increased with the initial acceptance by the Vatican of Menachem Begin's invitation to the Pope to visit Israel. On 30 June however, the Vatican issued a statement to all UN members, strongly warning against any unilateral change in the status of Jerusalem. The subsequent 'annexation' of the city angered the Vatican — and nothing more has been heard of the proposed trip to Israel.

BEIRUT'S HOTEL SITUATION EXAMINED

London 8 DAYS in English 4 Oct 80 pp 19-20

[Article by Earleen Tatro]

[Text]

THE MANAGER of Beirut's Cadmos Hotel was exuberant as he bounded across the deserted rooftop solarium. 'Look, look — what a nice view,' he cried, pointing to the sparkling blue waters of the Mediterranean. 'In the old days we used to have 50 tourists up here sunning themselves.'

He marched to the other side of the roof, and his mood changed as he pointed to the smoke-blackened skeletons of the luxury hotels which formed the heart of Beirut's Gold Coast in pre-war days. Of the dozen or more big hotels which did a thriving business in the area, only the Cadmos is still open. Structurally intact, with only a few bullet holes here and there, it stands near the western edge of the no-man's land which divides predominantly Christian East Beirut from predominantly Muslim West Beirut.

In the old days, before the 1975-76 civil war, the 120-room Cadmos was booked all year round by sun-seeking Europeans and wealthy Arabs. Today it rents rooms for $6.50 a day to the girls who work in the all-night bars on nearby Phoenicia Street.

Despite the civil war, despite the continuing violence which can still erupt in street battles anywhere, any time, despite the low volume of business, many Beirut hotels stay open. Hotel operators say they have little choice. If they close their doors, squatters will move in or mortgages will be foreclosed or leases terminated and million-dollar investments lost. Some say, with stubborn pride, that it's a point of honour to keep their premises open, and, besides, they have money-making hotels in other countries or real estate in Lebanon or some other form of income.

The National Tourism council says that of the 100 three-and four-star hotels in Beirut before the war, 62 are still open.

The average occupancy rate for the first five months of 1980 was 25.3 per cent, according to the council. Hotel executives say an occupancy rate of 55 per cent is needed to break even in the Middle East. In 1974 the average occupancy rate for Beirut hotels was 69.3 per cent. The January to May period this year showed an increase of 4.2 per cent over the same period last year, and 2.5 per cent above the monthly average for all of 1979.

With fewer clients, now mostly businessmen making short trips to the country, the hotels are trying other ways of making money. 'We push our beach operation,' said Nizr Alouf, manager of the Riviera Hotel, which sells six-month memberships for its private beach at $220. This season the operation has grossed about $110,000. The occupancy rate at the Riviera, where a double room costs $59, is about 15-18 per cent. 'It's lousy — that's the least I can say,' said Alouf, whose family owns the Riviera, a small hotel in Baalbeck which catered to tourists in the days when Lebanon had them, and the New Omayyad Hotel in Damascus.

The 125-room Riviera, located in a relatively calm section of West Beirut, is now 'on the edge of breaking even, for the first time since the war' Alouf said.

The Hotel St Georges the most opulent hotel in pre-war days, sits next to the so-called green line which divides East and West Beirut. Today the St Georges is a study in surrealism: waiters in red jackets carry icy drinks to deeply tanned, bikinied Lebanese ladies lounging around a swimming pool overlooking a yacht basin full of pleasure boats. Looming above this idyllic scene is the hotel itself — a charred hulk of stone with boarded-up windows and no prospects of reopening.

The 140-room Beirut Commodore, in West Beirut's Hamra business district, is one of the success stories by current standards. It has an occupancy rate of 60-65 per cent, mostly businessmen who stay two or three nights. Before the war the Commodore boasted an occupancy rate of 100 per cent.

The Summerland Hotel promotes its restaurants and occasional outdoor musical extravaganzas featuring such entertainers as the American singer Gloria Gaynor. And the Bristol hosts a big reception or wedding party nearly every week. Although Beirut residents tend to stay home more at night than they did before the war, some hotels are luring them to cocktail lounges with nightly entertainment.

'I hired a very loud musician for very loud people — because the people in this town like loud things,' one hotel owner said. The Cadmos started offering monthly rates this year and instituted a variety of bargain prices. 'Our normal price is £150 ($360) but very seldom is there anyone in the hotel paying that,' manager Adel Rubeiz said.

For less than $9 a night, Middle East Airlines can rent a room at the Cadmos for transit passengers. Most transit passengers stay at the Beau Rivage and International hotels in the less desolate section further west, but those who come in on flights from poorer nations such as Sudan may end up at the Cadmos.

COUNTRY'S PORT ACTIVITIES REVIEWED

Beirut THE ARAB WORLD WEEKLY in English 4 Oct 80 pp 14-16

[Text] During the seventies, port activities on the Mediterranean and Gulf shores increased substantially as ports and ship fleets expanded to serve the growing demands of the import-export trade between the Middle East and the rest of the world.

During the first half of the decade, Lebanon, thanks to its port of Beirut, became the leading center of port activities in the area. Its geographical location, its facilities and numerous technical advantages attracted an important part of the export-import trade.

The Beirut Port

The port of Beirut is comprised of 3 fully operational berths, one still under construction, 11 piers, 53 open air storage surface of 192,800 square meters, and 30 covered warehouses of 170,000 sq.m., in addition to a number of administrative and maintenance buildings. Its history as a naval trade center is more than a century old and has always derived its importance from its location between the ports of southeast Europe and the Arab countries.

The port is 110 kms away from Damascus, 300kms from Amman, 1,000 kms from Baghdad, 1,800 kms from Kuwait and Saudi Arabia and 2,000 kms from Tehran. Moreover, it is linked to Syria, Turkey and Iraq by more than 7,900 kms of railroads.

Between 1970 and 1975, the number of international ports which dealt with the Port of Beirut increased from 145 to 293. In 1970, 3,128 ships unloaded 2,290,000 tons of merchandise in 1970 and this figure rose to 3,612 ships and 3,412,000 tons of merchandise in 1974. An average of 28 per cent of the total merchandise passed in transit towards Iraq (56% of the transit merchandise in 1975), Saudi Arabia (22%), Jordan (6%), Iran (5%), Kuwait (5%) and Syria (4%).

The Lebanese civil war of 1975-1976 slashed down its fast growing activities. In 1975, only 2,859 ships came to Beirut to unload 2,434,000 tons of merchandise, 753 ships and 978,000 tons less than in 1974.

In 1976, the port was completely paralyzed and this shifted the activities to the Syrian and Gulf ports. The average 28 per cent of merchandise which transited through Lebanon in 1974 dropped to a mere 11 per cent after the war.

The port of Beirut became operational again at the end of the 1975-1976 war. However, its role as the major port of the region was affected by recurrent incidents in the country and the expansion of the Syrian and Gulf ports. Its best year since the war has been 1977, when the country enjoyed relative security; 2,782 ships unloaded 2,047,000 tons of merchandise. But in the following year when new troubles erupted, these figures decreased to 1,786 ships and 1,664,000 tons of goods. The figures climbed back again in 1979 to 2,253 ships and 2,374,000 tons.

Figures and statistics concerning transit trade show that a substantial part of activities has moved to other ports. At present, the port of Beirut mainly serves the needs of Lebanon.

(These figures do not take into account the activities of the fifth berth of the port which is completely under the control of the Phalangist Party. More and more merchandise is being unloaded at this berth because of lower duties and no customs. Ed)

The Port of Tripoli

The port of the second main city of the country is comprised of a 20,000 sq.m.-large and 8 meter-deep basin, 6 piers, 65,000 sq.m. of warehouses and 78,000 sq.m. of open air storage surface. It was established in 1958 and during the 1975-76 events tried to replace, within its capacities, the port of Beirut.

In 1975, 849,000 tons were loaded and unloaded at this port, compared to 95,000 tons in 1959. But in 1976, operations dropped to 50,000 tons.

A plan was drawn up in 1974 by a British firm, for the expansion of the port of Tripoli. The plan provided for building a new basin 11m.-deep and 9,000 sq.m.-large, deepening the first basin by 3 meters and building new piers and storage surfaces (about 350,000 sq.m). The implementation of this project still awaits the settlement of the Lebanese crisis.

The Ports of Jounieh and Saida

The ports of Jounieh and Saida were considered as secondary compared to those of Tripoli and Beirut. Before the war, their activities were limited to tourist and fishing purposes. The war boosted their activities and small and middle-size ships were able to load and unload merchandise there.

In 1976, 1,622 ships anchored at the port of Jounieh and 170 in Saida. In 1977, these figures dropped respectively to 450 and 80. They increased again in 1978 to 500 and 252 and dropped again in 1979 to 480 and 105. No expansion projects are planned for these ports yet.

Illegal Port Activities

The war and its consequences in Lebanon have led to the establishment of more than 18 illegal "ports" in Lebanon, all along the coast from Tripoli to Tyre.

In addition to their activities, frauds were also committed in a number of institutions dealing with the ports, resulting in a sharp decrease in the State's income from port activities.

In a report on the situation, the Paris-based weekly magazine AL NAHAR ARAB & INTERNATIONAL said that illegal activities and frauds were carried out in three different manners:

1) Bribery of officials to avoid paying customs on imported goods. The magazine quoted the director general of the Customs Department as saying that the situation was "scandalous" and could, if it continued, lead to "the bankruptcy of the Treasury."

2) Importing merchandise into the port as if it were in transit and then smuggle it into Lebanon by transporting it aboard another ship to a neighbouring illegal harbour.

3) The small illegal ports which charge no customs and reduced service duties.

The Lebanese Commercial Fleet

The magazine went on to say that the Lebanese commercial fleet is comprised of 5,430 ships which carry 12.1 per cent of the merchandise that reaches Beirut or transits by Beirut. The report did not say, however, whether all these ships are Lebanese or registered in Lebanon.

The report said that the commercial fleet was organized in the years 1968 and 1969 when a group of 7 shipowners formed an association the goal of which was to improve and develop the Lebanese commercial fleet. It was an independent, private initiative which sought to compensate for the absence of any state policy. The association kept growing and includes 95 shipowners with a total of 219 ships.

In conclusion, the report said that the State should speed up the development and expansion of its ports, especially the 4th and 5th berths of the Beirut port. It is also suggested that in order to avoid the congestion from which the Beirut port suffered in the years preceding the war, the other ports of the country be developed and the illegal ports placed under the control of the state with the purpose of having each harbour specialize in handling specific types of cargos. It also called for establishing a department to supervise activities besides the semi-private Port Authority.

MUSLIM RELIGION MISUSED TO MANIPULATE PEOPLE

Casablanca LIBERATION in French 19 Sep 80 p 3

[Editorial: "Religiosity and Imposture"]

[Text] Religious consciences in the Moslem world have been subjected to a terrible ordeal. Of course, such a thing is not a recent phenomenon. Every Moslem wishing to live in conformity with the Islamic ideal of justice, fraternity and tolerance has been confronted by the harsh realities of the evolution of Moslem society in which the monopolizing of wealth and the concentrating of privileges are all the more visible because the people have not ceased living with injustice and poverty. The demands of a spiritual life (in the Islamic meaning of the word which is not total renunciation of the world) are, therefore, giving way to the accumulation of material goods whose perpetuation is protected by the blindest of violence.

This dichotomy between ideal and fact is a reality. To divert the people's attention, the wealthy attempt to make us believe that the problems of Moslem society do not come from the arbitrariness and exploitation of a dominant class but from I know not what renunciation of faith on the part of the humble and disinherited. Under the circumstances, it is necessary to find the guilty party and to thrash if not annihilate him. They then allege the exclusivity of belief and orthodoxy when even daily behavior conspicuously gives the lie to the attachment placed on principles. The flag of Islam is raised whenever the expression of the popular will becomes stronger and better organized. The pretext is the "threat" to ideology, while the only ideology defended is that of the dominant classes, behind the discreet veil of the defense of beliefs and values.

The partisans of defense of acquired situations and institutionalized privileges were soon unmasked, however:

--At the international level, the war in Lebanon has clearly shown that the "defenders" of the faith have not rejected any compromise with the reactionary Christian minorities whose avowed purpose is to carve up a country, annihilate its national and progressive forces and to frustrate struggle for national liberation undertaken by a martyred people, the Palestinians. How then do we explain the fact that a Moslem army flew to the rescue of reactionary minorities, attached to exhorbitant and anarchronistic privileges, if there were not a consensus of a political kind between Zionism, imperialism and the forces of conservation and reaction against the establishment in Lebanon of institutions based on the democratic principle?

How do we explain the culpable silence of regimes no matter what their ideology in the face of the Tell Azzatar massacre, which involved children, women and old people who were subjected to systematic bombardment to the great satisfaction of Israel? At a time when certain individuals could have lifted their little finger to halt the invasion and massacres, they preferred the tragic denouement and the fall of the Palestinian camp.

What explanations can the so-called defenders of Islam give for this betrayal?

--At the domestic level, from the Gulf to the ocean, there are groups and individuals contriving to divert the popular struggles from their objectives by pretending to save the souls of the masses, while the latter are living in a state of deprivation because of the privileges of the former; when their lack of savoir faire and the emptiness of their doctrine find nothing more than the past to offer as hope for the future, they affect a religiosity which is nothing more than a substitute for imposture; when certain persons see an augmented conscience and determination in the masses' emancipation effort, they then unveil their true nature and do not hesitate to resort to violence and assassination to stem the mounting flood of popular aspirations to dignity, the basis of all spiritual life.

At these two levels, the defense of the Palestinian revolution and the struggle for popular emancipation, Aomar Bendjelloun will have been our messenger. His message was heard and nothing can stop its spread. His memory, therefore, can only remain alive in the hearts of true Moslems.

DETAILS OF SAFI CHEMICAL COMPLEX REPORTED

Chemical, Textile, Energy Industries

Casablanca LA VIE ECONOMIQUE in French 19 Sep 80 p 8

[Text] The Safi chemical complex is to process up to 3.2 million tons per year of dry phosphate from Youssoufia and 3.3 million tons per year of wet phosphate from Ben Guerir in the form of P_2O_5 phosphoric acid concentrated and clarified to 54 percent TSP [treble superphosphate]; MAP [monoammonium sulfophosphate]; NPK [nitrogen-phosphorous-potassium] compound fertilizers; and DAP [diammonium phosphate], as a by-product.

The complex will be made up of three large industrial facilities: Maroc-Chimie [Morocco-Chemistry]; Maroc-Phosphore I [Morocco-Phosphorous I]; and Maroc-Phosphore II located about 10 km from Safi and of a group of installations for handling and storing sulfur, ammonia, phosphoric acid, TSP and and MAP at the port of Safi.

With an overall potential for phosphoric acid production of 1.35 million tons of P_2O_5 per year, the Safi phosphorus complex will be the largest in the world.

It will be basically oriented toward the export of phosphoric acid, TSP, MAP and DAP, as a by-product, and toward the satisfaction of Morocco's needs for phosphated mixed fertilizers.

The Chemical Industry

The year 1965 marked an important stage in the establishment of the bases of a chemical industry in the province. The construction of Maroc-Chimie I was only the first phase in the regional industrialization effort which was pursued by doubling the productive capacity of Maroc-Chimie I and the placing in service in 1976 of another integrated chemical facility: Maroc-Phosphore I.

The Maroc-Chimie chemical complex is a development of world scope; it provides for the production of a whole gamut of products such as:

--phosphoric sulfuric acids,

--treble superphosphate,

--ammonium phosphate,

--diammonium phosphate,

--tripolyphosphate,

--trisodium phosphate and

--phosphoric acid.

The chemical industries which use the phosphate and pyrrhotite of Kettara as their principal raw materials have largely contributed to the utilization of important amounts of manpower and the improvement of the city's infrastructure and its economic development.

The Safi chemical-industrial complex is made up of Maroc-Chimie I, Maroc-Chimie II and Maroc-Phosphore I. Once Maroc-Phosphore II has been completed, the total investments in all these facilities (except Maroc-Chimie I) will be 2.7 billion dirhams, not including the cost of the infrastructures which were taken care of directly by the state.

In the final stage, about 4,000 direct jobs of a highly technical nature will be established. These jobs will generate several others, up and down the line: transport, port, local industry.

Subsequent to the start up of the Maroc-Chimie installations in June 1965, studies targeting the development of local processing of the phosphate were resumed in 1968 and resulted in the placing in service at the end of 1976 of an NPK fertilizer manufacturing unit, the tripling of the initial capacity of Maroc-Chimie, construction of the Maroc-Phosphore II plant and the plant for the recovery of the uranium contained in the phosphoric acid manufactured (still in the planning stage).

With completion of Maroc-Phosphore II, the Safi complex will process 6.5 million tons per year of pyrrhotite coming in equal parts from Youssoufia and Ben Guerir. In the process, it will annually consume: 1.25 million tons of sulfur, 320,000 tons of chloride and potassium sulfate.

The Safi complex will produce 1.83 billion tons of 54 percent phosphoric acid of which 400,000 tons can be transformed into PMA (monoammonium phosphate), 79,000 tons into treble superphosphate and 145,000 into NPK 14-28-14 mixed fertilizer.

The two units, Maroc-Phosphore I and II will bolster the region's industrial progress and contribute to the processing of the nation's natural resources which were exported raw for a long time.

The Textile Industry

The textile industry has experienced relative development in Safi; the Moroccan Textile Company [CCT], which was established in 1946, specializes in other plastic departments, particularly in the following sectors: polypropylene and polyethylene.

The city of Safi over the last several years has benefited from the installation of a very large spinning plant. The ASAFIL [expansion unknown] spinning plant, whose completion recently required an investment of nearly 1 billion entimes, is entirely financed by the private sector which has benefited from the advantages granted by the Investment Code.

This plant has two departments: spinning with 9,000 spindles and a shop for the dyeing of wool and synthetic fibers, which in large measure meets the needs of the domestic (national) market for spun goods.

For its part, the Moroccan Textile Company since 1969 has opted for modernization of its installations in response to developing requirements for product processing. Thus the traditional jute sack which was used for all kinds of packaging finds itself in competition with the plastic bag which is lighter, easier to handle and whose production is less subject to dependency on supplies from distant countries and variations in the prices of natural fibers.

The CCT is using the latest technique in this sector and has a battery of circular looms adapted for the weaving of polypropylene sheeting for the manufacture of over 10 million sacks annually.

The most important domestic clients are the OCE [Marketing and Export Office] for the export of potatoes and Maroc-Chimie for the export of fertilizer. The polyethylene department has an annual production of about 20 million bags of different capacities and colors. Its latest investments, its streamlined and ultra-modern installations, its articles of international quality place the CCT in the forefront of bag producers in Morocco.

Mines and Energy

The Youssoufia Phosphate Center is the most important mining operation in the province. The Moroccan Phosphates Office [OCP] employs about 4,200 workers and employees in Youssoufia who annually produce about 3.5 million tons of phosphates from three underground mines and one strip mine. The development of the phosphate centers is being carried out within the framework of an overall OCP expansion plan which affects Youssoufia in three sectors:

--Continuation of the mechanization process to improve productivity and reduce the cost price per ton to meet increasingly aggressive competition on world markets.

--Increasing the value of most of Morocco's production by transforming it into semi-finished products through the establishment of chemical industry plants (Maroc-Chimie, Maroc-Phosphore).

--Since black phospherous is the future of this center because of the importance of its reserves, the OCP has now prepared a vast development program for this mineral (opening of an underground mining facility, construction and outfitting of a calcination plant).

Ighoud is another mining center in the province. The extraction of barite by the COMABAR [?Moroccan Barite Company] provides employment for about 400 workers and employees for an annual production of 70,000 tons which are exported through the port of Safi.

In another connection, the Moroccan Salt Company in Chemaia produces 20,000 tons per year from salt marshes (water drainage and evaporation basin). The activity of this company could be adversely affected by the start up of the large salt plant at Mohammedia.

Gypsum is a new mining resource for Safi province.

More on Phosphorous Products

Casablanca LA VIE ECONOMIQUE in French 19 Sep 80 p 9

[Text] Phosphoric acid results from a chemical reaction between sulfuric acid and natural phosphate. The resulting mixture, composed of phosphoric acid and gypsum, is vaccum filtrated. The resulting phosphoric acid has a concentration of 30 percent P_2O_5.

The phosphate which is supplied to Maroc-Chimie and Maroc-Phosphore I comes from Youssoufia. The phosphate which will supply Maroc-Phosphore II will come from Ben Guerir. The Youssafia phosphate is crushed in a dry state; that of Ben Guerir will be crushed immediately after washing on site and, therefore, will be wet.

Sulfuric acid is produced either from pyrrhotite (an ore which comes from Kettara) that has an average sulfur content of 30 percent; i.e., imported sulphur. The principal operations consist in burning the pyrrhotite or the sulfur to obtain SO_2 (sulfur dioxide) gas which is transformed by means of catalytic oxidation into SO_3 gas which will produce sulfuric acid.

The combustion of pyrrhotite and sulfur is done exothermically. The heat is recovered to produce steam which is used to produce electric energy in particular.

Each complex has its own thermal power plant which provides the energy needed to operate the complex. The sulphus power is fed into the ONE [National Electricity Office] power grid.

Part of the steam is used to raise the concentration of the phosphoric acid from 20 to 54 percent P_2O_5.

Treble Superphosphate or TSP

TSP is obtained by a chemical reaction between crushed phosphate and phosphoric acid of 40 percent P_2O_5. The resulting mixture passes through a cycle of granulation, drying and grading.

The end product is in the form of granules whose granularity ranges from 0 to 4 mm. The TSP has a titer of 43 percent water-soluble P_2O_5.

Ammonium Sulfophosphate or ASP

This fertilizer is produced from phosphoric acid and imported ammonia. A small amount of sulfuric acid is necessary to obtain a titer of 19 percent nitrogen and 38 percent P_2O_5. The manufacturing cycle is the same as that of TSP.

NPK Mixed (Compound) Fertilizers

The process is the same as for the manufacture of ASP with the additional introduction of potassium chloride at the granulation stage.

These three kinds of fertilizers are produced at Maroc-Chimie.

Monoammonium Phosphate

This product is the result of a reaction between phosphoric acid with a concentration of 54 percent P_2O_5 and ammonia. After the reaction, the product moves into a prilling tower which yields a granularity of 0 to 2 mm. The MAP titrates 11 percent nitrogen and 55 percent P_2O_5. This product is manufactured at Maroc-Phosphore I.

Maroc-Phosphore II will not produce solid fertilizers.

SPAIN COMPETING FOR AFRICAN SARDINE MARKET

Casablanca LA VIE ECONOMIQUE in French 19 Sep 80 p 9

[Text] There is new cause for concern among fish canners: Spain has just launched an aggressive campaign to compete with Morocco on the African markets.

Thanks to its production in the Canary Islands where manpower is relatively cheap, the supply of plentiful fish and the transport of finished products enjoys considerable advantages, Spain is in a position to impact heavily upon our sales.

Everything seems to have started with the announcement of the contract for 600,000 boxes of canned sardines between the OCE [Marketing and Export Office] and Nigeria. Spanish industrialists took offense at this and decided to make an all out effort on the African markets by offering veritable dumping prices. Moroccan producers are all the more bitter about this action because Moroccan-Spanish accords, particularly in the fishing sector, seemed to have brought about a rapprochement between the industries of the two countries. What is more, the announced contract for 600,000 cartons is still far from being filled. So much so that even Moroccan canning sectors fear that it never will be.

A total of 90,000 boxes has been delivered; and it was agreed that the cans of that 60 percent of the order; i.e., 360,000 boxes, were to bear the brand name of the buyer, that is a Nigerian brand name.

In such commercial practices, the buyer is supposed to supply the can manufacturer with a design; however, weeks and months have gone by but this design still has not been supplied. The manufacture of cans requires a minimum of 2 months; and it is feared that as the fishing season moves forward, Morocco will find itself in a position of being unable to fill its contract, if decisions are not made immediately.

Moroccan industrialists are, therefore, wondering whether foreign interventions or excessively competitive offers are not being made so that Morocco will lose this market. The canners on the one hand want the talks with Nigeria to be resumed to finalize this important market and on the other hand a meeting with the Spanish interested parties to permit reestablishment of the excellent relations which we had with this country and which we will continue to have in other sectors.

FRANCE FAVORED AS SUBSTITUTE FOR U.S. IN MIDEAST

Paris AL-MUSTAQBAL in Arabic 19 Jul 80 p 12

[Article by Fu'ad Matar: "France, the Substitute"]

[Text] More than at any other time in the past, it seems that France, unlike other European countries, is being called upon to develop its military industry and its industrial technology so as to be able to respond to Arab requests which may register record levels in the 1980's.

Every time the United States comes out in favor of Israeli interests, France's importance increases in the view of the Arabs. Up to now, France has appeared to be the advanced country that generates the most confidence among Arab countries. The common denominator of this trust is that France wants to play a role without trying to establish hegemony, and that most Arab countries are not prepared to try again the games of the 1950's and 1960's, which were based on trying to benefit from the rivalry of the two superpowers to obtain weapons from them.

To the extent that France develops its military industries and industrial technology, it relieves some Arab countries of the burden of having to make major decisions [sic].

We are currently witnessing a developing situation which provides an opening to France, if it should decide to develop its resources as we mentioned above. The new situation is reflected in the words expressed last week by Prince Sultan, the Saudi minister of defense and aviation, in response to the maneuvers and pressures of the Zionist lobby in the American Congress. Some 70 congressmen signed a letter urging President Jimmy Carter to block an arms package requested by Saudi Arabia. Prince Sultan said: "We say to the Zionist lobby which is exerting pressures during the elections campaign: 'You are losers wherever you are.' The kingdom will not submit an order, only to be turned down, so long as it possesses a prominent moral, economic, geographic and social position with the help of God."

Such sharp words constitute something relatively new in the domain of Saudi-American relations. Although these words are addressed to a number of American congressmen who support Israel, they are also intended to be heard by President Carter. These words mean very clearly that should Saudi Arabia not get the arms it requested from the United States, it would get them from another source.

Since, for objective reasons, that other source cannot be the Soviet Union, France is ready to do the job.

Even if the Saudi threat is effective and gives rise to some change in the position of those members of Congress who support Israel, so that Saudi Arabia will get its arms package, France will still be called upon to develop its military industry and its industrial technology. This is because new circumstances may create a crisis in Saudi-American relations at any moment. Such circumstances are always possible so long as the United States continues to side with Israel, and so long as Saudi Arabia will not back out of its position on the Camp David agreement, no matter how hard the United States tries to change this position.

For its part, Saudi Arabia is actively seeking to make France a possible substitute for the United States. Before the Venice summit, a Saudi-French consultation of the utmost importance took place so that President Giscard d'Estaing may be able to resist the nations toeing the American line. French resistance was only partial. But once France's steadfastness grows, defiance of the United States by the Arabs in general, and the Saudis in particular, will increase.

The Arab foreign and finance ministers agreed at their last conference in Amman on a strategy of joint economic effort through the year 2000, based on integrated Arab development. They approved the principle of joint Arab development in response to Iraq's proposal to set aside a billion to a billion and a half dollars annually for purposes of Arab growth. However, the next Arab summit conference will have to set the standards whereby each Arab country could benefit from this action.

France is an advanced country capable of serving this development. The Arab resolution taken regarding development ties it to abidance by the resolutions of the Tunis and Baghdad summit conferences. France, following President d'Estaing's initiative, which was exposed to some attacks at the Venice summit, is the country that is closest to the aims of these two Arab summits, and the country which demonstrates the greatest degree of understanding of the Arab position.

The developments arising from the American way of doing business with the Arabs, as illustrated by what is now occurring in its dealings with Saudi Arabia, represent a unique opportunity for France. Although there are some risks in this opportunity, it is still a historic chance. Out of it, President d'Estaing might realize what General De Gaulle hoped to achieve when he adopted the historic position in favor of the Arabs during the 1967 war. President d'Estaing must have sensed French opportunity during his past trips to the Arab world. He will become even more aware of it when he visits Iraq this autumn. President Saddam Husayn may help induce him to take the role that France is called upon to play.

In any event, it is a role favorable to France's interests and prestige.

REACTION TO U.S. CONGRESSMEN ON F-15 ADDITIONAL EQUIPMENT

Paris AL-MUSTAQBAL in Arabic 19 Jul 80 pp 10-11

[Article by Sulayman Nimr: "The Battle for the F-15; the Jewish Lobby Opposing the Saudi Lobby"]

> [Text] Sultan ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz: "Washington did not place any conditions on us on the planes deal. America is not the only source of our weapons. We do not bargain over our national principles. We will continue to reject the Camp David accords and any foreign military presence in our region. Saudi Arabia is the top oil supplier in the world. It is necessary that nations share in strengthening the kingdom's defense of its own interests as well as of the interests of the world."

Riyadh--On his way on Wednesday morning to the graduation ceremonies of a new class of officers from the Saudi Staff and Command College in Riyadh, Prince Sultan ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz, minister of defense and aviation, read news reports about the letter which 70 American congressmen wrote to President Carter requesting him not to approve the sale of the additional equipment for the F-15's, to the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia.

After Prince Sultan distributed the diplomas and certificates to the officers, he surprised the audience, which included the ambassadors of several Arab countries, as well as some foreign military attaches, with an improvised speech in which he replied to the American congressmen's letter to Carter. He said: "It is reported that 70 members of the American Congress sent a letter to President Carter demanding that the kingdom not be given advanced weapons. Our answer is that the kingdom will not order arms only to be rejected. The kingdom possesses sufficient strength through the help of God, and its spiritual, social and economic leadership, not to be in a position to make a request only to be turned down."

Prince Sultan added: "When the kingdom places orders for arms, its requests are met in America as well as in other Western countries. The kingdom is not aware of weapons withheld or new advances denied to it."

In his closing remarks on this subject, the Prince said: "We say to the Zionist lobby which is applying pressure during the American elections campaign: 'You are losers wherever you are and wherever you go.'"

After the ceremonies, AL-MUSTAQBAL interviewed Prince Sultan to obtain further clarification of his words and of the congressmen's letter.

[Question] Do you believe that the letter of the congressmen to President Carter will obstruct the sale of additional equipment to the kingdom?

[Answer] Up to now, there has been no change or development that would prevent filling the order we have placed for the kingdom. We have never made requests for arms to the United States or other countries, and been turned down.

[Question] In the event the Congress succeeds in obstructing the sale of this additional equipment to the kingdom, are there other sources from which this equipment can be obtained?

[Answer] Everyone knows that the kingdom has a number of arms sources in friendly Western countries. The United States is not the only source for provisioning the Saudi Arabian army. But we hope to obtain the additional equipment for the F-15's, because the kingdom has the right to enhance its defense capabilities, especially in view of current events occurring in this region.

[Question] Don't you believe that it is possible that Washington may resort to placing conditions on the kingdom before Washington would agree to the additional equipment sales deal? For example, it could ask for Saudi approval of the Camp David accords, or of military facilitations for America in the area.

[Answer] I would like to clarify here that the United States has not presented to the kingdom any special conditions for approval of the sale of this equipment or of any other arms requests. This has not happened. Nor will we permit anyone to place on the kingdom any conditions for our obtaining arms, be it from the United States or anyone else. Our positions are clear and independent regarding the Camp David accords or the granting of military facilitations in the region to any foreign power, We will not bargain over these two issues to obtain arms or for anything else.

[Question] And if Washington places such conditions?

[Answer] We would not permit it. It would be completely unacceptable. It is not customary for the kingdom to entertain any conditions or stipulations from any source whatsoever. [end of answer]

Before Prince Sultan made these statements, Shaykh Faysal al-Hajilan, the Saudi ambassador to Washington, had sharply attacked the message sent by the congressmen to President Carter. He said: "The United States would be placing the interests of Israel before American interests in the Middle East." The Saudi ambassador emphasized in the statement he made in Washington that Saudi Arabia, which possesses a quarter of the world reserves of oil, and which exports a third of the oil traded in the world market, has the right to enhance the effectiveness of its defense capabilities, especially after the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan."

Shaykh al-Hajilan alluded to an important point when he said: "The matter is much more important than the mere additional equipment, which is opposed in the congressmen's letter, and which is available from other sources without conditions or restrictions."

Before all of this, but after the meeting held on 26 June in Geneva between Prince Sultan and Harold Brown, the U.S. secretary of defense, there were several reports that the Carter administration had decided to delay the sale of the additional equipment for the F-15's to Riyadh until after the American presidential elections in November. According to the WASHINGTON STAR, quoting informed American sources, "this was to avoid a direct clash between President Carter and Israeli pressure groups during the election campaign."

Despite the concern caused by these reports among Saudi officials, it was noted that no comment was made regarding them by Saudi Arabia. Even in the first week of July, when the Saudi cabinet met, and Prince Sultan presented a report about his discussions with Harold Brown (which dealt at length with the subject of the additional equipment), no Saudi statement was issued about this subject. Prince Sultan himself did not comment on the reports in question, even though Menachem Begin, the Israeli prime minister, had let it be known in early July that Israel would exert pressure on Washington not to sell the additional equipment to Saudi Arabia, because, as he claimed, "If the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia were given this offensive equipment, its F-15 fighter planes would have the capability to strike Tel Aviv and return to their bases in 20 minutes."

Why then did Prince Sultan make the above statement less than 12 hours after the American congressmen directed their letter to President Carter? Why was the Saudi press so concerned as to prominently publish the statement of the Saudi ambassador to Washington, in which he attacked the congressmen, and in which he charged that the United States would favor Israel's interests over its own interests in the Middle East?

The popular newspaper, AL-JAZIRAH, published the Saudi ambassador's words under banner headline on the front page on 10 June 1980. This was accompanied by a sharply worded editorial which said: "We state frankly and with a loud voice that the United States is trying to lose all its friendships and all its relations and vital interests with the countries of the Middle East, by allowing this kind of tampering with the destinies of the American people by the Zionist lobby in the Congress, the White House, or the Pentagon

As a matter of fact, the congressmen's letter to President Carter gave rise to extreme Saudi indignation. Informed sources in Riyadh told AL-MUSTAQBAL that the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia does not view this matter as a mere question of additional equipment for the F-15's, because Riyadh is capable of obtaining similar equipment from other Western nations, thanks to its strong relations with them. This is particularly true of France, which is bound by such strong ties with Saudi Arabia and the rest of the Arab countries that it would not fail to satisfy any arms requests by Riyadh. As Saudi officials see it, at issue is the Zionist influence within the American administration. It is this influence which prevents Washington from realizing that its genuine interests in the Middle East are more important than the interests of Israel.

Informed sources expect a confrontation in Washington in the next few weeks between the "Zionist lobby," which pressures the American administration to favor the interests of Israel over any other U.S. interests, particularly during the present election campaign, and the "Saudi lobby" which views U.S. economic and oil interests in the Middle East as far more important than the interests of Israel. If Riyadh is successful in this confrontation, the event would have great significance for Arab-American relations. Its greatest significance is that it would mark the beginning of a change in American policy toward the Middle East crisis, which would make Washington view the situation with less bias for Israel. Such a change has been sought by Saudi Arabia for a long time, as evidenced by the Saudi ambassador's words that the matter is far more important than a mere issue of additional equipment.

SAUDI TRADE CONFERENCE PLANNED

Jiddah ARAB NEWS in English 14 Oct 80 p 3

[Text] JEDDAH, Oct 13 — A conference is to be held November 13-14 in Houston, Texas for American companies intending to do business in Saudi Arabia.

The conference, organized by the London Middle East Economic Digest and Advanced Market Research International, aims to help American busineses take advantage of the continuing boom in the Kingdom's economy. Imports, the conference prospectus points out, soared by 28.6 per cent to $26.3 billion in 1979, and the 80 per cent rise in oil prices in the last 18 months is creating even more acute expansionary pressures. These are reflected in the $73.7 billion state budget for 1980-81 a 27 per cent rise on the estimate in the last budget. The high growth strategy is confirmed by the third five-year development plan (1980-85), which calls for an increase of 57 per cent to $222 billion in the level of development expenditure compared to the previous five-year plan.

With the emphasis on education, training, maintenance, telecommunications, electricity and other high-technology services, the new plan promises a market that is not only larger but also of a higher quality.

But the collapse of the Iranian market and the political and economic uncertainties in other Middle Eastern states have brought increased competition for the still stable Saudi Arabian market from European and Far Eastern businesses, says the prospectus. The conference is designed to help American companies take on these competitors.

The conference will be addressed by a senior official of the Kingdom's ministry of commerce, as well as trade experts from the United States.

SAUDI GOVERNMENT CONFIRMS ITS CONTROL OF AWACS

Jiddah ARAB NEWS in English 14 Oct 80 p 1

[Text] JEDDAH, Oct. 13 (SPA) — Defense and Aviation Minister Prince Sultan reiterated the Kingdom's refusal to allow any type of foreign presence in the region.

In an interview with Al -Jazirah Monday Prince Sultan confirmed that the presence of the AWACS planes in Saudi Arabia was controlled by the Kingdom's Government. "We have freedom of decision and policy," he said.

Saudi-U.S. relations were based on respect and equality, the prince said, and not on alliance and commitments. "We don't work behind screens. The Kingdom's policy is clear and not on alliance and commitments. "We don't work behind screens. The Kingdom's policy is clear and known to all," he said.

Commenting on hostile media report on the issue of the AWACS planes, Prince Sultan said, "These people know we are not against criticism. But we are against distorting facts and lying." The reports claimed the AWACS planes" mission was something more than strengthening the Saudi Arabian air force radar system.

The visit of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman, Gen. David Jones, to the Kingdom took place in response to a previous invitation and did not have any link with the present situation in the region, the prince said.

Asked about the truth of Arab press reports that the U.S. turned down a Saudi request for Hawk missiles, Prince Sultan said that the Kingdom has these missiles now. "If we find the necessity to increase the number of Hawk missiles, we know when to request it and the quantity we need," he added.

Regretably, some of the Arab press chase such malicious news.

Sunday, Prince Sultan laid the cornerstone of a SR1.6 billion armed forces medical center for the Eastern Province on a 470,000 square meter site.

The center will include a 300-bed hospital with a specialist intensive care ward and special facilities for treating burns, as well as a ward for artificial kidneys, a department of nuclear medicine, X-ray and chemical laboratories and a physiotherapy section.

According to Dr. Reza Khalifa, director of medical services for the armed forces who delivered a speech on the occasion, the center will include a technical institute for medical services that will accommodate 300 trainees. The institute will have enough classrooms and modern laboratories for all branches of medicine and all technical hospital specialities.

There will also be a housing complex for 325 students, 1,298 apartments and sports grounds. A mosque for the compound will accommodate 800 persons. In addition, the project will have its own industrial zone with maintenance facilities, a water purification and treatment plant, a power station and warehouses for medicine. Work on the project is expected to be completed in May, 1985.

MODERNIZED JIDDAH STEEL CASTING PLANT STARTING OPERATIONS

Jiddah AL-MADINAH in Arabic 29 Jul 80 p 3

[Interview with 'Abd al-Muhsin al-'Utaybi, deputy general manager of Jiddah Steel Casting Company, by Husayn al-Zahrani]

[Excerpts] The Steel Casting Company of Jiddah is one of the subsidiaries of the Saudi Arabian Basic Industries Company (SABIC). It is the first of SABIC's projects to start operations. The plant, which includes some of the most modern machinery and equipment is almost ready to put its commercial products on the local market, and to satisfy an essential portion of its needs. Saudi workers are 85 percent the total work force at the plant. They operate all sections of the plant efficiently, having been sent abroad and trained according to the most modern methods of instruction. AL-MADINAH interviewed 'Abd al-Muhsin al-'Utaybi, deputy general manager of the Steel Casting Company of Jiddah. Here is an account of the conversation.

[Question] Please give us a detailed idea of the plant and some of its operations.

[Answer] This plant was started in 1965. The late King Faysal laid its cornerstone in that year. Petromin undertook its construction to mark the beginning of the age of industrial awakening in the kingdom, especially in the area of iron and steel production. This was to satisfy some of the kingdom's needs for iron rods for reinforced concrete at that time. The plant satisfied a large part of the needs of the western region for iron reinforcement rods under the management of Petromin, and had a planned production capacity of about 45,000 tons yearly.

This plant was one of the first established in the kingdom. Saudi young men sought work at the plant as ordinary and skilled workers, technicians and engineers, and had an opportunity to receive on the job technical training. In this connection, I would like to point out that most of the workers of the plant are Saudis, since they now comprise more than 85 percent of the total work force.

When the Ministry of Industry and Electricity was formed, and all metal production activities became under the control of the ministry, the plant's ownership was transferred to the ministry, which formed a committee to manage it. When SABIC was established as the state-owned company for the implementation of basic industrial projects (such as the production of iron, steel, petrochemicals, etc), ownership of the plant was transferred to SABIC. SABIC entrusted several specialized companies to prepare an extensive study of the existing condition of the plant and its requirements to keep pace with the comprehensive industrial awakening of the kingdom. It was decided as a result of this study to modernize the plant, raise its production capacity to 140,000 tons annually, and staff it with qualified nations. In addition, it was decided to invite a foreign iron and steel company to become a partner in the plant, so as to gain technical know-how from it and train Saudi workers. In fact, an agreement was concluded with one of the foremost German iron and steel companies to this end.

Accordingly, a new company was formed under the name of the Steel Casting Company of Jiddah on 1 July 1979. The new company embarked on modernization of the plant.

Production Capacity

[Question] What is the yearly production capacity, and can it be expanded in the future?

[Answer] The plant is divided into two production units. The first unit produces 50,000 tons annually of small size iron rods for reinforced concrete. Trial production has actually begun in this unit.

The second division, the casting unit, is now being built. Upon completion, it will produce about 90,000 tons of large size iron rods for reinforced concrete in conformance with the most modern worldwide specifications. Thus, total production capacity of the plant will be 140,000 tons a year.

As for future expansion of this capacity, it would depend among other things on the volume of local market demand, especially when the al-Jubayl project begins to produce reinforcing iron. Al-Jubayl's capacity, as you know, will exceed 800,000 tons annually.

We Will Not Satisfy All Needs

[Question] What kind of equipment and machines are in use at the plant? And will it satisfy the needs of the kingdom?

[Answer] The machines and equipment used at the plant are the most modern in the world for the production of reinforcing iron rods, and most operations are automated. In this respect, I would like to make clear that this plant is for casting steel, not producing it. Imported steel ingots are heated in a special oven to a temperature in excess of 1000 degrees centigrade, whereupon the steel is mechanically conveyed through various casting operations.

The kingdom's consumption of iron reinforcement rods in the past year reached nearly 2 million tons. This consumption exceeded all expectations, as a result of the building boom that has swept over the kingdom. This plant will not be able to satisfy all the kingdom's needs. However, when the al-Jubayl project begins production, most of the needs of the kingdom for this product will be met, God permitting.

[Question] What about training and how much will the total cost of the plant reach?

[Answer] There is no doubt that the human factor is one of the most important elements of the industrial boom, if not the most important. Based on this, SABIC has from its inception persisted in its emphasis on training in all its projects. It has given training the highest priority. This has occurred at the Steel Casting Company of Jiddah. As soon as the new company was formed, it began to prepare a training program for technical employees with the cooperation of the German firm. Already 40 individuals have been sent to the firm's plant in Germany, where they have spent some time training on steel casting machinery, especially those like the ones in use here. These trainees, all Saudi, have returned and are doing an excellent job.

[Answer] I would like to praise first of all the wise policy of industrialization pursued by the government of His Majesty the King, which augurs a prosperous future for the citizens of this country. I would also like to commend the efforts of the officials of SABIC.

I would also like to urge Saudi iron merchants, contractors and ordinary consumers to acquire their needs of reinforcing iron from this plant in response to the appeal of Gazi al-Gosaibi, the minister of industry and electricity: "Be Saudi, and buy Saudi products."

The plant will produce the best grades of iron at competitive prices and with prompt delivery dates. This will relieve the merchant and contractor of many problems related to importing, storing and price fluctuations.

We are prepared to discuss the needs of any dealer or contractor, and to fill their orders to their satisfaction.

ENORMOUS NEW PETROCHEMICAL PLANT CONTRACT SIGNED

Riyadh AL-RIYAD in Arabic 29 Sep 80 p 3

/Article by Sultan al-Bazi'i: "Signing of a Contract To Construct the Biggest Petrochemical Project in the Kingdom"/

/Text/ An announcement was made concerning the establishment of the Saudi Petrochemical Company yesterday in Riyadh following signature of the final participation agreement between the Saudi Basic Industries Company, Sabic, and the United States Shell Oil Company. The new company will construct a petrochemical complex in al-Jubyal to produce a number of petrochemical products derived from natural gas. Project costs will come to 11 billion riyals, and it is expected that its production will start 5 years from now.

Signing the participation agreement were His Excellency Ghazi al-Qusaybi, minister of industry and electricity and chairman of the board of Sabic, Mr John Bookhout, president of the Shell Company, and Mr S. Styles, chairman of the board of the Arabian Bechtel Company Ltd, wholly owned by the Shell Company /sic/.

His Excellency Dr al-Qusaybi, in the statement he made on the occasion, pointed out that the long period the negotiations lasted was used to carry out all the necessary economic and technical studies and fully prepare for the basic preparatory materials the project will require, enabling the fledgling company directly to start carrying out the project.

His excellency said,

"The Saudi Petrochemical Company, which will be established as a joint project between the Saudi Basic Industries Company and the Bechtel Company owned by Shell Oil /sic/, clearly reflects the method the kingdom encourages in establishing such technically complicated projects, which is the method of international cooperation represented in joint projects in order to make maximum benefit of the expertise of the foreign partner in the production and marketing fields.

"There is no doubt that the entry by the Shell Company, which is one of the biggest companies in the world, into the project as a partner, clearly shows the extent of the confidence the Saudi economy enjoys and the soundness of the approach we have called for, which is for the petrochemical industry to be established in the area where relative advantages, especially raw materials, are present.

"We thank the Shell Oil Company for the confidence it has shown toward the kingdom, and I especially thank its president, Mr Bookhout, who has always been one of the biggest supporters of this project."

His Excellency Dr al-Qusaybi said,

"This great complex will without a doubt constitute the cornerstone for future chemical industries in the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia and the kingdom will be able to enter into world markets as a partner competing in the sales of these products. The kingdom will also be able to establish integrated industries which the domestic economy requires.

"There is no doubt that the new company will provide the kingdom with high international technology and consequently young Saudis will acquire high skills in a field which is considered one of the advanced industries of the world.

"This project, in producing these useful materials, will use a material which in the past had been burned as waste, namely natural gas. The exploitation of this resource, which had been wasted, is really to be considered a turning point in the orientation of Saudi industry."

Mr. Bookhout, president of the Shell Company, described this firm by stating "This is only a reflection of the good repute the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia enjoys in terms of security, stability and fair dealings with others. We are very happy to be guests in the kingdom but at the same time we will struggle hard to be a suitable partner in the development efforts now underway in this kingdom. We thank you for this trust. We also thank you for the good hospitality which we will never abuse."

"In view of the strength of your will and your farsightedness, and also because great financial resources are present, plants have been provided to gather and separate gas for the sake of the full use of the natural gas associated with the other oil products. It is possible to reinject this gas and use it in feeding the petrochemical complex and supplying fuel for the plants.

"Thus one of the resources abundant in the kingdom, which we have not used and the kingdom has not benefited from, has been converted to a productive goal. A world thirsty for petroleum energy will only be thankful and indebted for such a measure. This is proof of the extent of feeling for international responsibility to the economic system of the free world which is clearly manifest in the wise leadersship of His Majesty King Khalid and his crown prince Fahd."

Eng 'Abd-al-'Aziz al-Zamil, deputy board chairman of Sabic, said that this massive petrochemical complex would be composed of six large-sized plants and would produce five basic petrochemical products--ethylene, ethylene dichloride, ethanol, caustic soda and styrene.

He said, "The costs of constructing this complex, totalling 11 billion riyals, reflect the nature of capital intensity in this type of industry, reducing the number of foreign laborers because of its complex machinery, since the complex does not need more than 1,300 workers for its operation.

"We have chosen the system of building the complex by means of prefabricated units shipped to the site in order to reduce the volume of foreign labor, and this will result in giving Saudi citizens an opportunity to hold major administrative and operating positions in the project."

Eng al-Zamil, in response to AL-RIYAD's question on the response the training program Sabic organized has received young Saudis and its effect in reducing the percentage of foreign workers in basic industry projects, said, "There is no doubt that the response Sabic has met is to be considered a turning point in the training programs; the programs were designed to accommodate 240 trainees; because of this reception the number was raised to 400. We aim to reach greater than this rate in a longer period, so that we may realize a 100 percent proportion of Saudis in administration of the industrialization program."

"The complex will produce 650,000 metric tons of ethylene, 295,000 metric tons of styrene, 281,000 tons of raw industrial ethanol, 454,000 metric tons of ethylene dichloride and 377,000 metric tons of caustic soda annually."

This is to be considered the biggest of the Saudi Basic Petrochemical Industries Company projects and is the seventh project whose final participation agreement has been signed.

BANK AID TO FARMERS--As a responsible official in the bank stated to AL-RIYAD, Saudi Arabian Agricultural Bank reports, in statistics prepared by the bank for its activities in the months of May, June and July of this year, 1980-81, that the volume of loans came to about 426,443,099 riyals, accounting for about 6,476 loans offered to people working in the agricultural sector, in the form of farmers and investors in the field of agricultural projects contributing to the attainment of the self-sufficiency in food needed for the consumers by helping to provide such basic food elements as meat, dairy products, eggs, vegetables and fruit. The services of the bank during this period extended to include fishermen and beekeepers as well as bedouins and renters of agricultural equipment. It is worth pointing out that the loans the bank has offered, are aimed at supplying the farmers with the money they need to meet the expenses of farming, the accessories it requires and agricultural project insurance. By the grace of God, it has been possible to provide about 4,773 machines and 4,131 pumps during this period of the year, in addition to more than 5,307 items of agricultural equipment and the tractors, plows, harvesters, trucks, excavators, threshers, pipelayers and so forth attached to them. In addition, about 25 percent of specialized agricultural projects have been financed by the bank in this period. The source adds that the value of the aid in the first quarter came to about 117,140,926 riyals; this was provided for agricultural production factors in the form of machines, pumps, agricultural machinery, fodder, poultry raising equipment and dairy producing equipment, as well as fishing gear. The source concluded his statement by saying that the high official orders which were recently issued giving agreement to extension of the period for payment of Agricultural Bank loans from 5 to 10 years will encourage many investors to explore the agricultural field in order to move the wheel of agricultural development, achieving prosperity and welfare in this sphere. /Text/ /Riyadh AL-RIYAD in Arabic 15 Sep 80 p 2/

VILLAGE IMPROVEMENTS--In the projects drawn up by the Municipality of al-'Umran in the town of al-'Umran and the villages surrounding it, the municipality has awarded bids for the paving and lighting project to a domestic organization. This will cover all the area of al-'Umran and outlying districts with its 21 villages. On the environmental health projects in the Eastern Province, he declared that drilling has been completed on three wells for potable water in the villages of al-Rumaylah, al-Chasi and al-Sivayirah, and construction has been completed on water tanks in the town of al-'Umran and the village of al-Rumaylah. Also, a water line has been laid in the al-Khudayri and al-Duwaykiyah sections. He also added that the network budgets concerning the swamps and depressed areas in the villages of al-Kilabiyah, al-Miqdam and al-Hulaylah have been presented to the Environmental Health Committee in the Eastern Province preparatory to filling them in under the committee project. Regarding the scheme for lands for people with limited incomes, he stated that work is still underway on the scheme for people with limited incomes in al-Kilabiyah, which comprises about 300 housing lots with utilities, and it will be completed shortly, God willing. It will also be paved and connected to a divided highway 60 meters wide containing sidewalks and lighting also. /Text/ /Riyadh AL-RIYAD in Arabic 27 Sep 80 p 3/ 11887

SYRIAN GRAND MUFTI GIVES PERSONAL INTERVIEW IN EAST BERLIN

East Berlin HORIZONT in German Vol 13 No 21, 1980 signed to press 19 May 80 pp 14-15

[Interview with Shaykh Ahmad Kaftaru, Grand Mufti of the Syrian Arab Republic, in East Berlin (date not given), by Carl-Friedrich Reinhardt: "HORIZONT Portrait: Shaykh Ahmad Kaftaru--A Meeting With the Grand Mufti of the Syrian Arab Republic"]

[Excerpt] From the Barada to the Spree

Shaykh Ahmad Kaftaru--the title "shaykh" is somewhat of an equivalent here of priest or scholar--and other Islamic dignitaries are for studies in the GDR at this point. Knowing he will have a very busy program today, I ask his indulgence for disturbing him so early--while he is having breakfast. With kind consideration he says: "How so? Is it not pleasant to take in some spiritual food along with one's breakfast?"

And promptly, in answer to my question, Shaykh Kaftaru starts telling me how he came to assume the office of the highest Islamic dignitary in Syria--having been born, in 1915, as the son of a ulema, scholar Shaykh Mohamad Amin, in Damascus.

"First I studied with theologians Islamic and Arab sciences in the traditional individual manner. Thereafter one gets licensed by one's teacher to give Islamic religious lessons oneself. This I did for 40 years. I would lecture about Islam everywhere, many times also in Damascus, mainly in the largest mosque of Damascus, the Beni-Omaijad, but also in others--such as the mosque of Abu Nur. That is located in an Islamic center of scholarship in Damascus. That center has two institutes and an Islamic theological faculty. I founded that institute in 1972, and there is where I work at present. But even before that, in 1956, I had founded two institutes, secondary schools, as it were, with a religious orientation, one for girls and one for boys."

He chooses and accentuates his words well and, using gestures sparingly, describes his teaching activities which evidently give him much satisfaction. At times he rearranges a sleeve of his grey garment, the djilbab, something like a caftan. His white headgear, the aimama, makes his face shine a bit more. Altogether this is the picture of a successful teacher.

Because of his many distinctions, Shaykh Kaftaru was appointed mufti of the city of Damascus. "That was in 1952, and that was my function until 1964. Then the General Mufti, the Grand Mufti of Syria was chosen." Shaykh Kaftaru emphasizes: "The law in our country is that this office calls for a vote by higher religious scholars. Thus in 1964 I was chosen the Grand Mufti and I am simultaneously the chairman of the Supreme Islamic Council (the Mufti Council) in Syria."

That office took him, as Syria's representative, to many parts of the Islamic world and made him take part in many conferences and scholarly congresses. Due to that, he earned an honorary doctorate from the Sherif Hadayatollah Islamic State University in Djakarta, Indonesia. In the same year he was awarded the highest medal of the Islamic Republic, in Pakistan, the "Star of Pakistan." He also traveled to Western countries, however, and, among other things, on the invitation from the Great Lakes Universities in the United States, gave lectures there on Islamic and Arab affairs and--he makes a special point of this--on the problems of the Palestinians.

Had he visited socialist countries at this time too? "I was several times in the Soviet Union, on four visits in 1969, 1973, 1974 and 1979. I visited mosques in the Soviet Union, gave lectures and met in Moscow with high representatives of the Soviet government. We had very interesting talks. Though our philosophical points of view differed, one of the persons I talked with said to me at the end: 'If Islam is as you have presented it to us, it really is a good thing.' I have another invitation from the Soviet Union this year, for next fall."

Christians and Moslems

One matter Shaykh Kaftaru evidently is most concerned with is the relationship between Christians and Moslems, more exactly the cooperation of all people for the safeguarding of peace. "For more than 30 years I have advocated that Christians and Moslems move closer toward each other and live in peace together. It altogether is my view--which I also have been stressing in many meetings and talks during my current visit in the GDR--that much still remains to be done to deepen the cooperation and good relations among the nations, precisely for reasons of making a good contribution to the preservation of peace."

And Shaykh Kaftaru continues: "I always proceeded from my Islamic faith, for Prophet Mohammed has said--and I paraphrase slightly: 'A Moslem is, willy-nilly, the brother of others.' The term 'atheists,' it seems to me, should be replaced by a better term: people who think scientifically. For there are many different possibilities that can be used--faith, reason and science--for the benefit of cooperation and peace and, above and beyond that, international fraternity and love among the people."

Islam and the State

Those probably also are the terms in which one must understand the clear reply Shaykh Kaftaru made to the question of how he perceived of his task as the highest Islamic dignitary in Syria in relation to the Syrian state, especially since many Western mass media are rousing incitement in this regard particularly. "The attitude and words of our President Hafiz al-Assad make an unequivocal reply easy. This president is a believer, a Moslem president, and I think the relations between state and religion are very very good, and there are no disadvantages.

I have been friendly with the president for more than 15 years. We are good friends. I know his faith, his conduct, his ethics. We trust him completely. Not only we, the religious leaders, the whole nation trusts him. It is the natural thing that there always are some wicked people who want to sow discord. But those aspects of the imperialist mass media are, after all, known well enough."

He himself, Shaykh Kaftaru emphasizes, had been a delegate of the People's Council to the Syrian parliament for one election period. "My work was like that of any deputy who serves his people. Islam, after all, is not a 'religion of prayers' but one of life that enters the various domains of life and does everything for people. And while our President Hafiz al-Assad is now considering how to expand the National Progressive Front, we, being responsible for religion in Syria, will do likewise. That is our duty and task."

In view of the current imperialist threat against the countries in the Near and Middle East, the threat with the "big stick," and after the hypocritical words of the U.S. President himself about his "deep respect and veneration for Islam" have been led ad absurdum by his deeds, Shayky Kaftaru says, very calmly, and judiciously and prudently, I think: "In our time, the existence of man, the survival of mankind, is most closely associated with the problem of preserving the peace. We work for peace and, even more still, for the higher goal of establishing brotherhood among the people. War and aggression find their pathogenic agent in egoism and the greed for conquest. This is a psychological illness, and illness of the soul, and these pathological ideas must be treated so that no evil consequences will result from them. It is not that I look at the problem of preventing wars from my emotions only. I look at it from the standpoint of science, conviction, religion and practical realization."

All Help for the Palestinians

Our talk logically leads us to the Steadfastness Front which, in its conferences--in January this year in Damascus and in April in Tripoli, Libya--adopted clear resolutions on supporting the Palestinians. Says Shaykh Kaftaru: "I believe all Arabs are ready to help the Palestinians, especially the countries of the Steadfastness Front. It reflects our patriotism, our allegiance to the Arab Nation, and our Islamic faith. No Arab can afford not to help the Palestinians, as it were. Every Arab knows this is his first and foremost task. Moreover, the Palestinian problem has become an international problem as, altogether, the peace in the world is threatened by this problem.

On the other side: those who do not help and who try to derive their own benefits from this difficult situation, are people we cannot love, with whom one cannot be friendly. We must grant the Palestinian people all help possible so they will recover their legitimate claims to forming their own state. These rights belong among the human rights, as ratified by the international organizations, including the United Nations."

'Israel Committing Two Errors'

Shaykh Kaftaru most emphatically advocates that Israel should at last be forced internationally to recognize the Palestinians' legitimate rights to forming their own state. It would be in the vital interest of Israel itself. To bolster this argument, Shaykh Kaftaru adduces historic evidence that would be hard to refute: "In refusing to recognize the legitimate claims of the Palestinians, Israel is committing two crucial errors, one religious, the other historic.

First, Israel says it has a religious and a historical claim to the land of Palestine. It claims: 'God promised the land of Palestine to his son Abraham.' Which is in no way correct. God promised the land of Palestine to all his sons--to Isaac and to Ismail. And those are the Arabs and Jews together, not merely the Jews by themselves.

But furthermore: we can today no longer constantly refer to a judge of thousands of years ago. We have our judges and our laws in our times, and human rights have to be looked at in terms of our own times.

Secondly, it is regrettable to see how Israel is trying to bring Jews from foreign countries to Israel. Israel wants them to leave their homecountries and come to an alien land which, futhermore, is a conquered land. Why should they actually seek to find a new 'homeland' there?

There is absolutely no justification for inducing Jews in Europe or Asia to leave their homeland and settle in a country from which Palestinians were expelled. There is no reasonable ground for that, but that is what Israel is doing.

Israel is also committing a historic error in failing to learn any lessons from history. The crusades, after starting in the 11th century, lasted circa 200 years, as one knows. Some also got to Palestine, causing horrible bloodbaths. But the crusaders, beaten, had to withdraw from Palestine, and the people of Palestine regained their rights. Later then, imperialists and colonialists conquered our countries, but the peoples fought and regained their independence. And as the colonialists and imperialists suffer defeats everywhere, the same will be Israel's fate. The Palestinian people will win and regain their legitimate rights."

When our conversation is nearing its end, words of friendly and solidary closeness, and of thanks, reverberate again for having become acquainted through many conversations and meetings during this visit in the GDR with a people "working with great diligence and scientific progress, and loving life." Great cordiality had welcomed him everywhere. "We have sensed with great joy the sincere friendship your country has for the Syrian people. And we are gratified in having observed that the GDR is making every effort for stabilizing world peace."

UGTT COMMUNIQUE ON NATIONAL UNION COMMISSION

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 3 Oct 80 p 5

[Article: "Formation of the National Union Commission"]

[Text] With the decision made by the union leadership before 26 January 1978 to be represented by a national union commission, followed by a decision in the same direction by the present administrative commission of the UGTT [Tunisian General Federation of Labor] (see the communique, which follows), the solution of the union crisis now seems possible.

The proposal of the Political Bureau of the PSD [Destourian Socialist Party] to constitute a commission representing all union tendencies in order to prepare for a democratic congress has thus been understood and appreciated for its true worth.

This proposal and the positive reactions it has received are a response to President Bourguiba's recommendations and proceed from the solicitude he feels for all national organizations and his concern to consolidate the country's progress.

The compromise finally adopted by the union members is also a part of the Mzali government's new policy and responds to the government's efforts to give national politics a solid democratic base.

It also echoes the decisive role the party has assumed instituting a general environment suitable for work and the establishment of a solid platform for dialogue.

This important step towards a new congress is also a response to the expectation of the working masses, whose profound desire is to have a representative, responsible, and dynamic union organization, especially since great tasks, among which is the forthcoming review of collective conventions, are awaiting the social partners.

By going beyond details and other secondary matters, unionists have shown a sense of responsibility, which requires individuals to "yield to the national imperative," as Mr Mzali recently put it in his interview in LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE.

The administrative commission of the UGTT has sent TAP the following communique:

"The administrative commission of the Tunisian General Federation of Labor, meeting on the afternoon of Tuesday 2 October 1980,

"After citing the recommendation of the Political Bureau, dated 5 August 1980, calling for the constitution of a commission charged with preparing for the next UGTT congress in the framework of liberty and democracy;

"After reviewing the decisions of the administrative commission at the successive meetings it has held, especially those of Friday and Saturday 12-13 September 1980;

"After examining the evolution of the union situation that has followed them and that foreshadows a positive and effective outcome and approach to the union crisis;

"Reaffirming its support for the far-seeing political orientation dictated by President Bourguiba and followed by Mr Mohamed Mzali, general secretary of the party and prime minister;

"Considering the decisive, historic turning point that our country has reached and that requires everyone to close ranks in order to preserve union unity and thereby consolidate national unity for the purpose of preserving our accomplishments and insuring our country's invulnerability;

"Faithful to the noble ideals of unionism and the eminently patriotic positions taken by the UGTT throughout its glorious history thanks to the labor of its members and martyrs, headed by the late Farhat Hached;

"Aware of the heavy responsibility devolving upon unionists and requiring them all to show abnegation and devotion in the service of the workers and our country and to respond to the general will of the workers to try to find a satisfactory solution to the union problem on the basis of liberty and democracy;

"(1) Decides to support the proposal of the Executive Bureau appointing to the national union commission Messrs:

Noureddine Hached	Lakhdar Jeziri
Ahmed Amara	Mohamed Ali Sfaxi
Habib Chabbouh	Tojhani Acheur
Taieb Mansour	Mahmoud Ben Tahar
Abdallah Ben Said	Habib Tlili

"(2) And to ratify the decision of the Executive Bureau to divest itself of its responsibilities and yield them to the national union commission for the purpose of facilitating its mission and insuring its independence and coming guarantees.

REGIONAL EQUILIBRIUM: KEYSTONE OF NEW DEVELOPMENT STRATEGY

Tunis DIALOGUE in French 6 Oct 80 p 55

[Article by Khaled Tebourbi: "Regional Equilibrium: Keystone of a New Development Strategy"]

[Text] The idea now seems to be accepted that regional development should be an entirely separate component part of the country's economic and social policy.

Government officials have already made that clear, and everything in recent economic, administrative, and political decisions indicates that the proper conditions for implementing this new orientation are being met.

This being the case, it seems useful to us first to examine the reasons that have led up to this new choice (for it is indeed a new choice); next, in the light of the changes developing now, to try to state the objectives of the "regional" strategy.

By critically examining the last two decades of development and, more concretely, by learning the lessons of 1975 general census, Tunisian officials have concluded that a well-defined regional development policy is necessary.

Examining the last two decades has revealed that despite changing options, the development model adopted by Tunisia since it gained independence has always followed a macroeconomic growth dynamic; it has turned in a good performance, but it has not been well-adapted to evaluating properly the imbalances affecting various socio-economic components, nor has it made it possible to alleviate them.

In the period of recovery and general development that followed independence, and, all the more so in the sectorial growth phase that has characterized the country's economy since 1970, choices and achievements could be indexed only by overall development indicators and coefficients. Obviously this was likely to make it easy to overlook missing "details" and to relegate to the secondary status of ad hoc solutions the measures that, in the best cases, could be taken to correct these oversights.

For example, things like the rural exodus or the shift of resources from one region to another were concerns at the time, but the complexity and extent they have gained with the passing of time were never expected, because general evaluation indices such as the overall growth rate, the gross national product, per capita income, etc. gave no indication of them.

But these conclusions of principle were not by themselves determining ones; the 1975 census was needed to bring the matter to full light. The results of the census, while not exhaustive, were enough to show that the model adopted by Tunisia had led people to underestimate seriously the resulting imbalance of overall growth and the absence of a real policy of regional development.

The interpretation was enlightening:
--An imbalance in population followed an imbalance in setting up activites for "overall development";
--The production per region is out of balance;
--There is imbalance between the regions themselves;
--There is imbalance between sectors.
The question arises whether imbalance is not itself the actual rule of development, whether it is not a dialectic element of development, and whether it would not be better, all things considered, to accept it philosophically as the bitter fruit of development.

Fortunately the leaders did not stop at these questions. The prevailing idea among them today is that the imbalances noted should be considered toxins, or mistakes, and that it is possible to conceive of another model of growth that will perform well and yet make it possible to do away with them or at least alleviate them. Hence the determination they have shown to find clear solutions to the "problem" by implementing a real strategy of territorial and regional development.

This strategy may be expected to have three major objectives:

An economic objective for regional development. This will consist in developing all the potential resources of the country that are still underutilized or not utilized in the regions.

A social objective. This objective will coordinate with the first and will aim at improving the income and standard of living of households presently below the poverty level and unable to meet essential needs. These households will be aided by participating in the country's development effort.

A political objective, last but not least. The fact of regional development will create an exemplary median society, one in which the reduction of imbalances between individuals and groups of individuals will make it possible to reduce social tensions between Tunisian citizens and will make national unity an unalterable reality.

STATE EXPRESSES IMPORTANCE OF FISHING INDUSTRY DEVELOPMENT

Tunis LA PRESSE in French 7 Oct 80 p 4

[Article: "Mr Ben Osman: The State Is Determined To Promote the Basic Infrastructure and Aid Producers by All Means Available"]

[Text] Mr Lassad Ben Osman, the minister of agriculture, presided over the opening of a seminar yesterday morning on the "fishing wealth in the Gulf of Gabes." It was held by the National Institute of Oceanography with the cooperation of the General Commissariat of Fisheries.

Noted participants in the seminar were Messrs Mohamed Belhaj Ali, director of the Institute; Mohamed Hamza, acting general commissioner of Fisheries; Mohamed Zouali, general director of the National Office of Fisheries (ONP), and a great number of researchers and professional fishermen.

Mr Ben Osman opened the seminar, saying that it would have to examine questions of great importance for fishing and for the development of fisheries on the most densely marine-populated areas of the Tunisian coast.

"This seminar," he said, "is part of a series of conferences that will be held to increase direct and constructive contact with all who are concerned with Tunisian fisheries, their rational exploitation, development, and conservation."

After emphasizing the importance that the government attaches to this important sector, the minister mentioned that Tunisia has, in addition to its 1,300 km of coastline, a large continental shelf off of Gabes. Mr Lassad Ben Osman explained, "These fisheries are for Tunisia and all Tunisians an advantage that must in no way be neglected. That is why it is important to regulate their use and protect them against any anarchic and unplanned use."

On this subject, the minster emphasized the need to inform fishers of the various studies made by the National Institute of Oceanography, which, he noted, not only does purely scientific work but also, with the cooperation of fishers, performs practical experiments likely to favor both a complementarity of efforts undertaken in this sector by all parties concerned and to give this department access to the outside area that is the object of its study.

The minister hoped that the Institute would be able to consolidate cooperation among the various fishermen and undertake research that would meet this sector's needs. He mentioned that his department has decided to establish similar institutes in the coastal areas.

He also expressed the hope of seeing closer ties between producers and the ONP and said that the Office's mission is not to compete with producers but to help them in prospecting on the fishing banks through its financial resources, staff, and technical potential.

The minister was also gratified by the efforts made by the National Federation of Fisheries, which has established regional fishing banks, which, he said, are actually mutual assistance societies that assist producers in marketing their catch.

In conclusion, the minister stressed that the complementarity of efforts by the parties concerned naturally tends to develop the fisheries sector, especially since the government has made enormous efforts to build new fishing ports and is determined to promote the basic infrastructure and to help producers by all possible means.

TWO ISLANDS LINKED--The Executive Council discussed in its meeting yesterday, under the chairmanship of His Excellency Lieutenant General Shaykh Khalifah ibn Zayid, the crown prince and president of the council, the project concerning reclaiming the lands of the islands of Hudayriyat and Bu al-Sayayif, and forming one island to be later linked to Abu Dhabi, the mother island, through one bridge to meet the population growth. This project was initiated by His Highness Shaykh Zayid ibn Sultan al-Nihyan, the chief of state, during his latest visit to these islands. The implementation of this project will require transferring 35 million cubic meters of sand so that the new island reaches 9 kilometers with the possibility for further expansion. The two islands are located southwest of Abu Dhabi. The islands of Hudayriyat and Bu al-Sayayif are located 5 and 7 kilometers respectively from Abu Dhabi. The distance between the two islands is 2 kilometers. The council also discussed the project of developing the south channel in Abu Dhabi. Moreover, the council discussed the electric power station project in Umm al-Nar, west 7 and 8, which will include the installation of two steam turbines each of 160 megawatts. Furthermore, this project will include the installation of four desalination units with a daily capacity of 20 million gallons of water. The council reviewed a number of matters related to providing citizens with services and the appropriation of additional funds for the projects of Bint Sa'ud and al-Za'lah in al-'Ayn, and the approval of new funds for the aforestation projects in the municipality of Abu Dhabi. Introduction

The challenges that have faced Egypt in its performance of its leadership role in the Arab causes in particular and the African and international causes in general have had a big impact on Egypt's low economic growth rates and on its inability to maintain a proper standard of services.

This is why housing has not received its due share of attention--a lack of attention that has ultimately led to the deterioration of the housing problem to the degree which makes this problem hold at present the second highest priority in the state's national interests after securing food.

Out of our faith in man and of his being the goal of every growth and the means for realizing this growth, the government believes that housing constitutes an economic and social necessity and an important element for creating a consolidated society and a healthy social atmosphere characterized by stability and providing the suitable circumstances for production and for development activity.

Now that God has given our inspired President Muhammad Anwar al-Sadat success in establishing peace that heralds a new era in our nation's life--an era over which prosperity prevails and in which each citizen aspires rightfully to realize his long-sought wishes, including the wish of having proper and healthy housing--there is no doubt that the task of providing such housing is not confined to one agency and not another. All of society's efforts, including the efforts of this society's various public and private sectors, must act in solidarity to realize this goal.

In implementation of the instructions of his excellency the president of the republic in this regard, Prime Minister Dr Mustafa Khalil has issued a decision forming a national committee to study the roots of the problem and to propose the national policy capable of confronting it according to sound scientific approaches.

To realize this, the committee held successive meetings throughout a period of 4 months during which it studied the national housing strategy on whose basis the special policies for every aspect of the problem are founded.

In view of the fact that the problem under study is a national problem that is closely linked to all the political, economic and social spheres, it was deemed fit to form eight working teams, each entrusted with one aspect of the problem. These teams carried out detailed studies which were presented to the national committee. After studying all the reports, the committee ended up with the conclusions contained in the proposed national housing plan.

It pleases me on this occasion to laud the great efforts exerted by the chairman and members of the main committee and of the subsidiary working teams who were comprised of a select group of specialized public figures with broad experience and high qualifications. Were it not for the vast efforts they have exerted, it would not have been possible to draw up the draft plan in this manner and in such a short time.

In conclusion, I hope that the proposed plan will receive the approval of all the state's executive and popular agencies and that it will be put into implementation as soon as possible so as to realize our people's aspirations for a better life.

God is the giver of all success.

Engineer Mustafa al-Hifnawi
Minister of Housing

Chapter One: Familiarization With Problem

1-1 Introduction

1-1-1: The houses and residential centers existing in Egypt, both those in the urban and rural areas, are the product of successive generations that have been influenced by the contemporary social, economic and political conditions under which they lived.

1-1-2: Until the end of the 19th century, these residences were either luxurious palaces built by the wealthy, who were a few, or big rambling houses in which the head of a family, his sons and their families lived or low houses built of bricks or stone with wooden roofing.

1-1-3: Most of the buildings were owned by people who were careful to live in them because tradition called for every family to live in its own house. Egypt did not know the policy of leasing in a clear form until the first half of the 20th century when many investors employed their money in housing by virtue of its being an investment with guaranteed profit.

1-1-4: In this part of the 20th century and with the development of the social, under the economic and political conditions in the country and with the emigration of numerous families from the countryside to the cities, especially to Cairo where all the means of attraction are present, the housing design developed into investment apartment buildings and many investors proceeded to construct such buildings by virtue of their being a better investment than other types of investment.

1-1-5: Because of the increased emigration from the countryside to the urban areas and the excess in population compared to housing units and, consequently, because of the widening gap between supply and demand, the state started to intervene as of 1954 by building houses for people with limited incomes. However, the state has not been able to meet the housing requirements needed to deal with the increase in the number of families, to absorb the emigrating families, to face the renewal and replacement needs or to deal with the economic development needs, all of which are increasing year after year.

1-1-6: The successive laws issued to fix the rent values, then to reduce them and then to define the relationship between the landlord and the tenant have had their grave impact by causing many investors to refrain from investing their savings in construction, in addition to causing landlords to stop carrying out maintenance work for their houses. All of this is the cause for the presence of many old buildings that get damaged and collapse easily. Our future housing strategy and national policy need to deal with this issue in a fundamental manner so as to preserve and prolong the life of the existing buildings and to maintain the ties of love and peace among all citizens, be they landlords or tenants.

1-1-7: This is why the housing problem in Egypt has become one of the major issues we are facing at present and why the population explosion has turned into a fundamental stumbling block and a major obstacle in the face of the economic and social development efforts. Moreover, the rapid population growth year after year has come to represent the alarm signal for the danger threatening to consume the main part of the national production of the development programs. This growth also represents an ever-present pressure on the public services and utilities. It is worth noting that the rate of housing unit construction dropped from seven units per 1,000 persons in 1960 to about two housing units per 1,000 persons in 1975.

1-1-8: The matter requires the reappropriation of an ever-increasing part of the national income to just maintain the present standard of services. This reappropriation affects the part that can be channelled toward direct investment in the production projects that led to enhancing the economic growth rates. The big population growth results in an increase in the consumption rate and, consequently, in a drop in the rate of the savings that can be directed toward direct investment in housing.

1-1-9: The Arab Republic of Egypt is devoting special attention and exerting vast efforts in an attempt to formulate fundamental solutions for the housing problem. But despite all these efforts, the problem has grown to such an extent that most families suffer from it in one way or another. This is what motivated the creation of this committee so that it may draw up a national policy that seeks to solve the problem at present and in the future.

1-2 Causes of Problem

The housing problem emerges at both the national and local levels as a direct result of the following fundamental factors:

The high population growth rates.

The population's qualitative distribution and its impact on the housing problem.

The high rates of emigration from the countryside to the urban areas.

The population's social and economic dimensions [characteristics] and their impact on the housing problem.

The failure to establish a balanced relationship between the landlord and the tenant--a failure which has caused investors to refrain from employing their monies in housing.

1-2-1: Population Growth and Its Impact on Housing Problem

The constant population growth in Egypt, especially in the cities, has a big impact on the housing problem as a result of the subsequent effect of this growth in creating new families in need of new housing. This is in addition to the fact that internal migration has contributed to intensifying the housing crisis in the republic's cities.

By studying the population situation in the republic, it has become evident to us that the republic's population amounted to 38.2 million people in 1976, of whom 37.7 millions live inside the republic, i.e. with an increase of 8.2 million people over 1966. The annual population growth rate in the period from 1966 to 1976 amounted to 2.31 percent compared to an annual growth rate of 2.54 percent in the period from 1960 to 1966--the period experiencing a rapid growth in Egypt's population. However, the current annual growth rate of 2.31 percent is still high and if the current situation persists, the republic's population will amount to nearly 66.2 million people in the year 2000. This figure will result in the further deterioration of the housing problem in Egypt. However, if it becomes possible to reduce the annual birth rate by one per thousand through the adoption of an effective family-planning policy, the population will amount to about 56 million people only in the year 2000. The population may also amount to 59.6 million people in the year 2000 if the Egyptian woman's childbirth habits are changed to make this woman give birth to two children only.

From the distribution of this population over the planning [presumably meaning administrative] provinces, we find that the greater Cairo province contains the largest percentage of the population and that this province's population amounted in 1976 to 9.2 million people representing 25.1 of the republic's total population. This means that one quarter the republic's population exists in the greater Cairo province. This indication has its significance in the planning to solve this problem because greater efforts must be channelled toward solving this problem in the province, especially when we learn that the province population will amount to nearly 17.6 million people in the year 2000. Second in population density is the delta province which includes the governorates of al-Minufiyah, al-Gharbiyah, Kafr al-Shaykh, Damietta and al-Daqahliyah. The population of this province has amounted to 8.6 million people representing 23.4 percent of the republic's total population. The figure is expected to reach 14 millions by the year 2000. Alexandria province is also a province with high population density that needs to have its present and future housing needs dealt with. The 1976 census shows that this province's population amounted to 4.8 million people representing 13.1 percent of the republic's total population. This figure is expected to reach 8.7 million people in the year 2000.

By studying the population distribution in the rural and urban areas, we find that the 1976 census shows that the urban population amounted to 16.1 million people representing 43.9 percent of the total population whereas the rural population was estimated at 20.6 million people representing 56.1 percent of the total population. The housing problem emerges more clearly in the urban areas than in the rural areas. Therefore, most of the concerted efforts must be channelled toward the problem in the urban areas where the problem will intensify year after year as a result of the aforementioned factors.

It is worth noting that this enormous population which is increasing by more than one million people annually lives on an area not exceeding four percent of the republic's total area and that this inhabited area extends along the banks of the Nile River. This makes it necessary to move to new centers outside the [Nile] valley, such as the northwestern coast, the new valley, the Red Sea coast, the Sinai and the High Dam Lake area. This movement must be made on the basis of a profound and deliberate study of the components of life in these areas and on the basis of exerting efforts to develop these components.

The matter also requires the initiation of efforts to draw up comprehensive national planning for the entire republic and regional planning for the various provinces. This work should proceed side by side with implementation of the proposed plan so that the development may take place on sound scientific foundations.

1-2-3: Emigration From Countryside to Urban Areas

The statistical data shows that emigration from the countryside to the urban areas is occurring at high rates and that the urban population is rising steadily as a result of natural increase on the one hand and internal migration on the other. This trend is causing further deterioration in the housing problem, especially in the urban areas. Consequently, it is necessary to establish new centers of attraction, to develop the countryside and to raise its living standard so as to make it desirable to live in the countryside and to curtail emigration from it. As a result of the population growth, the area of cultivable land has diminished due to the encroachment of construction on this land at a rate of nearly 60,000 feddans annually. Should this situation continue, the expansion of construction in the next 20 years will swallow more than one million feddans [of cultivable land]. This calls for diverting construction toward the desert.

1-2-4: Social and Economic Conditions and Their Impact on Housing Problem

A house in the modern sense is the material framework for human interaction. The nature of this interaction depends to a large degree on the structures of this framework with the buildings, open spaces, utilities, services, streets, public parks, recreation spots and markets it contains.

Providing the proper sanitary housing and the well-studied residential environment that takes into consideration the deep-rooted social criteria and cultural customs in both the rural and urban local societies has constituted one of the means [sic] preoccupying the social and economic policy of the developing world generally, and especially a broad segment of this world's societies that cannot find the proper housing and that cannot, with their limited resources, act as a party in the local construction market. These are societies that are experiencing at present fundamental tranformations in all the social, economic and cultural spheres. Following is an explanation of these dimensions:

A. Income Levels:

The prevalent income levels in the Egyptian society represent a social and economic dimension in the housing problem because families with low income represent more than 50 percent of the families in the Egyptian society. This is due to the low wages and the lack of work opportunities which are reflected in the standard of housing which a family budget can withstand on the one hand and in the widening gap between what the family can shoulder in return for housing on the one hand and the ownership installment or the economic rent value of the house it wants on the other hand.

B. Increased Marriage Rate:

Each marriage contract represents an urgent demand for an independent dwelling unit. Statistics indicate that the number of marriage contracts concluded in the republic in 1975 reached 384,000, compared to 339,000 in 1973. The number of these marriages in urban areas in 1975 was 155,000, or 40.3 percent. In rural areas, the number was 229,000, or 59.7 percent. The number of marriages was 10.3 per thousand of the total population in 1975, compared to 9.9 per thousand in 1974, and 9.4 per thousand in 1973. In 1975, marriages were 9.3 per thousand in urban areas, and 13.8 per thousand in rural areas.

1-3: Dimensions of Housing Problem

Statistical figures have shown that there are nearly seven million families in the republic, of which 3.2 million families or 46 percent live in urban areas, according to the 1976 census. By comparing the number of families with the number of apartments in the 1976 census, it became evident that there was a shortage of 555,000 apartments. If the required number of apartments needed to meet the population growth by 1980 is added to the aforementioned figure of 555,000 apartments, the present accumulation [shortage] would amount to 831,000 apartments. At the same time, the total number of apartments needed to replace old apartments by 1979 amounted to 393,000 units. The number of units needed to replace old ones by the year 2000 is estimated at 589,000 apartments.

On the basis of the current average family size, amounting to 5.2 members per family, and of an estimate of the number of families in the future and by assuming that an apartment will be made available to every family, then the number of apartments needed to face the population growth from 1976 to the year 2000 is 2.43 million apartments whereas the number needed to face these factors in the period from 1981 to the year 2000 is 2.18 million apartments approximately.

Thus, the volume of the problem is estimated at 3.6 million housing units needed to face the three factors of:

Making up for the current shortage of 831,000 units.

Replacing old units by the year 2000, a figure of 589,000 units.

Facing the population growth from 1981 to the year 2000, a figure of 2.18 million units.

Chapter Two: Proposed Housing Plan

Proposed Housing Plan

To meet the required housing volume, estimated at 3.6 million units by the year 2000, it is required that five-year programs be drawn up and put into implementation in the 1981-2000 period. Consideration has been given to starting these programs and plans in 1981 so as to provide the chance for the preparations necessary to undertake the tasks required by the first plan covering the 1981-85 period and to get the lands, utilities and other aspects connected with the housing issue ready. However, the situation also requires that urgent solutions be also drawn up without waiting for cooperation [sic] in order to confront the urgent problem in the 1979-80 period.

2-1: Urgent 1979-1980 Plan:

To make it possible to realize the goals of the urgent 1979-1980 plan, it is proposed that the plan include the following:

2-1-1: Start immediate adoption of all the practical means to prepare an urgent housing program to be implemented during the remaining part of 1979 and during 1980.

This is in addition to exerting efforts to complete all the operations already started, provided that consideration be given in designing the housing units included in the urgent plan to developed housing patterns that are low in costs and efficient to use and provided that the ideal economic method be followed in construction and building so as to make sure that the construction materials required are secured from the sources of wholesale production without the intervention of middlemen. Efforts should also be exerted to reduce costs as much as possible and, consequently, to supply the largest number of housing units possible in an urgent program to meet the requirements of those who are in the direst need of housing.

2-1-2: Give priority to encouraging the construction of more floors atop already existing low buildings with the capacity to support more floors, provided that the additional floors are built properly and according to designs compatible with the capability of the existing building to support these additions.

2-1-3: Prepare a quick executive program to start immediately the construction of housing complexes in the areas close to the population centers and already served by or close to the necessary utilities. This should be done for the low-economy and middle-income housing of both types A and B, provided that preparation of the blueprints for the new housing patterns be started immediately and provided that standard units and patterned models producing a cut in costs be taken into consideration.

2-1-4: Exert immediate efforts to prepare the lands for construction in new and complete population centers in close desert areas that are easy to supply with utilities, especially water and electricity, at the lowest costs possible. These new centers must also be supplied with partially paved roads to make them easily accessible for construction and building activities and to also make it easy to plant trees on the sides of these roads in the future.

Such areas, when trees are planted in them and when attention is paid to the distinctive architectural style that they can be given, can encourage many families with limited income, especially the families looking for a better life or newly formed families, to show big demand for them.

For the beneficiary masses to feel the efficiency of these small-size housing models for their ideal use, it is proposed that models of these houses be furnished according to an economic design providing for beautiful, simple and solid furniture so that it may provide an example for other beneficiaries to follow. It is proposed that these housing units be furnished according to a set pattern and by a furniture cooperative that undertakes this task so that the furniture styles may be compatible with the housing styles and with their efficiency for all purposes.

2-1-5: Start immediate preparation of the lands for the projects of the first phase of the plan contained in the national housing policy until the year 2000 and supply these lands with their utility requirements so that the first part of the lands may be ready with their complete blueprints as of the beginning of January 1981. However, consideration should be given to the importance of the lands' suitability for economic foundation so as to reduce the costs. Tree planting should also be started in the empty spaces so that the trees may grow with the rising buildings.

2-1-6: Continue the programs to bolster and set up plants producing construction materials so that their production may reach the limit compatible with the construction material needs in the housing construction plans, in addition to the needs of the other construction plans.

2-2: National Housing Plan

2-2-1: The proposed plan has been drawn up on the basis of meeting the housing needs in accordance with five-year programs implemented in the period from 1981 to the year 2000. Consideration has been given to a gradual annual increase [in housing construction] compatible with the targeted capacity of the construction sector, with the financial resources, with the construction materials and with the availability of labor. Consideration has also been given in this distribution [sic] to meeting the requirements needed to counter the population growth, in addition to the gradual elimination of the already existing shortages so that the public may feel a tangible improvement from year to year. Consideration has further been given to starting implementation of the proposed plan as of the beginning of 1981, provided that the state efforts be focused in the remaining part of 1970 and in 1980 on meeting the more urgent needs, namely the housing needs of those whose houses have collapsed and those with newly formed families.

This is in addition to gaining the confidence of the private sector and encouraging it to participate in solving the problem by eliminating all the work obstacles facing this sector, making land available, supplying it with the utilities and making construction and labor available, as will be noted later.

2-3: Cost of Proposed Housing and Services Plan for 1981-85

This plan provides for the construction of 675,000 housing units, along with the necessary service buildings linked with housing--especially in the new areas not supplied with such services:

Year	Number of Housing Units (in 1,000)	Average Unit Cost (in pounds)	Total in Million Pounds Including Housing and Services
1982	125	4,269	602

Important Observations: High Estimates of Plan Drawn Up on Following Basis:

Adoption of the system of standard units in design and the use of uniform units that bring about a drop in costs, along with innovating the means that realize streamlining the use of the available local resources.

The official prices of the basic materials have been calculated on the basis of the prevalent 1979 prices, especially insofar as the prices of cement, reinforcement iron and wood are concerned.

Taking into consideration development of the building and construction methods to face the ever-increasing needs to implement the plan and strengthening the construction companies by providing them with technical and administrative outfits they need and supplying them with equipment and machinery to speed up the construction process and to reduce the costs.

Securing all the construction materials needed in quantities that meet the plan's demands, in addition to the demands of the other building and construction plans.

2-4: Estimated Costs of Buildings for 1981 Housing and Services Plan:

To construct 110,000 housing units with the necessary service buildings connected with them:

Type of Unit	% of Unit	No. of units	Average Area of Unit (in sq. m.)	Average Cost Per Square meter (in pounds)	Total Costs (in 1,000 pounds)	Average Cost of Unit (in pounds)
Low-Income A	20%	22,000	45	45.8	45,342	2,061
Low-Income B	25	28,500	50	53.0	102,025	2,650
Middle-Income A	25	27,500	70	59.0	113,575	4,130
Middle-Income B	12	13,200	80	64.5	68,112	5,160
Above Middle-Income A	6	6,600	100	70.0	46,200	7,000
Above Middle-Income B	2	2,200	120	75.0	19,800	9,000
Total	100%	110,000			395,054	3,591.4
Total Calculated After Addition of 15 Percent in Costs to Meet Difference in Costs of Construction in Remote Locations					454,312	4,130.0

Service Buildings Connected With New Housing Centers and Required Per 1,000 Units:

Joint elementary school consisting of 20 classrooms and with an area of 1,500 square meters: 1,500x80=120,000 pounds

Mosque 650 square meters X120 [pounds]=72,000 pounds.[sic]

Social service buildings and business and craft shops 1,400 sq.m. X80=112,000 pounds.

Main Central Buildings 304,000 pounds.

Grand Total 608,000

Considering that these services will be set up only in new areas, it is estimated that only 60 percent of the housing units will require these services.

110,000 units X608,000 pounds X0,60=40,128,000 pounds. With the addition of a differential to meet the costs of construction in remote areas, the total sum required for implementing the 1981 housing and service plan amounts to nearly 530 million pounds.

2-5: Estimated Costs of Buildings for Years 1982-85 of Housing Plan:

Calculated in the same manner outlined in item 2-4, the costs of the buildings in the following years can be estimated at the following:

1982	nearly 603 million pounds
1983	nearly 650 million pounds
1984	nearly 690 million pounds
1985	nearly 770 million pounds

Total costs for all 5 years is nearly 3.25 billion pounds.

Consideration has been given to raising the estimates for each subsequent year in order to improve the possibility of completion and of carrying out some extra work to improve the housing conditions. Consideration has also been given in these estimates to raising the percentage of the necessary service buildings in the last year of the plan because such buildings are scheduled to be constructed in areas remote from the new population centers and in new cities.

Chapter Three: Requirements For Implementing Proposed Housing Plan

3. Requirements of Implementing Proposed Housing Plan (1981-2000)

To implement the proposed plan, it is necessary that the following requirements be estimated and supplied:

The lands needed to accommodate the housing volume proposed in the plan and the services necessary for it.

The public utilities necessary for the housing plan and their costs.

Development of the construction sector to enable it to undertake the tasks of the proposed housing plan and the other relevant activities.

The construction materials necessary for the housing plan and the means to secure them.

The sources for financing the first 1981-85 five-year plan.

This has been done in the following manner:

3-1: Land Requirements of Proposed National Housing Plan

3-1-1. To determine the land requirements for the 1981-2000 urban national housing plan on the premise of a population density of 25 units per feddan, or 125 persons per feddan, and assuming that the housing requirements by the year 2000 amount to 3.6 million units, then the land requirements amount to 144,000 feddans.

It is required that these needed lands be secured in the following spheres:

1. Lands within the populated areas in the governorates.

2. The proposed construction expansion around the major cities.

3. New cities.

3-1-2: The lands suitable for development in the planned cities, namely the greater Cairo province, the Alexandria province and the cities of Suez, Ismailia, Port Said, Bani Suwayf, Samnud and Asyut, have been estimated at nearly 38,190 feddans.

As for the new cities which it has been decided to build and which total nine cities, namely the cities of 10 Ramadan, 15 May, al-Sadat, al-'Amiriyah, four cities in the greater Cairo province and the city of New al-Fayyum, the areas of their lands amount 27,650 feddans.

Thus, the total area of the lands calculated so far amounts to 65,840 feddans capable of accommodating 1.6 million housing units. The remaining area needed to implement the 1981-2000 plan is 78,160 feddans. This area can be made available in the locations which will be developed outside the valley.

3-1-3: According to the studies conducted, the number of units called for in the first plan amount to 675,000 units which require 27,000 feddans.

It is proposed that these lands and units be distributed as follows in the future plan:

Year	Number of Housing Units (in 1,000)	Lands Required (in 1,000 feddans)
1982	125	5.0
1983	135	5.4
1984	145	5.8
1985	160	6.5
Total	675	27.0

By surveying the areas scheduled to be developed in the existing and planned cities during the first five-year plan, it has become obvious that it is possible to secure 11,010 feddans (as part of the 38,190 feddans already referred to).

As for the new cities, it is possible to secure 7,200 feddans during the first five-year plan (as part of the 27,650 feddans already referred to). This means a total of 18,260 feddans.

To make all the lands needed for the first plan available, it is thus required that nearly 8,740 more feddans be secured. These lands can be secured in the other governorates of the valley and in the new areas.

3-1-4: The basis and principles for selecting the lands and the elements that must be available:

First, the open spaces within the populated areas in the governorates:

These must be selected on the following basis:

A. Their proximity to the utility networks

B. Taking into consideration the population density averages in the areas surrounding them.

C. Preserving the cultivable area whenever possible.

Second, construction expansion around cities:

The following must be taken into consideration in selecting these lands:

Turning fundamentally toward the desert lands or the agriculturally unproductive lands.

B. Conducting studies for integration with a city's populated area.

C. Studying the road networks.

D. The capacity of the utility networks.

E. Conducting studies on the qualities of the soil.

Third, new cities:

The following must be taken into consideration in determining their locations:

A. The possibility of providing them with utilities economically.

B. Conducting studies on the qualities of the soil and the topography of the locations.

C. Their proximity to quarries.

D. Determining the area of each city in the light of a complete study of its economic components.

3-2: Estimates of Utilities Required by Proposed National Housing Plan

The comprehensive housing plan is based on constructing 3.6 million housing units by the year 2000. It is proposed that 675,000 units be built during the first five-year plan.

3-2-1: To estimate the utility requirements, the following principles and assumptions have been formulated:

A. The costs of the public utilities and their requirements will be estimated on the basis of the areas of land needed for the plan, their locations and their population density.

B. A total of 75 percent (20,250 feddans) of the lands required are located within existing developed areas and their expansion and having a population density of 140 persons per feddan, i.e. with a total population of 2,835,000 people.

C. A total of 25 percent of the required lands (6,750 feddans) are located within the new cities and with a population density of 80 persons per feddan, i.e. with a total population of 540,000 people.

This produces a general population density average of 125 persons per feddan.

3-2-2: Immediate Costs of First (1981-85) Plan:

By examining the data and studies received from the state sectors concerned and in light of the estimates on population density and land acreage, it has been possible to conclude the cost per person per utility on the basis of the 1979 prices and the total costs per person in terms of all the utilities (water, sewerage, electricity, roads, transportation and telephones) as follows:

A. A total of 360 pounds per person in the construction expansions within the populated areas.

B. A total of 720 pounds per person in the cities.

Thus, the total costs of the utilities amounts to:

A sum of 1,021,000,000 pounds in the populated areas and their expansions.

A sum of 388 million pounds in the new cities.

This produces total costs of 1,409,000,000 pounds, or nearly 1.41 billion pounds, distributed as follows over the various utilities:

	Costs (in one million pounds)
Roads	324
Drinking Water	238
Sewerage and Drainage	277
Electricity and Lighting	151
Telephones	307
Means of Transportation	112
Grand Total	1,409

3-2-3: Costs of Meeting Existing Shortage:

As a result of the comprehensive studies on the plans and of the data supplied to the committee, it has been possible to estimate the costs of the works needed to meet the existing shortage in the water, sewerage and electricity utilities--utilities which must be secured to make it possible to provide services to the housing proposed in the 1981-85 five-year plan, in addition to the costs of the immediate plan. These costs have been estimated as follows:

Utility	Costs of Meeting Shortage (in Million Pounds)
Water Utility	400
Sewerage and Drainage Utility	534
Electricity Utility	100
Total Costs of Meeting Shortage	1,034

This figure does not include any sums for the shortages existing in the telephone, transportation and road utilities.

3-2-4: Total Costs of Utilities for 1981-85 Five-Year Plan:

	In Million Pounds
A. Immediate Costs of Various Utilities (Roads, Drinking Water, Sewerage, Electricity, Telephones and Transportation	1,410
B. Costs of Meeting Existing Shortages in Water, Sewerage and Electricity Utilities	1,034
Grand Total	2,444

In light of the studies on the possibilities of implementation, it is proposed that the grand total be reduced by 10 percent. Thus, the grand total costs of the utilities amounts to 2.2 billion pounds.

3-2-5: Immediate Costs of 1986-2000 Plan:

After addition of the telephone services required according to the authority's [presumably telephone authority] plan, the total costs of the utilities per person in the expansions rise to 460 pounds instead of 360 pounds. Thus, the cost of the utilities in the new expansions amounts to 87,750X140X460=5,651,000,000 pounds.

The cost of the utilities in the new cities amounts to 29,250X80X720=1,685,000,000 pounds.

The grand total is 7,336,000,000 pounds or nearly 7.34 billion pounds.

The grand total of the immediate costs of the utilities plan and of the costs to meet the shortage in the first (1981-85) plan thus amounts to: 2,444+7,340 = 9,784,000,000 pounds.

This figure does not include the appropriations necessary to meet the current shortage in the telephones, roads and means of transportation.

3-3: Estimate of Requirements of Proposed National Plan in Construction Sector

3-3-1: In view of the fact that the volume of construction, including housing, amounts to nearly 45 percent of the development plan's investments, this makes clear the extent of the impact of the construction sector's capability on the economic and social development plans.

Following is a chart of the construction volume and housing volume in 1979 and in the first and last year of the 1981-85 five-year plan:

Year	Construction Volume (in million pounds)	Part Allocated for Housing (in million pounds)
1979	1,000	255
1985	2,220	770

To make it possible to meet the requirements of the ambitious housing plan seeking to build 675,000 housing units from 1981 to 1985, the housing volume in 1981, the first year of the plan, must amount to double the targeted volume this year (i.e. 530 millions to 255 millions).

This volume rises successively during the years of the plan which begins in 1981 with the construction of 110,000 units and ends in 1985 with the construction of 160,000 units.

This explains the importance of starting and speeding up the preparation bolstering and development of the construction sector in the remaining part of this year and in 1980 so that this sector may be able to meet the urgent housing requirements as of 1981 and so that it may, at the same time, be able to meet the construction requirements in spheres other than housing.

The housing policy seeks to develop the role of the private and joint sector in the contracts so that this role may amount to implementing 75 percent of the housing projects with the end of the 1981-85 five-year plan and so that the public sector companies may implement 25 percent of the housing projects, concentrated mainly in the low-economy housing.

3-3-2: Present Position of Construction Sector Companies:

The construction companies are divided into:

A. Contracting companies (public sector) controlled by the Ministries of Housing and Development, numbering 29 companies. These companies implement nearly 50 percent of the construction plan (these companies implemented in 1978 a work volume valued at 526 million pounds compared to a targeted volume of 462 million pounds, i.e. with an increase of 12 percent representing the rise in costs).

B. Contracting companies (public sector) controlled by the other ministries and agencies. These companies implement nearly 25 percent of the construction plan.

C. Contracting companies (private sector) and joint companies. These companies implement nearly 25 percent of the construction plan.

The current position of the public sector contracting companies can be summed up by stating that in their entirety, these companies carry out a work volume that exceeds the targeted volume. However, they face numerous obstacles that pose a threat to the existence of many of them, the most important being the obstacle of the severe shortage in monetary liquidity, the inability to collect the debts due them by others, amounting to 325 million pounds in 1978, and the shortages and bottlenecks in the main construction materials, such as cement and reinforcement iron. The deficit in the capital of these companies is estimated at 46 million pounds.

There also exists a vast disparity between the capabilities of these companies, considering that there are three major companies that carry out 50 percent of the total volume of work implemented by all the companies, numbering 29 companies. Moreover, the net assets of these three companies amount to 63 percent of the net assets of all the companies.

Moreover, the prefabricated housing plants, totaling 11 altogether, have not started practical production yet.

There is no doubt that these conditions must be remedied immediately so that production may be raised to realize the ambitious plans.

As for the private sector companies and contractors, it has become evident that their number amounts to 3,472 companies and contractors, most of them small contractors. A work volume amounting to 320 million pounds was entrusted to them in 1978, in addition to the joint companies. These companies undertake the construction of middle-income, above middle-income and luxury housing, as well as other projects. The volume of the work of the private and joint sector contractors amounts to nearly 25 percent of the total construction plan.

After examination of the method of assigning projects, it is proposed that the methods of bids and of assigning be combined when necessary.

3-3-3: Determination of Goals Required of Construction Sector:

The requirements of the construction plans until the year 1985 have been calculated generally, with stress on the requirements of housing in the same period. Following is a summary of these two plans:

Year	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985
Housing Plan	530	603	650	690	770
Construction Plan in Spheres Other Than Housing	700	800	940	1,070	1,770
Total Construction Volume (in million pounds)	1,230	1,403	1,590	1,760	2,220

A detailed study on labor, equipment and material requirements has also been conducted.

Concerning Skilled Labor:

The skilled labor currently available in the sphere of construction amounts to 250,000 workers. This figure must be raised to reach 660,000 workers in 1985, as will be pointed out later.

Concerning Equipment:

It is proposed that 600 million pounds be appropriated for developing and bolstering the equipment resources during the 1981-85 plan, provided that the appropriations start with 100 million pounds for 1981 and that they be raised gradually to 140 million pounds in 1985 to meet the requirements of the construction plans (estimated at 1979 prices).

In light of the proposed percentage of the housing levels (55 percent low-economy housing, 38 percent middle-income housing and eight percent above middle-income housing), on the basis of the average prices prevalent at the start of this year and in light of the architectural patterns proposed by the Committee for Housing Designs, the costs of the housing units in the 1981-85 plan have been estimated on the basis of certain percentile distribution between the public and private sector companies. The costs of public service buildings and the proper allowances for remote areas have also been added.

Following is a chart of the estimated costs of the 1981-85 housing plan, taking into consideration the gradual increase in the private sector's share in implementing the housing projects:

Year	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985
Number of Units (in 1,000)	110	125	135	145	160
Public Sector's Share of Housing Plan [presumably in million pounds]	150	160	170	180	190
Private Sector's Share of Housing Plan [presumably in million pounds]	380	443	480	510	580
Total Cost of Plan	530	603	650	690	770
Percentage of Public Sector's Share to Total	28%	27%	26%	26%	25%

3-3-4: Developing Construction Sector to Meet Plan Requirements

For the construction sector to be able to shoulder its part in implementing the plan, it is proposed that the following important measures be taken:

First, regulation of construction companies' activities:

For the construction sector to be able to perform its part in implementing the plan, it is required that:

A. Balance and equal opportunities be realized in assigning works to the companies so as to make it possible to exploit all the resources and to create competition in order to control the prices through limited bid invitations offered to each group of companies within their field of specialization and their capabilities and in light of the geographic location of these companies' operations.

B. Participation by the public sector companies in the low-economy housing projects when necessary through direct assignment, provided that the volume of work assigned is compatible with the capability of each company and is in accordance with prices studied in advance.

C. Bolster capabilities of infrastructure and sanitary works companies.

D. Encourage the private sector to take part in the finishing work necessary for the housing projects.

E. Organize the economic units technically, financially and administratively.

F. Correct the capital of the public sector companies and strengthen them financially.

G. Set up a stable central national construction agency and determine its powers to make them compatible with the requirements of implementing the construction plans scientifically.

Second, development of construction methods to raise productivity:

It is necessary to develop the performance regarding the quarrying, land survey, soil research, soil works, concrete and iron works, bindings, building works and finishing works.

Special stress must be laid on mechanization in construction work and coordination must be established among the research, designing, manufacturing and building agencies. The importance of mechanization as a basis for the development is underlined in view of the expected labor shortage compared to the volume of the plan.

Coordination among the research, designing, manufacturing and building agencies should be established through drawing up standard specifications for all construction and complementary work, through taking maximum advantage of the available local [construction] materials and raw materials and through developing the tile industry and the plastics industries for the production of electrical appliances, bathroom appliances and sanitary appliances in order to do away with importation gradually.

This is in addition to raising productivity through a scientific management of the work sites, through developing the wage system and through paying attention to the controls necessary to realize a balance in these wages. It is also necessary to set standard performance rates and to pay attention to the cost [accounting] systems and to the controls necessary to curtail the rise in prices.

Third: prefabricated buildings industry:

As for the 11 plants for the production of prefabricated houses that are owned by the companies of the Ministries of Housing and of Development and that have cost 60 million pounds, their entire work is based on producing large size and heavy supporting walls. The operation of these plants has been started and their production is still very limited in comparison to what was targeted for them.

From reviewing the system of producing supporting walls, it has become evident that this type of production is highly costly in comparison to other types, in addition to the presence of obstacles that face these plants.

Fourth, labor:

As for skilled labor and craftsmen in the construction sector, a complete plan has been proposed to meet the requirements of the current phase, to overcome the existing shortage in craftsmen, to provide specialized training to prepare supervisory and executive elements and to outline the forms of international cooperation in this sphere.

Following is a summary of this plan:

Year	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985
Skilled Workers Needed for Plan (in 1,000)	300	350	420	480	450	600	660
Number of Instructors Needed to Provide Training	700	1,000	1,400	1,400	1,400	1,400	1,400
Total Financial Requirements of Plan (in million pounds)	10	16	16	13	8	8	8

It is proposed that the construction training setup controlled by the Ministry of Development be bolstered and developed or that it be turned into a public authority with full powers to supervise and develop the training activity so as to meet the plan's requirements, to study the labor market in the Arab and African states and to take part in linking technical and university education with the actual needs of the construction sector.

3-4: National Plan's Requirements of Construction Materials

3-4-1: The percentage of construction materials in construction components varies according to the type of project. At the general average, this percentage amounts to the equivalent of 30 percent of the construction investments in the plan and nearly 45 percent of the construction investments in housing. Perhaps this makes clear the special importance of the materials which affect directly implementation of the national plan generally and of the housing projects in particular. As a result of the presence of numerous bottlenecks in construction materials in recent years, there has been extreme instability in the programs for the implementation of projects and, consequently, schedule overruns. It can be said as an estimate that the construction capacity could have been raised by no less than 15 percent if the construction materials had been available at the right time.

One of the main factors causing the emergence of those bottlenecks was the failure to provide the investments necessary to preserve the capacity of the plants producing the main and predominant materials, such as iron, cement and cinder blocks, not to mention the failure to secure the investments necessary for the expansions needed to increase production to meet the rising requirements of the development plans. As a result of this situation, the state has incurred big financial burdens in free currencies to import the needed materials. This trend will continue for a while and until the replacement and expansion projects for the production of various materials are carried out.

3-4-2: Estimate of Areas of Housing and Service Buildings in 1981-85 Plan:

On the basis of an average housing unit area of the various types of housing scheduled to be built according to the proposed plan, the total acreage for housing, in addition to the acreage needed for the services required by this housing, has been calculated and the figures have amounted to what is shown in the following chart:

Total Acreage for Housing and Services in 1981-85 Plan:

Total Area in Square Meters, Including Area for Services	6,610,000	7,510,000	8,110,000	8,710,000	9,620,000

3-4-3: Estimate of Volume of Construction Materials Needed for 1981-85 Five-Year Housing:

To estimate the volume of the needed materials, the main construction materials needed for constructing 100 square meters of housing and service buildings have been calculated. By applying these calculated figures to the areas and buildings already defined, the quantities of the basic materials necessary for housing construction during the years of the plan have been estimated. The volume of these basic materials amounts to the following:

Volume in Millions

Material	Unit	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985
Gravel	Cubic meters	2,664	3,004	3,244	3,484	3,848
Sand	Cubic meters	2,975	3,280	3,650	3,920	4,330
Cement	Tons	1,322	1,502	1,622	1,743	1,924
Reinforcement Iron	Tons	0,152	0,173	0.186	0,200	0,221
Cinder Blocks	Units	594.0	676.0	730.0	784.0	866.0 [sic]

3-4-4: Study on Construction Materials Situation:

The construction materials situation has been studied in three groups as follows:

A. First group, namely the natural construction materials including sand, gravel, natural stones, basalt, granite and marble.

These materials are available in abundance in numerous parts of the country. However, the major part is still produced in primitive manual methods and it is necessary to begin the use of modern mechanized means of quarrying, whether in terms of breaking, cutting, shaking [sic] or transportation, so as to acquire products with qualities compatible with the standard specifications, that help to raise the standard of implementation and that improve the economics of operation, especially in regard to the use of reinforced cement which requires good gravel of various sizes.

B. Second group, including the main manufactured materials including reinforcement iron, cement, cinder blocks, wood, lime, gypsum, glass, clay piping, non-metal sanitary appliances, porcelain tiles, ceramics, cast iron piping and galvanized iron piping.

A survey has been conducted on the production volume and consumption volume of these materials. The current production, in addition to the [future] production of the projects under implementation and the projects on which agreement has been reached will be enough to meet the plan's requirements of all materials, except for reinforcement iron, cement, wood, cinder blocks and cast iron piping.

Following are the details concerning these materials:

3-4-5: Reinforcement Iron:

This material is not just one of the predominant materials in the construction industry but is also one of the general strategic materials. It has become evident from the statistics that there will be a constant shortage in the production of reinforcement iron throughout the years of the plan. The shortage will be as follows:

In 1,000 Tons

Index	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985
Total Local Production	280	325	325	385	528	965	1,155
Requirements	624	690	760	837	920	1,000	1,105
Shortage or Surplus	-344	-365	-365	-452	-392	- 35	+ 50

The currently available steel rolling [al-darfalah] capabilities will start production at full capacity as of 1982 and will realize maximum capacity in 1982 as a result of the start of production by the fourth furnace in the Steel and Iron Complex.

Another increase in production will appear in 1984 as a result of the new al-Dakhilah project and without the addition of any new production lines to the existing plants. It is worth noting that there was a plan for a new project in al-Sadat City--al-Khatatibah previously--with a production capacity of 400,000 tons. Work on this project was stopped due to the shortage of stocks ['uruq] in the production of the Hulwan plants.

In view of the fact that the costs of local production are still lower than the price of imported iron, it is required that the expansion projects be reconsidered and expedited, especially since the fourth furnace in the Iron and Steel Complex has been put into operation and has added 600,000 tons to the annual production capacity. It is required that the project for the production of rolled iron in al-Sadat City, with its annual production capacity of 400,000 tons annually, be expedited. This should be done in addition to implementing the steel and iron complex in al-Dakhilah (a project with a production capacity of 700,000 tons annually). Consideration should also be given to adding new iron rolling lines to the existing plants.

It is to be noted that an imported ton of reinforcement iron costs nearly 350 dollars at present whereas the investment required to produce a ton of this kind of iron is 1,000 [figure as published] dollars only.

3-4-6: Cement:

Cement is the overwhelmingly predominant material in the construction industry generally and in housing in particular. The cement industry in Egypt is one of the old industries in which we have formed numerous specializations and experts. However, in the past 10 years, the investments necessary to preserve or enhance the capacity of the existing plants to meet the needs of the development plans and to produce a surplus for exportation have not been available.

The following chart shows the production, requirements, shortage and surplus in the 1979-1985 period:

Volume in Million Tons

Index	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985
Total Production of Plants	3.600	4.500	5.950	9.010	11.650	15.150	15.600
Demand	6.432	7.072	7.432	8.064	8.760	9.488	10.312
Shortage or Surplus	-2.832	-2.572	-1.483	+0.946	+2.890	+5.662	+5.288

In view of the importance of planning for this vital commodity, it is proposed that stress be laid on the following elements influencing the cement industry:

A. A sound economic situation requires that a general plan be formulated for the locations of the new cement plants, taking into consideration the availability of raw materials, consumption areas, environmental protection and transportation potentials. The proximity of plants to populated areas affects not only man's health but also affects crops. Moreover, such proximity adds a heavy burden which the road networks cannot handle.

B. It is necessary to continue implementation of the projects for which contracts have already been concluded and the new expansion projects according to the schedules agreed upon because it is noticed that there has been a delay in implementing the current projects. Such delay results in enormous financial burdens. In 1979, a million tons valued at 100 million dollars at the import price were calculated [sentence as published].

C. Postpone scrapping [takhrid] any of the furnaces currently in operation when production reaches the point of exceeding the local consumption needs because these furnaces, despite their low productivity, still produce cement at a much lower cost than that of imported cement.

The investment required to produce a ton of cement amounts to nearly 150 dollars at the current prices.

3-4-7: Cinder Blocks:

Cinder blocks are the basic material for the construction of walls. The main variety produced so far is still the red brick. Before construction of the high dam, the production of this variety of bricks depended mainly on the silt carried by the Nile River flooding. This source has been cut off now and, consequently, the brick plants have resorted to scraping off top soil from cultivable lands or to gathering this type of soil from the islands in the Nile River. Such practices pose a grave danger to the agricultural resources and to the fertility of the soil.

The tendency to produce alternatives to red bricks in the preceding period has been very slow and this has led to the serious present situation which must be tackled with all the means possible.

The construction of plants producing calcareous sand bricks and clay bricks as alternatives to red bricks has started recently. The following chart shows the production of the various types of bricks, the demand volume and the shortage in the 1979-1985 period:

Volume in One Million Bricks

Index	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985
Total Production of All Types	2,389	2,574	2,978	3,365	5,340	3,665	3,705
Demand	3,152	3,465	3,642	3,951	4,292	4,649	5,053
Deficit	763	891	664	586	752	984	1,348

It is evident from this chart that there will be a serious shortage in production throughout the years of the plan. Considering that it is unreasonable to import bricks from abroad and that the mere transportation of bricks for long distances internally is uneconomical, it is necessary to expand the production of brick alternatives, the most important being:

A. Clay bricks for which the raw materials are abundantly available in the various parts of the country.

B. Calcareous sand bricks for which the raw materials are also easily available in most of the governorates.

C. Gypsum blocks and slabs as a by-product of the gypsum plants.

Insofar as production is concerned, the production that will be turned out by the existing red brick plants after they are developed to use desert clay instead of clay from cultivable lands has also been taken into account. The inclination toward this development must be encouraged with all the means, including facilitating the financing necessary for the private sector plants to introduce this development. These plants produce 1.8 billion bricks annually. The investment necessary to produce 10 million bricks from desert clay amounts to one million pounds whereas investment necessary to develop the local red brick plants amounts to nearly 100,000 pounds for every 6 million bricks.

3-4-8: Wood

The country depends fundamentally on importing the wood necessary for various kinds of uses. The 1978 consumption amounted to 950,000 cubic meters of various kinds of wood which can be divided into three categories:

First category: This category concerns the types used in construction work and includes the wood used for bindings [al-shaddat] and scaffolding in which the (filirian, white, latzana and muski) veins are used.

Second category: This category concerns the types of wood used for the production of doors and windows and building requirements for which the (muski), Swedish, (ablacage) wood and bamboo are used.

Third category: It concerns the types of wood used for furniture, including bamboos, (kunter, ablacage) and various types of veneer. There are other types of wood such as the (aru), Turkish walnut wood, oal wood, mahogany, (al-tabk), (al-'azizi) and (al-binu) wood varieties. These are types of wood used for various special purposes.

As for granulated [al-habibi] and plywood, they are also used in wood bindings and in the production of some types of inexpensive windows and furniture. The local production capacity of these types of wood is as follows:

Plywood Plant in al-Mansurah	9,000 tons
Plywood Plant in (Farskur)	6,000 tons
Granulated Wood Plant in Kawm Ambu	13,000 tons
Granulated Wood Plant in Tanta	10,000 tons
Grand Total	38,000 tons

There are proposed plans to raise the capacity of these plants by 58,000 tons. But it is necessary to exert efforts to develop these plants and to treat (their products) with special chemicals to expand their uses and to enhance their durability.

It is expected that the total requirements of the 1981-85 plan of the various kinds of wood will amount to nearly 6.5 million cubic meters (i.e. an average of 1.3 million cubic meters annually).

It is necessary to exert efforts to produce local alternatives to the imported kinds of wood, such as metal bindings instead of the (filirian) veins, aluminum windows and partitions instead of wooden ones and alternatives for other uses.

3-4-9: Cast Iron Piping:

This type of piping is used for sanitary drainage works. Even though many countries have begun to produce plastic piping as an alternative, this kind of production has not been introduced in Egypt on a broad scale yet. Cast iron piping is produced fundamentally by the plants of the Cairo Metal Products Company, the Delta Steel Company and al-Nasr Cast-Iron Products Company, in addition to a number of small private sector companies. The following chart shows the production and the requirements throughout the years of the plan:

Volume in 1,000 Tons

Index	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985
Total Production (Public & Private Sector)	21	24	27	28	29
Requirements	30.9	35.1	37.95	40.8	45
Deficit	9.9	11.1	10.95	12.8	16

Enough cast iron piping is imported at present to make up for the annual deficit in production. It must be noted that the production of some companies in the private sector does not meet the specification, that it is produced in primitive ways and that the use of this production results in damage to buildings. Therefore, it is necessary to give consideration to raising the production of the existing plants whose products meet the standard specifications in order to make up for the apparent deficit.

The investments needed to produce a single ton of cast iron amount to 500 dollars.

3-4-10: Floors [al-ardiyat]:

It is proposed that the production of Canaltex Company and of the private and joint sectors be raised to reach one million square meters annually as of 1985. This requires an investment of 4.8 million pounds, of which 3.3 millions are in foreign currency.

3-4-11: Paints:

The country still imports the needed volume of paints exceeding the local production. The following chart shows the total local production, the requirements and the annual deficit during the years 1979-1985:

[No Unit Given]

Index	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985
Total Production	22,500	30,000	32,500	32,500	32,500	32,500	32,500
Deficit	6,750	3,640	6,200	11,990	18,670	26,340	35,170

It is proposed that the deficit be made up for through encouraging the private and joint sectors to set up plants for the production of paints, varnish and (ratinjat), keeping in mind that the average investment needed for the production of a single ton [of paint] amounts to nearly 360 pounds.

3-4-12: Miscellaneous:

What is meant here are the various metal pieces necessary for the operation [sic] of windows and doors. (Sabi) Company turns out nearly 80 percent of local production and the rest is produced by small and scattered shops in the private sector.

It has been impossible to survey this miscellaneous production or the volume imported. However, the initial figures indicate that to meet the major part of the plan's requirements, it is necessary to double Sabi's production. It has actually become evident that this company has the potentials for such expansion. An investment of 3 million pounds, 20 percent of them in local currency, is needed for this expansion. This investment should start with an appropriation of one million pounds in 1980.

3-4-13: Requirements in Sanitary Appliances:

The country is experiencing big difficulties as a result of the failure of the locally produced sanitary appliances to meet the standard specifications, especially faucets and flush tanks that get damaged quickly, thus causing an excessive water consumption and the subsequent abnormal pressure on the sanitary sewerage networks and damage to installations.

Sabi Company is one of the few sources that produce these requirements according to the standard specifications. However, the company's production of these types of appliances, amounting in value to 200,000 pounds in 1978, represents only a very small part of the requirements. The rest is produced by small plants and foundries owned by the private sector. These plants and foundries often fail to observe the standard specifications.

Therefore, Sabi's production must be raised in accordance with the discussions held with the company's management. The production of certain essential kinds of appliances must be raised to meet all the local needs.

3-4-14: Glass:

The state is still importing to meet its annual needs of glass. The following chart shows the annual production and the country's needs during the years of the plan:

Volume in 1,000 Tons

Production	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985
Shubra al-Khaymah Plant		23	23	23	23	10	20
10 Ramadan Plant (New)	-	-	-	-	30	60	75
Total	23 [sic]	23	23	23	53	70	95
Country's Needs	51	54	57.5	61	65	69.5	85
Deficit or Surplus	-28	-31	-34.5	-38	-12	+0.5	+10

To produce the glass needed during the years of the plan, it is necessary to make the appropriations necessary to implement the new glass production project in the 10 Ramadan City--appropriations amounting to nearly 70 million pounds, of which 40 millions are in foreign currency--to make it possible to meet the country's needs and to stop importation.

3-4-15: The investments needed to produce the main construction materials have been increased. The increase has included the projects under construction, the projects under study and the projects needed to meet the plan's requirements.

MUSLIM LEAGUE RAPS QADHDHAFI

Jiddah ARAB NEWS in English 22 Oct 80 p 1

[Text]

MENA, Oct. 21 (SPA) — The Muslim World League issued a statement here Tuesday vigorously condemning President Muammar Qaddafi of Libya for attacking the Kingdom and belittling the value of the pilgrimage.

The constituent assembly of the league categorically rejected Qaddafi's claims made during a speech in his country recently, that the United States was occupying the holy places in the Kingdom and that its warplanes were overflying the holy places. "The only planes that were seen over the areas were helicopters flown by Saudi Arabian pilots," the statement said.

It condemned Qaddafi's sarcastic remarks about the pilgrimage and reiterated the significance of the ritual as one of the fundamental pillars of the faith.

"The members of the assembly strongly denounce the allegations made by Qaddafi which have nothing to do with the facts," the statement said. "His claims that the holy places of Mecca and Medina were occupied are totally unfounded as two million pilgrims, including those from Libya, have seen for themselves. Nor were there any American planes screaming over Mecca, Medina and Arafat as he claimed.

"The assembly denounces the use of Islamic sacred places in political controversies and slander matches because such use will hurt the feelings of Muslims and create doubts and dissension as well as offend the reputation of Islam. His attack on the pilgrimage and his ridiculing of the rites are a clear transgression of the holy rites of Islam as if Qaddafi denied the word of God who exhorted the people to uphold his rites and seek his forgiveness.

"Such pronouncements are unfit to be made by the head of a state whose people have been known for their religious zeal and heroic struggle for the sake of Islam over the ages.

"His appeal for jihad, holy struggle, to liberate the holy places from the Americans and Christians as he claimed, instead of peforming the pilgrimage, is a call to suspend the holy rite behind a false screen in the name of jihad.

"He also attempts to incite bloodshed of Muslims in the holy months in the holy places of this holy land. His call is also aimed at diverting the attention and efforts of Muslims from their main battlefield, to liberate Palestine and the holy city of Jerusalem from zionist occupation.

"Qaddafi should have appealed to the Islamic states of Iran and Iraq to stop fighting and unite their resources and those of other Muslims to liberate the occupied lands."

The assembly appealed to all Muslim leaders to strive for the unification of Muslims to help those Islamic nations which are subject to aggression everywhere.

The statement was signed by 31 members from Saudi Arabia, Nigeria, Singapore, Cameroon, Egypt, Palestine, Pakistan, the United Arab Emirates, Morocco, Uganda, Afghanistan Kashmir, Mali, Niger Sudan Jordan, Upper Volta, Gambia, Nepal, Qatar, Kuwait, Tunis, Mauritania, Burma, Libya, Chad and Bahrain.

NATIONAL SYRIAN SOCIAL PARTY CHIEF INTERVIEWED ON LEBANON

Kuwait AL-RA'Y AL-'AMM in Arabic 26 Aug 80 pp 18-19

[Interview with Chief of National Syrian Social Party In'am R'ad by Salih Qallab; date and place not given]

[Text] "In'am R'ad in Lengthy Interview with AL-RA'Y AL-'AMM; Sarkis Followed Erroneous Course in Dealing with Crisis; He Tried To Throw Ball in Court of Syria and National Movement; Al-Huss, Karami, Malik Salam Are National Movement's Candidates for Prime Minister; We Reject the Accord That Constitutes Cover for Zionist Sympathizers; Sarkis Vetoed Most Successful Lebanese Prime Minister; We Are in Process of Formulating National Position Again; We Will Fight To Defend Every Inch of Lebanon."

The National Syrian Social Party elected In'am R'ad its new president early this August. He will succeed Dr 'Abdallah Sa'adah who is devoting himself to national missions outside organizational frameworks.

In'am R'ad is a well-known figure who needs no introduction. In addition to being one of the deputies of the chairman of the National Movement's Central Political Council, he has played a very prominent role throughout the last harsh years in Lebanon.

Before that In'am R'ad was known as a strong and an unyielding fighter. He moved from one location to another and from one sector to another in the battle for national and democratic struggle. Because of his clear positions he was harassed, and most Arab borders were closed to him.

In addition to this, In'am R'ad is known for meticulously keeping up with matters and for assuming positions. He is famous for not subjecting judgements to abstract logic despite the fact that he is a lawyer. R'ad subjects his judgements to the circumstances of concrete material facts which are consistent with the supreme national and pan-Arab interests.

If an interview with In'am R'ad always assumes the quality of universality and produces something new with every time, an interview with him at this stage assumes its importance from the fact that the man is in a position of responsbility. He is one of those who are privy to the secrets of affairs, and he is one of those who take part in making decisions. In this interview which was conducted with him by AL-RA'Y AL-'AMM In'am Ra'd speaks with considerable candor and clarity. When he talks, he always tends to gather information. He is not satisfied with analysis. Therefore, what he said [in the interview] appears like a storehouse of information that allows the observer and the reader to draw [his own] conclusions and positions.

[Question] It is being said that the current crisis of government is the prelude to the coming presidential battle. What is your opinion of the National Movement?

[Answer] The [factor] which prescribes the organization of government or sets forth the crisis of government transcends this political emergency, if one may use that term. The [factor] which prescribes a governmental crisis lies in the continued absence of a solution to a set of questions and problems, and that leads to the destruction of the legitimate authority in Lebanon and to the fragmentation of the unity of its land, its people and its institutions.

These are the questions that were presented in the initiative of the Lebanese National Movement a few months ago. They were adopted by the president in the message in which he proclaimed what was described as indisputable principles concering the pan-Arab identity of Lebanon and its Arab commitment. [The president] rejected all forms of division and affirmed the unity of Lebanon and all the other principal questions as well.

The principles of national accord have suffered a major setback because it is not enough to proclaim those principles as theoretical indisputable principles and then to contradict them in practice, in fact, on the field. This is actually what happened with the establishment of the divided forms of the Phalangist state.

Defining one's position vis-a-vis this phenomenon has become the standard for gauging the credibility of the principles of accord on the one hand, as well as the credibility of the legitimate government's commitment to the principles it proclaimed. And yet, there is now a huge gap between the principles of accord and practices, as compared with those who voilated the principles of accord.

This is the actual crisis of the government; it goes beyond government organization.

Therefore, when the file of the recent government crisis was opened, our party had a specific position. We emphasized these questions, and we refused involvement in the ministerial fair beyond the questions and beyond how to solve and realize them.

We considered, or rather, we proclaimed the two slogans of accord, whatever the case may be, leading to a government of activitis to be leading not to a solution but rather to the continuation of the crisis. What is required is a solution to the crisis. Accordingly, it was our opinion to harden the national position, not for the purpose of escalating the crisis, but rather because the purpose of this hardening is to achieve correct solutions to the crisis instead of continuing to [come up with] stopgap solutions. The majority of the Lebanese people who reject partition and Zionism must resolve again their public will to prescribe to the government a formula of government that would oppose the distasteful divisive forms that appeared after the 7 July massacre in some areas that are under the control of the Phalangist militias. Otherwise, embracing these forms without impairing them and bringing their advocates to government would be a course in the same mode that is being proclaimed by some Arabs under the slogan of Arab solidarity. This is the course through which those Arabs are trying to restore al-Sadat to the Arab rank.

Embracing treason cannot be construed as solidarity just as embracing Zionism and partition cannot be construed as national accord. This is our view of the basic questions in the Lebanese crisis which, as I said, may be reflected on the next president. However, this is not the basis [for the crisis]; the basis is the objectivity of these questions which constitute the features of the Lebanese crisis and how it is to be confronted.

[Question] On this basis do you believe that the government crisis will be prolonged?

[Answer] The Lebanese crisis is lengthy, but the government's crisis may be shortened if we were to bring a government that would confront the Lebanese crisis. This is the sound premise: to select persons in relation to the questions. Our hope would then be great for solving the questions. If we were to bring [to government] a homogeneous working team on the basis of a program for solving these questions, these questions will be solved.

This is the formula as we see it from here. We insisted that we begin with the subject of the prime minister after we complete a redefinition of the questions because the prime minister symbolizes the government.

We may be asked, "Why do we want to redefine the questions since they have been defined in the president's message and in the principles of accord with which you began?"

We would say because new facts have emerged on the scene. The position vis-a-vis these facts must be redefined; a detailed program must be designed; and a prime minister must be brought who can confront these questions and adhere to this program.

In this context the names of three political figures emerge: Dr Salim al-Huss, Mr Malik Salam and Mr Rashid Karami. They can be listed in any order you wish to use, but these three names, in our opinion, are those which are suitable to [the task of] bearing the burdens of this stage.

[Question] It is believed that the purpose of the president's proposal of a government of political activists was to embarrass the National Movement and to embarrass Syria.

[Answer] President Sarkis is the president of the Republic of Lebanon. We are supposed to treat him with respect, but the political realities also require that we speak objectively in a manner that does not comply with anyone.

Our evaluation of President Sarkis's course is that it is erroneous. We told him so when we met him, and we also told the people throughout the year in the statements and announcements we made. First, President Sarkis used to start out by making a wager on the crisis in the entire area. Perhaps some of his advisers helped him in making such a wager.

It is our opinion that Lebanon has no choice in the matter of geography or in that of national destiny regarding the matter of determining its position vis-a-vis the crisis in the area. In his accord message President Sarkis ultimately came to proclaiming [Lebanon's] rejection of Camp David. This was a significant and a good state of affairs, but I believe that this rejection came very late, that is, approximately 1 year after the Camp David [accords] were announced. Lebanese policy, however, remained as though it were fluctuating between two positions. We support a Lebanese policy that adheres to our pan-Arab surroundings and our pan-Arab depth. That is, we support a policy that is totally allied with Syria and with the Opposition and Resistance Front.

We are saying that Lebanon cannot possibly dissociate itself from this pan-Arab commitment.

It is true that in return Lebanon did sacrifice more for the cause of nationalism in opposing the Zionist enemy. But this is an honorable [course] for Lebanon and something to its credit even though it represents a material, moral and a historical burden to it.

We are proud of all those who become victims and all those who lost their lives in battle; and we are proud of all the land that has been scorched. This is a very small price to pay for forging national freedom. If it is the historical and geographic destiny of Lebanon to have the battles of the pan-Arab question fought on its territory, this would be a great honor for it.

Implied in this commitment is an idea [for solving the crisis] other than that which states, "Let us use the hardships that Syria is facing and the difficulties that the resistance is facing to impose the de facto government that we wish."

We oppose such an opportunist policy because it departs from the essential commitment to pan-Arab destiny. This is not a commitment to accommodate. Official Lebanon may not continue to be accomodating on the pan-Arab question.

This is a basic point. A second point is the fact that whenever the Lebanese Front breaks up, President Sarkis tries to restore respect to it and to its remains on the basis of his view that these remains represent the political Maronites.

In this area we disagree with President Sarkis in this line of thinking. When the events began, the Lebanese Front did in fact represent Christian and Maronite clout. In this regard, however, we want to emphasize that a Christian majority had rejected the Lebanese Front since 1975. At the forefront of that majority was our Syrian National Social party which extends across all sects; its Christian base fought with heroism and with courage in the heart of al-Jabal.

But now the objective reality has changed to the better. The Lebanese Front broke up, and President Franjiyyah, who was its president and the president of the republic, dissociated himself from it because he has always chosen his pan-Arab and national commitment over any suspect relationship with the enemy; and the general staff of the front had become involved in such a relationship.

President Franjiyyah paid a high price for this national and pan-Arab commitment: his son, his family and the victims who lost their lives with him in the massacre.

President Franjiyyah was a power base in the Lebanese Front. The fact that he left the Lebanese Front and presided over the National Christian Group was a major gain for Lebanon and for Arabism. President Sarkis should have embraced this gain in the interests of legitimacy and the unity of Lebanon. However, President Sarkis and the legitimate government developed a Sulayman Franjiyyah complex, and this is a matter that boggles the minds and the hearts.

And here we can see how the Phalangists are devouring their Sham'un ally!

Notwithstanding our opinion and our evaluation of Sham'un and of the extent of his ties and because of the position we have taken on him, he is still in his course and in his conduct a member of the Lebanese Front. However, a bloody conflict did occur between him and the Phalangists. Consequently, the Phalangists became isolated in the face of a vast Christian majority.

Therefore, when President Sarkis sets forth [the notion of] a government of activists, he should not afterwards hesitate to place the Phalangists on one scale of a balance and all of Lebanon with its various parties, sects, political forces and activists on the other scale.

The Phalangists have become a party that controls two and one half districts of Lebanon. This party is deferred to on this basis. But if armed people do have clout, this is another matter. We believe that the clout which armed people have is not always in the interests of the Phalangists. The legitimate government is not supposed to evaluate matters on the basis of the power wielded by armed people, but rather on the basis of popular effectiveness.

We are saying that the vast majority of citizens in the areas which are controlled by the Phalangists are suppressed and repressed. It is the duty of the legitimate government to liberate them from this repression and this suppression. It has to crystallize their free will to support the unity of Lebanon's territory, its people and its institutions.

The sum total of this analysis leads us to conclude that proposing a government of activists was tantamount to closing the file of the 7 July massacre. This accordingly means--whether it was deliberate or nondeliberate, we do not address ourselves to intentions--that the legitimate government threw the ball in the court of Syria and the Lebanese National Movement.

From the beginning President Sarkis wavered around the person of the prime minister. The veto came from him and not from us because he was the one who vetoed the most successful prime minister in Lebanon's political history at this stage: Dr Salim al-Huss. He was the one who removed Prime Minister al-Huss and rejected the national names that were proposed afterwards to organize the government. He is the one who is responsible for the crisis and not those who had reservations on the government organization as it was proposed.

[Question] You are saying that President Franjiyyah's position is a great national and pan-Arab resource. Why did you not form with him a national rescue front for all of Lebanon?

[Answer] I believe that the statement which was issued from Ihdin and Tripoli following the visit of the Lebanese National Movement delegation and the meeting it had with President Franjiyyah and Prime Minister Karami did place the foundations for such a notion. Although we did not call this [assocation] a front, we considered it a national gathering that included the National Movement, President Franjiyyah and Prime Minister Karami.

The meeting defined political principles and a practical course for realizing common objectives.

It is natural [to ask] why did we delay until this happened. We are saying that an attempt was begun 2 years ago when Mr Walid Jumblatt, President Franjiyyah and Prime Minister Karami announced the Ihdin communiqué.

Although the Ihdin communiqué was brief and shorter than the joint communiqué that has now been issued, it did formulate basic assumptions for national cooperation or for a national gathering of this kind.

Then there were circumstances that killed this communiqué. This was announced previously by Mr Walid Jumblatt to AL-NAHAR AL-'ARABI WA AL-DUWALI because of a lack of follow-up.

but we have now reorganized everything on an objective basis in the light of a National Movement delegation such as the basic parties in the National Movement. Among them and at their forefront is the Socialist Progressive party.

I believe that in the next few days Mr Jumblatt, chairman of the Central Political Council of the National Movement and president of the Socialist Progressive party will visit Ihdin to meet with President Franjiyyah. Thus we see that steps are being taken towards the crystallization of this national gathering.

As the Social Syrian National party we have been establishing discretionary bilateral relations with President Franjiyyah for 2 years. As I said we consider him to be the head of this national Lebanese Christian gathering which is confronting the Phalangist, separatist, divisive project.

We are also in the same battle position with President Franjiyyah. His fighters and ours are standing [together] in al-Jabal, al-Matn, al-Kurah and as far away as Zgharta. This battle position is that of opposing the Zionist, divisive, separatist project.

[Question] Bashir al-Jumayyil is making daily threats that he will "liberate" all of Lebanon. Therefore, due to the gravity of this problem in the light of your understanding of it, will you oppose him with weapons?

[Answer] We responded to this question as a party in several basic and official statements that were issued in recent years. Among those statements was the speech I delivered at the graduation of the fighers of the Social National Syrian party in Upper al-Matn a few days ago. There was a clear definition of our course in that speech. As a Social National Syrian party and as a Lebanese National Movement we do not support an outbreak. We do support a political solution to the Lebanese crisis. We do support a return of normal life to Lebanon. As a party with an ideology, I believe that a political solution and a return to a democratic political struggle is in the interests of Lebanon because as I said in my speech at the graduation of a class of our fighters, we support a political because we want to return to those areas. We are confident that our people [who reside] in those areas which are controlled by Fascist terror and guerrilla terror are yearning for the return of this intellectual, ideological political struggle. Ultimately, our people will choose the idea that will unite them with the rest of their people; they will not choose the idea that would try to isolate them or divide them especially since that idea led to their destruction and led them to commit suicide in spite of themselves. We are confident that a good idea will win over an evil one. We are confident that good beliefs will win over evil beliefs. We are confident that the national question with its secular and social progressive content will win over racist and sectarian questions, and we are confident that democracy will win over terrorism and people will win over guerrillas.

For us, an outbreak is not imminent, and we oppose an outbreak. However, we will naturally not resign ourselves to Bashir al-Jumayyil's state if that state wanted to expand itself.

We are in a position of defending ourselves, and we will defend ourselves with the ferocity for which we have been known.

But we will not advance towards any area unless the people in that area rise up against their executioners. We would then be the reserves for those people to support their free will.

[Question] Through the developments that surrounded the resignation of Prime Minister al-Huss and the authorization of Taqiy al-Din al-Sulh [with the task of forming a government] we have noticed that positions within the National Movement via-a-vis this problem were dissimilar.

[Answer] I believe that you read [this] in the newspapers and [noticed it] in some of the meetings that took place between the leaders of the National Movement. This is based on an executive committee decision that was made by all the parties regarding the necessity of reformulating a unified position for the National Movement. Naturally, we believe that what happened--and may Brother Abu Shakir, Ibrahim Qulaylat, permit us to use an expression he had used at this stage by way of expressing an opinion. But if opinions were to go beyond the acceptable and reasonable, they would become disputes.

We look upon what brings us together in the National Movement to be above every secondary dispute and every secondary opinion. For this reason we are in the process of reformulating a standard position for the National Movement.

There was an opinion which stated that the advent of a government of activists would bring about the end of the separatist state. This is an opinion that is based on a nationalist assumption. It may be an erroneous opinion, but it has a nationalist basis.

In our judgment we may know more than what is known by [people in] those areas, where the Phalangist state is being established, that the security solution which President Sarkis was hinting at as part of a government of activists--that is, the army's advancement into al-Matn so as to separate Kasrawan from al-Ashrafiyah--was merely an apparent trick because the army is located in those areas. The army saw the massacres [that took place there], but it did not take action. The army saw the smuggling [that was going on] from Beirut to Juniyah, and it did not take action. The army has been surrounding the borders of the Phalangist compound, and it has been protecting it. This is not a matter of the army entering into an area, but it is rather a matter of army organization which allows that army to carry out a decision. Then it is a matter of a political decision made by the presdient to confront this divisive state and not to appease its advocates by bringing them into the government.

Perhaps it is our knowledge of what is happening in those areas that has prescribed our rigid position on this matter. Our purpose, as we said, is not to create a crisis, but rather to reach a correct solution so that we do not get trapped into the pitfalls of mirages and imaginary solutions.

[Question] Bashir al-Jumayyil waged a battle to liquidate Sham'un under the cover of security. There are those who are saying that if he succeeds in establishing security, he will throw the ball in the court of the National Movement, especially since the security situation in the western region is shaky.

[Answer] The truth is that we did suffer a great deal in the past years because we have been shouldering the moral responsibility but not the practical responsibility for the security that has eluded us. The nightmare that prevailed over our thoughts in general and then prevailed over the thoughts of some of us in particular was that we did not want to establish our own security and find ourselves involved in the game of partition and counter partition.

It is on this basis that we have always supported the legal government with its internal security forces and the Arab deterrent forces. These are the forces that were able to establish peace when they came.

But you will recall that the role of these forces began to shrink after the Bayt-al-Din conference. Consequently, they no longer had a free hand to impose security. Therefore, after the legal government began to refrain from using them adequately, they began to avoid what is called the long, narrow security line.

This situation with its returns recalled that of the national forces because on the one hand they do not use their adequate security and, on the other hand, because security was no longer stable.

Therefore, we are in the course of formulating a new view of this matter, and we are coordinating [our efforts with those] of the Arab deterrent forces and the other legal forces such as the internal security forces.

I would like to affirm that we frown upon security irregularities but that they are organized and institutionalized there. Theft and extortion are driving people away from their homes and all these matters are organized to the point that His Eminence the Maronite Patriarch condemned what was happening in those areas in several appeals he made.

Excesses are reprehensible in our area, and it is possible to suppress them if there is coordination between our national security--and I am not saying our own security [forces]--and the legal security [forces] which we consider to be the basis.

[Question] Developments in South Lebanon indicate that there are possibilities for creating further tension in security. Do you expect the problem of South Lebanon to be tied to the question of the Middle East? What measures will you take [in this regard] as a national movement with a commitment to this part of the Lebanese homeland?

[Answer] There is a general view and there is information regarding an expected Israeli attack. Some are saying it will come before the U.S. elections, and some are saying that it will come after the U.S. elections but that its purpose will be to establish new facts on the land.

Because we are a national party that views the scene in its entirety in relation to the consequences of what is happening on the Lebanese scene and the intended results of the conspiracy on the Jordanian scene, we do look upon the matter from this perspective: there is a relationship between an attack that is directed against Syria, the resistance and the Lebanese national forces here and proposing an addendum to Camp David on the Jordanian scene, not to mention the basic Israeli plan to impose an Israeli peace which is based on sectarian and racist outbreaks.

Two small states or military camps have so far been established. One is on the border strip, and the other is east of the capital and in part of al-Jabal. These two states are models of this mode whose prevalence in the area is being sought. In addition, there are the historical regional ambitions that the Zionist entity and the Zionist organization have entertained on our waters and especially the Litani River.

The National Movement and the Palestinian Resistance have the joint responsibility of defending every inch of South Lebanon. This is a matter that we are serious about. In 1978 we had the honor of fighting in the south in the heroic fierce battle which lasted for more than 1 week. It may have been on of the longest Arab wars.

We must mention in this regard the heroism of the Palestinian resistance which had the largest mobilization of forces that were engaged in combat. We cannot but mention with reverence also the steadfastness of the Lebanese national fighters in a number of advanced positions, and I mention on this occasion, Bint Jubayl and al-Khayyam where our party participated with its fighters.

Thus we are not incidental to the subject of the south, and our readiness for a confrontation is serious, but as I said the whole scene must be taken in its entirety.

[Question] Did you propose this matter to the Syrian brothers in the context of the confrontation front?

[Answer] We always have a strategic meeting with the brothers in Damascus, and we look into all the concerns and questions of the Lebanese scene either for national security against the Zionist enemy or for national security against divisive and destructive attempts.

[Question] You met with the Romanian ambassador some time ago, and there is talk about a Romanian initiative. Do you have knowledge of the substance of this initiative and what is your position on it as a party and as a national movement?

[Answer] I cannot speak for the National Movement on a foreign matter because this would require a decision from the National Movement as a whole. But I can speak for the party, and I do know that several parties in the National Movement have relations with the Romanian Communist party and also with the Palestinian Resistance.

His Excellency the Romanian ambassador did bring to me a handwritten message from President Ceaușescu congratulating me on his behalf and on behalf of the Central Committee of the Romanian Communist party on my election as party chairman. It was natural for me to thank him for this generous impulse, but we were careful in the statement that was issued by the party to indicate that the investigation dealt with the Romanian initiative from a rejectionist position. We had clearly affirmed that no initiative could be proposed before the Camp David accords and the Egyptian-Israeli treaty were scuttled. We also affirmed--and this is our position as a national party--that international pressure was to be exerted on the Zionist entity and not on the people of Palestine. We used the following expression: "It is the thief who must be put behind bars and not the one whose land has been stolen."

We said more than this in a statement to the press that was published in Lebanese newspapers. [We said that] ever since it was established in 1947, the Zionist entity has not been honoring international resolutions. These resolutions have therefore lost their value. Furthermore, this Zionist entity basically contradicts international, human and national rights. This is our position. We disagree with anyone who makes international initiatives, and we warn against them. But the fact that we disagree with foreign countries about their policies on the area does not mean that there be no dialogue with these countries, even if that dialogue were to begin with disagreement over these questions. It is known that we must refer to the fact that President Ceauşescu has amended his position in the last 2 years. This, however, does not mean that on our part we have accepted his position because we reject any initiative that stems from positions that [range from] supporting Camp David to saying that the Camp David accords are not adequate and to presenting alternatives to the accords. Naturally, we do not think that these alternatives meet [our] conditions, nor do we think them acceptable. But we must refer to the fact that this development has occurred, and we believe that it is occurring not only in Ceauşescu's position, but also in the European position. This development, however, was very insignificant, and this is because of the armed struggle that our people are engaged in in Palestine under the leadership of the PLO. This is the struggle that has gone beyond an armed struggle and has become the uprising of a people which scuttled the autonomy conspiracy and set forth new facts on the land.

We are saying that Bassam al-Shak'a's two legs and Karim Khalaf's leg have done much to alter some international balances and international convictions, even though these convictions have not yet reached the point of being acceptable to us.

But we must always affirm that it is national opposition and national warfare that changed these formulas. Therefore, this struggle must be escalated.

With regard to the reason why neither the European initiative nor the Romanian initiative reached an acceptable point, we believe that the Arabs did not use their real clout in the strategic balance. And here we hold the oil countries responsible in a major way for formulating an Arab strategy that would initiate attack and not retreat as is the case now.

[Question] In your discussion you talked about Jordan's role, and you referred to a solution on the Jordanian scene. Is there a specific idea for this solution which is being proposed on the Jordanian scene?

[Answer] This is a lengthy subject, but we can summarize it [by referring] to what we read about Shimon Perez's notion of such a solution. Perez's notion is not far removed from that of the United Kingdom or from Allon's project and other projects. In addition, most initiatives--European or Maronite--are directed towards Jordan. The case is the same with regard to the dialogue that took place between King Husayn and President Carter. Although that dialogue was based on disagreement over Camp David, it was conducted in the context of looking for another solution.

This other solution that they were looking for did not deal once with scuttling Camp David, but it was rather being discussed as though it were to complete Camp David. The completion of Camp David means falling into the conspiracy pothole.

It is because of our national responsibility that we are saying that it is very important to keep Jordan outside Camp David and its supplements. Despite the political differences between us and the Jordanian regime, we had no reservations whatsoever on having Jordan join the Baghdad summit to participate in the general Arab positions that condemned Camp David. There are, however, several questions that must be placed on record. These are:

First, why didn't Jordan go ahead with its unity with Syria? It is being said that the United States and Saudi Arabia exerted pressure on Jordan to pull Jordan out of these unity [schemes]. Had this unity been completed, Jordan would have been fortified in the positions of opposition.

Second, why is Jordan the existence of the Moslem Brothers and their setting out from Jordan to Syria?

Third, why is Jordan condoning the settlement?

Basically, Jordan has not said that it was rejecting Camp David in principle with regard to the normalization of relations with Israel; with regard to [the accords] being a peace treaty with the enemy; and with regard to the fact that [the accords] altogether scuttle the state of Palestinian affairs so as to propose inquiries around them.

To say that the Camp David [accords] are not enough, but that they may be completed by improving the conditions [of the accord] is a very serious statement. We appreciate the fact that Jordan has a long front with the enemy, and we appreciate the fact that Jordan needs support from its national heartland. However, instead of looking for international solutions to improve the conditions of the settlement, Jordan should have devoted its attention to how it could change the pan-Arab equation by uniting with Syria. This would have strengthened Jordan and made its long borders the same as those of the united Syrian army, of the Syrian air force and of the Syrian forces.

This qualitative move has not taken place. In its absence all the pitfalls exist; they are relevant, and they are moot as I have indicated.

BRIEFS

ARAB LEAGUE-EEC MEETING—Yesterday at the league's office, League of Arab States Secretary General Chedli Klibi received Mr Michel Courtier, the European Communities Commission delegate in Tunis, who came to say goodbye on the occasion of the completion of his mission in Tunisia. "We spoke," he said, "of current relations and particularly of the development of relations in terms of the European-Arab dialogue, resumption of which is hoped for on both sides." He added that he had looked into cooperation between the two shores of the Mediterranean with the secretary general of the League of Arab States, this cooperation being "a challenge and a source of reflection with an eye to enabling that sea to deliver a new message to the world at this level of north-south relations in the Mediterranean." Then Mr Chedli Klibi received Mr Nelson Hernandez, the Venezuelan ambassador to Tunis, who indicated that this meeting, which he described as friendly, had permitted him to engage in an exchange of views on the world situation with the secretary general of the pan-Arab organization. After stating that the establishment of peace is the goal sought by the Venezuelan Government and the countries that constitute the League of Arab States, Mr Nelson Hernandez said: "We have agreed to go on to a broader exchange of views among our nations since, as an OPEC member, Venezuela has many contacts with the Arab world." PRELIMINARY ALGERIAN-TUNISIAN MEETING—A delegation of highly-placed Tunisian business leaders headed by Mr Moncef Belaid, director general of industry attached to the Ministry of Economy, visited in Algiers from 6 to 9 October. During its stay in Algeria, this delegation was received by Messrs Mohamed Liassine and Said Ait Messaoudene, members of the FLN [National Liberation Front] Central Committee and Algerian ministers of heavy and light industries respectively. The Tunisian delegation also held discussions with the leaders of the different expanded industrial sectors of housing, public works and the postal and telecommunications service. On this occasion, they engaged in an in-depth examination of the experiences the two countries have had in the field of industrial development. An increase in exchanges of information in the different fields as well as industrial cooperation were the object of particular attention. This mission, which falls under the heading of the application of measures decided on at the time of Prime Minister Mohamed Mzali's recent official visit to Algeria, is also planning to prepare for the proceedings of the big Algerian-Tunisian Commission which is to meet shortly in Tunis. ARAB INVESTMENT IN FRG--A West German news report quotes the head of the Arab Monetary Fund, Mr Jawad Hashim, as saying that the Arab oil-producing countries now wish to invest more of their billions of dollars of oil revenues in the Federal Republic of Germany rather than, as they have done so far, primarily in the United States. It is felt that these funds would be safer in Germany than in other West European Nations. The Arab countries are not going to invest any new oil revenues in America, but the deposits which are already there, totalling between 30 and 40 billion dollars, will not be withdrawn. This decision was made primarily as a result of America's freezing of Iranian assets. This caused the Arab oil-producing countries to become apprehensive about the possibility that America might undertake to take similar measures with regard to Arab financial assets in the event of a crisis. SOVIETS REPORTED TO KILL AFGHAN TROOPS [Text] Peshawar, Oct. 5: According to latest reports, Soviet tanks and armoured cars opened fire and killed over 100 Afghan troops when they responded to Mujahideens' call and jumped out of a convoy sent to repair Asma-Birkot road in Kunar province. Ninety troops who succeeded in running away from the convoy surrendered before Mujahideen alongwith their arms and ammunition. The Mujahideen also destroyed two Soviet tanks.

Lahore THE PAKISTAN TIMES in English 6 Oct 80 pp 1, 5

It is also reported that most of troops are kept under constant watch of Afghan Government party workers as they are looking for an opportunity to defect to Mujahideen. Afghan Government which suspects the loyalty of troops has restricted their movement and forbidden them from writing letters even to their close relatives. Leave of all types has also been stopped. This has completely lowered the morale of Afghan troops and a state of uncertainty is prevailing all over the country.

It is further reported that the Soviets are going to remove anti-tank and anti-aircraft weapons from Afghan army units because most of the Afghan-controlled weapons are finding their way to Mujahideen.

Meanwhile, there is acute shortage of consumer goods and the soaring prices are now beyond the reach of Afghan masses.

Another report adds:

According to a Press release of Hezbi Islami Afghanistan issued here today, reports from Kandhar province said that Mujahideen have fulfilled the following operations in Kandhar province during the last few days.

The Mujahideen entered the bazar and captured the son of the Director of the Prison, then a cassette was recorded by him and it was sent to his father to release the prisoners. Otherwise, he will be executed by the Mujahideen.

The Mujahideen captured alive a Communist by the name of Mangul on Sept. 27.

The Mujahideen killed two Khalqies, one on the road side while the other was killed in his house on Sept. 28. Next day the Mujahideen killed Zalmi, the representative of the Defence Committee.

On Sept. 29, Vice-Commander Dad Mahmad, a loyal sepoy to the Government, was captured and executed.

Reports from Ghazni province said that the Mujahideen killed two Khalqies in the Armak school, because this school was the centre of the Communist and militia.

On Sept. 28, guerilla group attacked Ashor village, with the result that one high-ranking Khalqi who was also the bodyguard of Hafizullah Amin was killed.

Mujahideen destroyed two tanks and killed six soldiers and two officers in an attack on a convoy near Barikot, according to a Press release of the Islamic Alliance for the Liberation of Afghanistan.

In another fighting incident on September 25, the Mujahideen killed 27 Babrak soldiers, wounded 18 and captured eight of them. In this encounter the Mujahideen also captured six machineguns, one mortar and ammunition. In another incident, the Mujahideen captured three heavy machineguns and one morter when 100 soldiers surrendered themselves to the Mujahideen.

On September 28 one tank was destroyed and three Russians killed when a mine, planted by Mujahideen, exploded.

According to another report from Kunar, Russian and Babrak troops attacked Smar on September 25. Fighting still continues. The invading troops have inflicted heavy casualties and four Mujahideen have been martyred.

A report from Badakhshan says that about three weeks ago Mujahideen destroyed seven Russian tanks and killed 36 Russians in fighting. The Mujahideen also captured some arms. Two of the Mujahideen were wounded.

According to another report from Badakhshan, heavy fighting took place between Mujahideen and Russian troops in Argo. The Mujahideen killed a large number of Russians--PPI.

SOVIETS BUILD UP TROOP STRENGTH

Lahore THE PAKISTAN TIMES in English 4 Oct 80 pp 1, 10

[Text] New Delhi, Oct. 3: Afthanistan Government announced yesterday that a trial court ordered jail for scores of school children after they pleaded guilty of staging a series of anti-Soviet demonstrations in Kabul last April and May.

The court decided that those who have not reached the legal age be put in reform jails, while it sentenced the others to imprisonment terms varying from five to 20 years, the Afghan Government Radio said in a broadcast monitored in New Delhi.

Thousands of school girls and boys chanted slogans criticising the Soviet Union and Afghan President Babrak Karmal, taunted Afghan Government soldiers and organised school strikes earlier this summer. Unofficial reports from Kabul said more than 350 were killed by gunshots and beatings.

Meanwhile, the Soviet Union meeting still guerilla resistance, has rebuilt its troop strength in Afghanistan and is using 'scorched earth' tactics in an unsuccessful effort to subdue the country.

This is the assessment of U.S. officials who also told reporters on Wednesday that the Red Army has built permanent bridges across the Soviet border while slowly increasing troop strength to 85,000 men. Soviet forces were at that level in June, when President Leonid I. Brezhnev announced a partial withdrawal--a move that appeared to suggest a conciliatory attitude in the Kremlin and an opening for a negotiated settlement.

The U.S. official said, the Afghan Army has virtually collapsed forcing the Soviets to take on most of the fighting against guerillas. "The Soviets, in our view, are digging in for a long stay," said one official who asked not to be identified. "I don't think there is any doubt about this."

A Western diplomatic source said the thunderous explosion which roused Kabul residents from their sleep early on the morning of Sept. 24 was the detonation of a Public Works Ministry dynamite storage depot just sout of the capital.

One report said the cache was set off by anti-Marxist guerillas, said the source, who asked not be identified.

Six people reportedly were killed in the blast and the fighting that followed, he added.

The Muslim guerillas reportedly had removed one truckload of dynamite from the depot at Chakh-Ab, five kilometres from Kabul, before they were spotted at about 2:30 A.M. by security forces, the source said. They apparently decided to set off the rest of the explosives when it became clear they couldn't haul them away.

Ashes from the explosion drifted down on the capital for about two hours after the blast, and small arms fire was heard in the area until about 5:00 A.M., the source said.

An earlier report said 10 Soviet tanks were also seen moving through Kabul after the blast toward the site of the explosion.--APA.

SOVIET ARMY SAID LOSING GRIP ON KABUL

Islamabad THE MUSLIM in English 11 Oct 80 p 8

[Text]

NEW DELHI, Oct. 10: The Soviet army grip on Kabul has seriously slipped, allowing Afghan urban guerillas to attack Soviet and government targets more often, a diplomat said today.

Small arms fire, that lasts through much of the night, has spread and occurs several times a week. Beside this, unexplained loud explosions and prolonged electricity cuts have become common in the last two weeks, the diplomat said.

"It is rarely clear who is shooting at whom" the diplomat said "but there is evidence that Mujahideen attacks are increasing in number and around Kabul".

LULL IN FIGHTING: Meanwhile a source in Kabul said yesterday that Soviet military operations had at least temporarily ground to a halt, with no major fighting involving Russian soldiers reported in recent days.

However, the source said that fighting continued against guerillas by Afghan soldiers, militiamen and tribesmen recruited by the Government. But there has been no significant activity by the Soviet war machine in Afghanistan—currently estimated at 85,000 troops, backed by MiG jet fighters and helicopter gunships—since the Russian defeat recently in the Panjshir Valley, north of Kabul, said the source.

In that campaign, the Soviets launched a major offensive in late August to secure the strategic gorge, held by Muslim insurgents since 1978. Soviet troops led by scores of tanks and supported by pocket-bristling fighter-bombers and helicopters pushed 40 kilometres into the valley against heavy guerilla resistance. The advance was stalled at Rokha, when the guerillas trapped Soviet tanks by blasting boulders down the hillsides, reports from Afghanistan said.

The guerillas claimed later to have killed more than 1,500 Soviet and pro-government troops and destroyed 35 tanks and a helicopter in the fighting.

MEMBERSHIP RULES: Western diplomatic sources said in the Indian capital today that the Ruling People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan (PDPA), had made important changes in its membership rules, which would further weaken the influence and importance of the Khalq faction opposed to President Babrak Karmel's Parcham group.

The membership structure consist of a new three-tier system of full members, provincials and trainees.

Under the new rules, all those who have been 'inactive' for the past nine month's have been relegated into a lower tier, the sources said.

The new rules would primarily affect the Khalq member, who have kept at a generally low profile since the Parchamite leader Babrak Karmel was installed in power by the Soviet Union in December last year. The Parcham faction outnumbered the Khalqis in government and party posts and observers believe the latest changes in the membership rules will make it difficult for the Khalqis to make a preceptible influence.

The changes in the membership rules are also considered to be a sequel to the continuing purges of Khalq elements from both the government and the party. —APA/UPI/AFP

USSR REPORTED TO TAKE HEAVY LOSSES IN KUNNAR

Islamabad THE MUSLIM in English 10 Oct 80 p 8

[Text]

PESHAWAR, Oct. 9: The Russian forces attacked Mazar Valley, in Kunnar province recently.

According to a press release of Hezbi-Islami Afghanistan, issued here today, the Mujahideen defended themselves bravely agint the Russians. In this encounter 330 Russians were killed. One Russian plane was also shot down.

On the Mujahideen side eight persons killed.

Reports from Alishang in district Langhman said that in a fighting with the Soviet forces a few days back, the Mujahideen destroyed 18 enemy tanks and killed 235 Russian soldiers.

Due to heavy bombardments, 20 Mujahideen were killed. In another encounter in the same area, 14 Soviet soldiers were killed and two tanks were destroyed.

On the side of Mujahideen no casualties were reported.

Meanwhile, according to a report published today in the 'Indian Express', the Soviet soldiers, who lived in primitive self-built huts after their invasion last year, were getting ready for a comfortable second winter. Solid barracks, the paper said were being built in many important cities. Construction in the Afghan capital as well as in Jalalabad, Badakhshan, Mazar-i-Sharif, Herat, Kandahar and Pul-i-Khumri is going on.

The highway from Kabul to the Soviet border, the paper said would be widened into four-lanes. Wooden bridges have been built over the frontier river Oxus and will be replaced in the near future by permanent structures.

Western diplomats in the Indian capital pointed out that such actions need not necessarily mean that the Soviets now feel secure.

In Kabul, members of the Democratic People's Party have told journalists of Soviet offers to withdraw from Afghanistan, if Kabul can rebuild its army to its original level of 100,000 troops—an increase of two-thirds.

But the offer, according to a member of the Khalq party's (people's) wing, is by no means a sign that the Soviets have any plan to withdraw. As long as the Russians are in the country, recruitment of so many native soldiers will remain impossible, he said. —PPI

MUJAHEDIN HALT RUSSIAN OFFENSIVE IN PANJSHIR VALLEY

Frankfurt/Main FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE in German 2 Oct 80 p 3

[Article by Frederic Smelt: "In Afghanistan the Russians Have Not Yet Learned Mountain Guerrilla Warfare--Unsuccessful Fall Offensive in Panjshir Valley"]

[Text] One night about 30 Soviet armored cars and supply vehicles drove through some streets, lighted only by a few naked lightbulbs, of the Kart-e-Parwan District of Kabul to their barracks. Many Kabul residents went out in front of their premises surrounded by walls to take a look at the dirtied vehicles and exhausted soldiers, who everyone thought were coming from the Panjshir Valley. There were sporadic cries of the resistance slogan "Allah-u-akbar" (God is great), but the majority remained silent in the knowledge that the Soviets' unsuccessful advance into the Panjshir Valley is not bringing their country a single centimeter closer to peace, and that even the couple of burned jeeps which were being hauled by wreckers could not hide the fact that no end is in sight of Russian occupation of part of the country. The soldiers looked neither right nor left and appeared to have but one thing in mind--to reach their barracks as quickly as possible. For a few seconds it was impossible to escape the impression that the people in this dark street on both sides would have expressed the same wish if they had been asked: the Afghans were wishing they were on the other side of the Amu Daria, and the Russians looked as if they too would rather be there. Four days later the remaining armored forces presumably returned to Kabul at night, and thus it appears to have been established that the people in the Panjshir Valley again managed to throw the Soviets out of the valley, though afterward some houses in Gulbahar were destroyed by helicopters.

According to reports of others and one's own observations, only one conclusion is possible concerning this commando action: even after 9 months the Soviets have not learned how to conduct mountain guerrilla warfare, even assuming that they did not want to occupy the valley permanently but merely intended to reduce the power of the local muhajedin through a "punitive expedition." For since the Soviets do not control the country outside the towns anyway, and in fact cannot do so with the existing forces, one cannot really see why they should have been bent on taking the Panjshir Valley, which is made for partisan warfare, particularly as winter will start in a few weeks and Russian logistics will have its hands full to supply its troops on the Salang Road more or less satisfactorily.

If anything, protection of the Salang Road, the main route of supply for the army of occupation, may be seen as the reason for the advance into the valley, for in Dshabal-e-Serach this road passed very close to one of the accesses to the Panjshir Valley. As far as is known, however--disregarding an attack against an Afghan money transport--the muhajedin did not attack the road there. Perhaps a more serious consideration for the Soviets is the fact that there are routes running all the way to Badakhshan and Pakistan from the Panjshir Valley.

In the clear autumn air not only the blue sky and the blue-green water but also the brown mountain boulders radiate in the Panjshir Valley. The valley is beautiful if one does not happen to have to earn his living here; to be sure, many a peasant looks at the panorama differently when he works for his daily living on the meager rocky soil, which needs to be irrigated artificially. The amount of land that can be cultivated being very small, many inhabitants of the valley migrated to Kabul to find some kind of work--without, however, losing their longing for the valley.

This close tie between Kabul and the Panjshir Valley explains among other things why the imminent Russian attack was known, the villages were vacated to some extent and peasants, shepherds and fishermen became guerrillas. In the mountain boulders, which in most locations rise right next to the river or the road, there are caves which normally serve as a place for the shepherds to stay during bad weather and are now serving as a refuge for the mujahedin.

If one sits with a group of Panjshir people in such a cave, one feels as if thousands of years of history had become a single day. Rifles and old Kalashnikovs, which were not purchased but captured, with whole stories connected with that, or the not very large supply of ammunition being kept in ammunition belts, small cases and sacks, or the three watches and one Japanese transistor radio make it clear that one is in the 20th century, as do sweaters and jackets manufactured in Europe or the United States. If, however, one goes through the rest of the cave inventory, time vanishes. Dried mulberries to sweeten tea, and dried peas, as well as grains of wheat and flour, are kept in stone or earthenware vessels. Piles of camel's-thorn are stacked in a corner for heating stones to bake flat bread with flour and water. There are no large supplies, for the Soviets are not expected to stay in the valley long, and at night one can reach the nearest village anyway. Cotton blankets rolled up to serve as cushions to sit on during the day complete the cave decor. In daytime the men need do only one thing: stay alive and not be discovered by helicopters. This is not particularly difficult as helicopters can be seen approaching a long time ahead.

According to the reports, the Soviets drove with armored cars and supply vehicles toward Rukha, the district capital, while helicopters circled above the convoys. As is often the case in Afghanistan, no exact figures about the number and type of the Soviet vehicles are available. The consensus is that there were a great many. In Kabul, the figures vacillate between 60 and 600, with the former figure probably closer to the truth. Parachute troops are said to have been used around Rukha, but otherwise the Soviets appear to have again proceeded according to the old scheme of "armored cars and helicopters," despite the fact these tactics as yet have not worked in any mountain valley where the partisans remained prepoderantly on the defensive, attacking the Soviets in brief raids.

The fighting method of the mujahedin is as simple as it is effective. At places that are particularly difficult to take in with one's eye, they take advantage of the momentary confusion when a vehicle has hit a mine, firing at the tires and personnel of the convoys. Those raids are said to have been staged so quickly and with such clever use of the terrain that--according to the muhajedin--losses were not great despite the enemy armor and helicopters.

This particular morning, when the first helicopters were slowly but surely approaching our mountain, the entrance to the cave was shut quickly with a few rocks. The effort turned out to be unnecessary, for the helicopters flew up the valley. After an hour, the same thing happened, except that this time we heard some explosions in the distance. This prompted one of the cave warriors to state: "I guess they are once again bombing our rocks and lizards." When the helicopter noise had stopped, we established that evidently this was exactly what had happened. Along the road, clouds of dust testified to military activity despite the fact that at the time not even a sheep had been in the vicinity.

During those few hours in the Panjshir Valley I did not see any dead or wounded, and helicopters attacks with rockets are not particularly strenuous if one is staying in a solid cave. Reportedly Soviet pilots in other valleys drove the muhajedin with nonlethal gas from their hiding places, but this is not certain, for in Afghanistan, which is 15 times the size of Switzerland and hardly has any communications any longer, it is very difficult to gather accurate information. Details are invariably only known in Peshawar, Islamabad and especially New Delhi (apparently knowledge increases proportionately to the distance from the location of the occurrence), and from there the information then also reached the Afghan citizens.

In all likelihood the Soviets used no gas, lethal or other, or napalm or phosphorous bombs in the Panjshir Valley, and yet the presence of their troops, though there aren't any at all in many of the country's villages, lies on the country like a cover of lead. One of the shepherds in the Panjshir Valley expresses this more strikingly. He fought the Russians without any ideological tinge and without hatred; rather he was guided by the simple reason that the Russians did not belong in the valley (any more than the young people of the Partshani Party, who have no qualifications that are respected here and whose party phrases were listened to by him first without prejudice and then with irritation and finally were dismissed with the words, "The talk of an official has never made a single sheep well again". This is what the shepherd says: "Look, what can I do when I care for my sheep and they die nevertheless although I have used all the herbs and good words I know and have sought the mullahs' advice? And still there have always been sheep in this valley."

No one at this mountain post gave the impression of lacking hope, but all also realized that, while they could inflict losses on the Soviet soldiers, they could not defeat them and that they were faced with a guerrilla war that would last for years and in which not only some of them but also their wives and children would die.

SOVIET PLANES AT KANDAHAR AIRPORT REPORTED DESTROYED

Karachi MORNING NEWS in English 20 Oct 80 p 1

[Text] Beijing, Oct. 19--Amidst the roar of guns coming from the Iran-Iraq border, the Kremlin summoned the Babrak Karmal of the Kabul regime and accorded him a ceremonious reception in Moscow.

Mr. Brezhnev himself greeted Karmal as a "head of state" at the airport, where they gave each other a big hug and reviewed an honour guard.

The fact is that the Soviet Union was compelled to do so because of the stiff resistance by the Afghan people. The Afghan guerillas are hitting hard and their recent surprise attack on Kandahar airport in which many Soviet aircraft were destroyed added new proof to this fact.

Recently, the Soviet Army has taken the following steps to stiffen the suppression: (1)--Tighten the control of major cities, towns, and communication lines; the Soviet troops sent out in planes and tanks to bomb and shell villages along the main roads throughout the country to create desolate "no-man areas" to deter and isolate the guerillas.

(2)--The Soviet authorities have sent home that part of its personnel and equipment unsuited to fighting in Afghanistan and brought in a large batch of gunships and a great number of mobile shock troops trained for anti-guerilla warfare and suitable to fight in mountainous regions in order to launch surprise attacks on the guerillas.

(3)--Employing Afghans to fight against Afghans and to create discord among the Afghan tribes and undermining the morale of their forces.--Xinhua

MUJAHEDIN ATTACK KABUL OFFICIALS, RULING PARTY WORKERS

Karachi DAWN in English 6 Oct 80 p 1

[Text]

PESHAWAR, Oct 5: According to a Press release of Hezb-i-Islami Afghanistan, issued here today reports from Kandhar province said that the Mujahideen have fulfilled the following operations in Kandhar province during the last few days.

The Mujahideen entered the Bazar and captured the son of the Director of the Prison, on Sept 6.

The Mujahideen captured alive a Communist by the name of Mangul on Sept 27.

The Mujahideen killed two Khalqies, one on the road side while the other was killed in his house on Sept 28. Next day the Mujahideen killed Zalmi, a representative of the Defence Committee.

On Sept 29, the Vice-Commander by name of Dad Mahmad, that being a loyal sepoy to the Government was captured alive and then was executed.

Reports from Ghazni province said the Mujahideen attacked the sub-government of Armak. As a result two Khalqies were killed and the Mujahideen put on fire the Armak school, because this school was the centre of Communists and militia.

On Sept 28 a group of Mujahideen attacked another village with the result one high-ranking Khalqi, who was also the body-guard of Hafizullah Amin was killed.

The report adds, that two Russian convoys — one force from Ghazni and the other from Kabul were determined to attack Wardak province. But the devoted Mujahideen of Hezb-i-Islami attacked both convoys on their way to Wardak province near Shindu Sayyer Pass. It was 7 p.m. at night and the fighting continued for four hours. As a result two tanks were destroyed by rocket launcher and the trucks carrying potatoes and one jeep were destroyed. Twenty-five Russian soldiers were killed and 12 were wounded seriously, including one high-ranking Russian adviser, who died after a while.

According to latest reports, Soviet tanks and armoured cars opened fire and killed over 150 Afghan Askars when they responded to Mujahideen's call and jumped out of the convoy sent to repair Asmar-Pirkot road in Kunar province. Ninety Askars who succeeded in running away from the convoy surrendered before the Mujahideen alongwith their arms and ammunition.

Mujahideen also destroyed two Soviet tanks.

It is also reported that most of Askars are kept under constant watch of the Afghan Government party workers as they are looking for an opportunity to defect to the Mujahideen.

Afghan Government which suspects the loyalty of troops has restricted their movement and forbidden them from writing letters even to their close relatives. Leave of all type has also been stopped. This has completely lowered the moral of Afghan troops and a state of uncertainty is prevailing all over the country. —PPI.

KABUL REPORTED TO BE HOSTILE TOWARD INDIANS

Karachi DAWN in English 9 Oct 80 p 5

[Article by Yeha Syed]

[Text] London, Oct. 8--An Indian journalist who was in Afghanistan last Friday reported in "The Times" yesterday noticeable estrangement towards the Indians visiting Kabul, because "the Afghans believe that India failed to stand by them during their hour of crisis."

Kuldip Nayar said in his report filed from Delhi, "when I was in Kabul in 1974, I was welcomed wherever I went. Shopkeepers would go out of the way to say that the Indians were their best friends. This time many shopkeepers said "bayro" (go away) when I approached."

Nayar reports that "insurgents have surrounded Kabul," from where, he says, "I have just returned, and even Government officials warn you against going more than six miles outside the capital without armed escort."

An Indian residing in Kabul took Nayar in his Mercedes to Paghman, a scenic picnic spot nine miles from Kabul last Friday; this was a holiday, and found the place deserted. On his return at 4 his car was fired upon, although no one was hurt, but "the windscreen was shattered."

Since most Mercedes belonging to Afghan citizens had been requisitioned, Nayar explained, the general belief is that travelling in them are senior officials of the Soviet-backed regime in Kabul.

Two weeks ago, he said, 21 lorries carrying dry fruits and other goods were destroyed on the road between Kabul and Jalalabad, distance of 50 miles. Since then those who still use the road, Nayar said, "are forced to pay toll tax to the insurgents for safe conduct."

"This works out to be cheaper," an Afghan trader told Nayar, whose lorry was recently burnt.

The Soviet lorries leaving Kabul with supplies and mail are escorted by up to 15 tanks and even non-Russian convoys have between six and eight tanks to protect them, Nayar said.

This, he added, "indicates the extent of the insurgents' hold around Kabul." Nayar said, "In the suburbs of Shakedra, posters carrying the picture of Gulbuddin Hikmatyar, the chief of Hizbe Islami, 'the most influential guerilla group,' are pasted on many walls, with a warning that no one should pull them down."

When a Parcham member ignored the warning, he was killed on the spot, Nayar said.

Deserters have reduced the Afghan army to a shadow of what it was, reported Trevor Fishlock in "The Times" for Delhi.

Before the Soviet occupation last December, the strength of the army was 80,000; now it is estimated at 35,000 only, he said.

INSURGENTS IN KABUL ENJOY 'OFFICIAL COVER'

Islamabad THE MUSLIM in English 7 Oct 80 p 1

[Text]

NEW DELHI, Oct. 6: Anti-government insurgents number nearly 20,000 in Kabul and enjoy protection from sympathisers in the Afghan Police and Army, an Indian Journalist reported today.

Kuldip Nayar of the 'Indian Express' newspaper, who spent six days in the Afghan capital, quoted guerrillas as saying, "We can disrupt life in Kabul in no time, but it is no use doing so when we cannot hold the city."

According to the guerillas, there are about 20,000 Soviet troops in or near Kabul. The city's Population, Nayar said, has risen to one million because of an influx of refugees from the provinces.

Soviet troops in Afghanistan total about 85,000 according to Western estimates.

In a despatch from Kabul, published today, Nayar said: "The guerilla activity inside the city has increased since I was here eight months ago. It is still limited to a few exchanges here and there at night, but the guerillas are bolder and more determined than before."

"It appears they have their men in the Police and the Army who not only act as their informers but also give them shelter" he said.

BABRAK INVITED: Soviet-backed Afghan President Babrak Karmal will make an official friendship visit to the Soviet Union in mid-October, Tass reported last night.

Mr. Karmal accepted an invitation from the Communist Party's General Committee, The Presidium of the Supreme Soviet and from the Soviet Government, Tass said.

Meanwhile, Afghanistan yesterday agreed to buy two Antonov commercial aircraft from the Soviet Union for its domestic carrier, Bakhtar al-Watana, Radio Afghanistan reported. —AFP/AFA

[Text] Kabul, 13 September (PPI, JASARAT Correspondent Mukhtar Hussein)--The Afghan mujahidin have killed two ministers of the Karmal government and their 90 guards in Paktia. These ministers were sent to spread anti-mujahid propaganda in that area.

Meanwhile, in (Panjsher) Valley, the Russians have suffered heavy casualties in a battle lasting several days against the mujahidin.

The mujahidin defeated the Russian army in Chakwardak, 20 miles from Kabul. The Russian army could not enter Herat city. The mujahidin killed 300 soldiers, and destroyed 6 tanks and 12 trucks carrying ammunition in (Oruzgan) district. The mujahidin killed 27 Russian soldiers while they were getting out of their helicopters in (Sharan) district.

According to news reports, Faiz Mohammad, minister of frontiers and tribes, and Nazar Mohammad, minister of public works, were visiting (Sayyed Khel) and (Monari) in Paktia. Their purpose was to use money, military power and force to get the local tribes to rise against the mujahidin. However, the mujahidin attacked under the command of Jalal al-Din, leader of Hazb-I-Islami, and, after a bloody battle, killed the two ministers and their 90 guards. Congratulating the mujahidin on their success, Mohammed Yunus Khalis said that God was on their side, and that the Kabul government would face the same fate as its ministers. The minister of frontiers and tribal affairs, Faiz Mohammad, was originally from Paktia and belonged to the Mahmood tribe. He was also a minister under Taraki and Amin.

Reports of fighting starting Monday between Russian soldiers and the mujahidin have been received from Samangan and Balkh provinces. Heavy fighting is reported in (Bainwal), Jalalabad, and the neighboring provinces of Konarha and Laghman.

According to REUTER, the combined forces of the Karmal government and Russian armies tried unsuccessfully to enter the city of Herat. The mujahidin fiercely fought them back. Following its shattering defeat in (Panjsher) Valley, the Russian army is camping in Rakha, 20 miles away. Under the leadership of Engineer

Gulbadan Hikmatyar, the mujahidin attacked the Russian army in (Argoan) district, destroyed 6 tanks and 12 trucks loaded with weapons, and killed 300 Karmal government troops. The Russian army was headed from Ghazni to (Argoan) to recover this area from the mujahidin.

The Russians are fighting the mujahidin in (Khoust) and (Ghoulang) districts. The Russians dropped soldiers from helicopters in (Shawan) district of Paktia province, but the mujahidin attacked them as soon as they landed and killed 27 Russian soldiers. One mujahidin was killed and another was wounded. In fighting lasting several days between the mujahidin and the Russian soldiers, the mujahidin destroyed seven tanks and three armored vehicles in (Ghourband) district of Parwan province. The mujahidin attacked Russian reinforcements, blocked their way to Parvan, and killed 81 Russian soldiers.

According to a report by REUTER, the Afghan army is discouraged by the forced recruitment of children below age 15. Shopkeepers are on strike in Kandahar. Due to fighting in other areas, people are flocking to Kabul, resulting in an increase in Kabul's population. The Russian army is once more patrolling Kabul. They have set up check points on all roads entering Kabul. Murder and abduction are on the increase in Kabul. In the capital, pamphlets containing threats to murder Russian soldiers are being distributed. The Karmal government has passed a new law meant to stop soldiers from deserting the army.

USSR BOMBING CLAIMS 200--New Delhi, Oct 21--About 200 Afghans were killed when Soviet MIG fighter jets and helicopter gunships blasted Farza, a town north of Kabul, earlier this month, according to a report in the "Indian Express" newspaper. The Express said yesterday the bombing was "to punish the people for sheltering Afghan guerillas." It quoted a witness to the attack as saying that half the dwellings in Farza, a town of about 25,000 people, were destroyed in the attack. Most of the residents fled to the safety of nearby mountains. The witness told the newspaper in New Delhi that he saw a Russia MIG-21 exploding in flames near Farza. Some helicopter gunships were also hit by gunfire, he added. He claimed that fruit orchards and standing crops in the area were destroyed by the raid.--APA [Text] [Karachi DAWN in English 21 Oct 80 p 10]

BABRAK KARMAL SPEECH QUOTED--New Delhi, 8 September (PPI, DPI)--The pro-Soviet government leader, Babrak Karmal, has claimed that his army is defeating its enemy, and forcing enemy remnants to flee the country. Addressing the citizens in Kabul yesterday, the Marxist leader said, however, that the government cannot deal with the mujahidin by itself. According to Radio Kabul, he called on the people to cooperate with the government to clean the country of its enemies. He said that the people should be able to distinguish between their enemies and their friends. He added that though the situation was bad, the course of events was in his favor. He repeatedly claimed that China, Iran, Pakistan, and America were introducing trouble-makers into the country. He said that as soon as all these foreign intrusions stop, the Russian army would leave Afghanistan. He asked for volunteers to help the ruling government and the country. According to him, those who died for the country were martyrs. [Text] [Karachi JASARAT in Urdu 9 Sep 80 pp 3, 6]

DISCUSSION OF GOALS OF 1980-1984 PRODUCTION PROGRAM

Algiers EL DJEICH in French Sep 80 pp 32-37

[Text] Sectional imbalances in investments have certainly been the cause of malfunctions in the organization of the national economy and have continued the harmful dispute about the "unsound environment" or "bottlenecks."

The sectional imbalances were not unrelated to the development and exacerbation of interregional and intraregional disparities.

During the 1967-1978 period, public investors spent, calculated at a constant price, an amount of about 300 billion dinars, of which more than 150 was in foreign exchange.

Gross domestic production, the annual result of the utilization of invested capital and labor, only increased in constant prices, at an average rate of growth of 7.2. It has risen thus from a little bit more than 40 billion dinars in 1967 to 86.8 billion dinars in 1978.

It is clear that such growth of gross domestic production is quite low compared with the efforts made and especially with the volume of investments involved.

Hydrocarbons: a necessary replacement for the future exhaustion of our reserves. Production of hydrocarbons remained high during the period and involved a significant drop in the level of our hydrocarbon reserves without a parallel long-term energy policy, to provide a substitute after the exhaustion of our reserves, being implemented. It is far from being decided either, whether the price for the exploitation of our hydrocarbons has reached its maximum level, whether it involves liquid or gas hydrocarbons.

Agriculture Has Stagnated

The depression which characterizes it is not explainable either by physical or climatic conditions or by any form of management which would be unsuitable for it.

Usually well administered self-management should have released the forces of production substantially in relation to the agricultural wage earners, accordingly for self-management; it is the application which is to be examined and not the theory.

In the second place, the public sector in agriculture (self-management and the agrarian revolution sector) only accounts for 27 percent of total added value, an evaluation made in current prices. Accordingly, blaming self-management for agricultural inertia is based both on a superficial analysis and a serious disregard of specific conditions in rural life.

Production of services: is increasing, but is inadequate:

Transport and commerce have expanded, according to themselves, but not enough to cope with the sometimes simultaneous appearance of surplus and shortage.

In a general way, production of services have reflected the relatively excessive share in our efforts of imports of goods and their distribution.

Industrial production: our hydrocarbons have been insignificant in the total picture during the period. The levels reached, very short of objectives and production capacities, have slowed down the industrial and economic integration envisaged and it is not inaccurate to claim that because of that they have hindered the growth of the economy.

In fact, the deficiencies and shortages mentioned are reflected in an increasingly high level of imports, goods and services, to the point of reaching a rate practically unequaled in the world, half or more of our gross domestic production.

Reviving our production and making it conform more with our objectives of integration and satisfying the social needs of the masses will require much effort and time.

The difficulties lie especially in Algeria's population problem, which has been very acute. We are not far in this respect from beating a "world record" with a rate of 3.2 percent.

Our resident population was 12.6 million in 1967. It reached 18 million in 1978.

On the closing of the sessions of the regional seminar on planning, Mr Chadli, secretary general of the party, made an important speech in which he mentioned the "need for a rational use of existing human and material potentialities." It is necessary to recognize today that the level of production does not equal that of consumption; this is why we cannot properly meet needs without first increasing production.

Imports must be limited to materials which we cannot produce in Algeria.

Today we have petroleum and gas which allows us to import food products. But only depending on resources is a danger for the nation and the Revolution because of the disorganization which this situation could cause in the production system. We must act in such a way that work is a reward and a badge of respect for the citizen and the cadre. We must also increase our production in all fields to meet the needs of citizens and have a healthy economy. Moreover, this is a guarantee of national independence.

A. - For the Development of Production Sectors

The objectives and priorities of the 1980-84 Five-Year Plan are first to rapidly cover the most important shortages. Various measures are going to be implemented and that in the three main sectors: hydraulics, agriculture and industrial development.

Hydraulics

Delays in development in the hydraulic sector are expressed in huge shortages in supplying consumers. Water is actually the scarcest material resource; for the needs for drinking water and industrial irrigation water are increasing at a faster rate than our economic and social development. Failure to satisfy them could be a factor in hampering the development of our economy.

It actually involves starting in the decade extensive programs for collecting surface and underground water and combining them with programs to improve and maintain existing storage capacities, as well as distribution networks. In addition, and while expanding resources, including the desalinization of salt and brackish waters, it is desirable to introduce water conservation measures in requirements.

In order to give an idea of the size of the problem, it is useful to point out that irrigated land, now about 300,000 hectares must increase to 600,000 hectares between now and the year 2000. Meeting drinking water needs, now very low, will require 700 million cubic meters in 1990. The effort to be made in this field is tremendous, when we realize that the present drinking water supply is exactly abcut 525 million cubic meters.

During the coming decade, more than 30 billion dinars will have to be appropriated for hydraulics, to which we must add the 12 billion dinars planned for agricultural hydraulics.

B) Agricultural Development

It is necessary, and this is an essential imperative, to guarantee Algeria's food supply and protect it from threats of food blackmail, which the recent past has shown can be used by some capitalist countries.

To this fundamental aim of agricultural policy, must be added that of creating obviously improved living conditions for the peasants in the coming decade.

In conformity with the aims mentioned in the national constitution, agricultural lands must not only be protected against all encroachment from any sector whatever, but they must also be extended.

The growth of agriculture means that land resources and man who lives from them will again be fully developed.

The improvement of the status of agriculture in the Algerian economy will be done in such a way that society will learn to adapt to its demands and its rhythms and this involves both the educational system, as well as the supply, distribution and finance systems in general.

In the coming decade, progress in plant production will have to involve mainly, grains, potatoes, leguminous plants, fresh vegetables, fruits and fodders.

Meat products, severe shortages of which are felt, will have to involve the whole range of products, by developing mainly the production of red meat and vigorously speeding up poultry production.

During the coming decade, it is planned to spend some 50 billion dinars for agricultural development.

Industrial Development

Characterized by concrete results of planned industrial development, the past decade has produced achievements, which, although being in themselves, a positive aspect of the period, cannot help but bring up seriously and confusingly the question of Algeria's economic future.

The imbalances and tensions which result from them, whose dislocating effect cannot be ignored, reveal a sector which, although concentrating in itself most of the country's financial, material and human resources:

Is not mastering its production apparatus;

Does not have the means for planning and implementing its investments;

Continues to appeal to a great extent for technical assistance;

Is highly concentrated in northern Algeria.

This is why, besides completing and putting into operation, under the best conditions, projects in the process of being carried out, efforts during the next plan will emphasize:

The utilization of new investments in basic support industries;

The rationalization of the use of the production machine, encouraging methods of accomplishment, development and handling of investments and training;

Strengthening the role of local organizations and the introduction and involvement of the private sector to guide it towards a meaningful contribution to the development effort.

Investment Operations

The total amount of investments devoted to industry in the 1980-84 plan is about 155 billion DA of which

Seventy-eight million DA remains to be used.

Seventy-seven DA belong to the new program.

Resolutions of the Fourth Congress Regarding Production Operations

In the light of and taking into account the reports at the plenary session and the reports in committees.

Considering the long term policies for economic development [as published].

12) To develop organizations to manage and exploit large areas and irrigated areas, so as to guarantee efficient utilization of water and to insure through suitably scaled rents the maintenance and renewal of installations.

Agriculture

The Congress calls for:

1) Undertaking positive action to develop material and technical bases for agriculture

2) Development of land, preservation of landed capital through drainage and combating the extension of forestry resources connected with large agricultural projects, protection of the reservoir slopes of dams, protection of agricultural land, by limiting urban and industrial expansion.

3) Efficient use of soils, the preservation and optimum use of agricultural areas in conformity with local ecological and soil science conditions, as well as priorities for the development of food and forage crops, fruit tree cultivation in foothill and mountain areas, as well as the crops-livestock raising-fruit tree growing combination in high plateau areas and Saharan regions.

4) The expansion of irrigated areas both through the creation of new large areas as well as through the development of small scale hydraulics.

5) Drawing up of agricultural production plans by the farmers on each commune level, in accordance with the short and medium term national plan priorities.

6) Short term improvement of yields in the plant production field by decentralization of the sector's operation and improving organizational, supply and marketing conditions.

7) Improved and increased livestock production to meet the needs for white meat and eggs, to cover the needs for milk and dairy products to maintain the present rate of supply of demand for red meat.

8) Forestry development to combat desertification, erosion of reservoir slopes and to increase the productivity of forested areas by a sizeable increase in Algeria's afforestation rate.

9) Increase of fish and seafood production, by expanded fishing facilities, training of oceangoing fishermen, their organization in cooperatives, making adjusted credits available to them, setting up suitable distribution organizations, elimination of bureaucratic red tape, as well as encouraging the nonoperative private sector in this field and developing all types of pisciculture.

10) Improving and encouraging scientific and technical research regarding agriculture, in conformity with its priority, with the participation of research centers of national universities in theoretical fields and taking into account the knowledge and experience of producers.

11) Priority large scale assignment of engineers, cadres and Algerian technicians on the production and support structure level to the people, especially the CAPCS /Communal Multi-Service Agriculture Cooperative/ groups and their integration in producer collectives, the need to decree measures for the compulsory assignment of agricultural engineers and technicians in the agricultural, veterinary and paraveterinary sector.

12) Increasing the value of agricultural production, in particular tomatoes and dates, by increasing decentralized units for preparation, canning and processing, taking into account at the time of their establishment, regional pecularities.

Encourage and provide favorable conditions for the integration of emigrant brothers in agriculture.

Regarding the organization of the agricultural sector.

The Congress calls for:

13) Decentralization of research and development organizations for livestock and plant production.

14) Improving the capacities of the CAPCS to properly assure their support mission to all producers, including the small peasants.

15) Reorganization of self managed operations and cooperatives to provide them with effective management and full economic efficiency.

16) Guiding and encouraging the small peasants to organize in cooperative and precooperative production and marketing groups on the basis of voluntary membership.

17) Simplification of procedures for granting credit to all producers, effective decentralization of financial organizations, as well as organizations charged with the inspection and supervision of planned investments.

18) Reorganization of the present marketing system to assure improved movement of distribution and a better protection of the interests of producers and consumers.

Industry

The Congress calls for:

1) The implementation of an energy policy capable of harmonizing the actual and foreseeable needs of the national economy and those of future generations. In view of the limited and nonrenewable nature of the hydrocarbon resources, the development of a policy of use of substitute energy is essential, as well as an energy conservation policy.

2) The Congress declares the need for the progressively increasing participation of industry in national accumulation, calls for the mobilization of workers, elected officials and leading cadres to win the battle of production and management, to increase the effectiveness of the production apparatus and reduce the costs of production to lessen investment cost.

3) The development of a policy of national and regional industrial development capable of encouraging the participation of local collectives, meeting priority needs in industrial products and services and increasing their role in the integration of the economy.

The Congress calls for:

4) It emphasizes that the size of units and complexes must only be decided in the future on the basis of economic, technical and planning qualifications.

5) The complete development of projects and the progressive creation of specialized organizations being one of the means of providing cadres and acquiring technology, will necessarily create increasingly improved conditions for the national endowments, for study and achievement and their development.

6) The Congress urges regarding a medium and long-term industrial policy, assuring greater independence and greater economic integration, investigating the feasibility of the development of an assembly industry to satisfy the needs for consumer goods or equipment considered necessary to effectively save foreign exchange.

7) The Congress additionally advocates encouraging and developing especially on the local and private sector level, a tradesman class to service equipment and do traditional artistic handicraft.

8) To complete as soon as possible and under the best conditions projects now being carried out.

9) To undertake investments for the improvement of the existing potential to eliminate bottlenecks observed in production operations.

10) To direct new investments towards activities connected with priority sectors especially housing and city planning, agriculture and hydraulics, economic and social infrastructures, education and training, the development of projects capable of being started in future plans, especially for the production of equipment and projects encouraging the export of goods and services.

11) The Congress recommends that the planned activities for the production of goods and services, as well as investments be carried out smoothly and that bureaucratic red tape in supplying units and carrying out projects be eliminated. For this reason, administrative procedures must develop and adjust to the requirements of effective planning at all levels.

12) The Congress demands the integration of the private sector in plans to allow it to make a positive contribution to the industrial sector's development effort. This additional investment must take place under conditions which guarantee that the private sector does not acquire an actual monopoly of operations in these situations.

COMMENTS ON RESTORATION OF PARLIAMENTARY LIFE IN KUWAIT

Kuwait AL-WATAN in Arabic 17 Sep 80 p 13

[Article: "The Voice of Democracy Is Heard Again; The Parliamentary Ring in Kuwait Will Be Echoed in Bahrain"]

[Text] Bahrain--When Amir Jabir al-Ahmad al-Sabah of Kuwait issued the royal decree for the return of parliamentary life to Kuwait, the Bahrain press reported it with great interest. Most of the editorials welcomed the decree, stressing the pioneering role of Kuwait in the realm of parliamentary government.

The [Bahrain] newspaper AKHBAR AL-KHALIJ pointed out in its editorial that "democracy means a sharing of responsibility by each individual citizen." AKHBAR AL-KHALIJ continued with the following word of caution: "Democracy does not mean anarchy, dancing in the streets, and giving the opportunity to intruders to harm the country and the citizens. It does not mean serving oneself before anyone else, and it does not mean that any individual may work in the dark in order to impose what he wants [on others]. Rather, democracy means that there is a sacred place called parliament, where the voice of the individual can be expressed and heard."

The Commentary of AL-ADWA'

The weekly [Bahrain] newspaper AL-ADWA' welcomed the royal decree issued in Kuwait, emphasizing the positive role which parliamentary life can play in serving society and its cultural development. It added: "Parliamentary life can never function on an even keel, unless every citizen and opinion leader can express his views without fear for his job or means of livelihood. Representative life means securing the rights of every citizen within the framework of the laws that govern his society. It means transforming the citizen into a constructive person in every sense of the word. And it means that the individual will not be forgotten, and that he will not be surprised by pre-dawn visitors to put him behind a tall fence [under arrest].

Democracy is Everybody's Aspiration

Political observers stress the fact that when the press here takes a position on any regional political question, it gives expression to local feelings. In the meantime, the weekly [Bahrain] newspaper AL-MASIRAH is continuing to publish an open readers' debate on parliamentary life in Bahrain. In its latest editorial, 'Ali Amin, chairman of the board of the General Trade and Food Processing Company, commented:

"I do not know when parliamentary life will return [to Bahrain]. The government intended to restore parliamentary life, but the chain of events in the region, especially the disruption of security, has prevented the return of parliamentary life to Bahrain and other countries of the region. I wish that democracy could be restored now, for this is everyone's desire. The government will inevitably follow through with the restoration of parliamentary government, especially as other countries in the region are serious about restoring representative life. One example is Kuwait. Also, Saudi Arabia is earnestly studying a new system of government. If Bahrain acts, it could still be among the first few countries to bring parliamentary life to the region."

Women and the Parliament

Lawyer Salman Sahwan said: "The Parliament is the natural legislative authority. In its absence, the cabinet, which is basically the executive authority, undertakes the functions of the legislature. This contradicts an important legal principle--the separation of powers." Regarding his proposals for the new experiment, he said: "It is important to give women the right of full participation in the democratic experiment, since Bahraini women have reached a high degree of maturity."

Commitment to the Democratic Concept

Former (candidate?) 'Isa Jawdar pointed out in a word addressed to government officials: "When a representative assembly is created through direct and free elections, the government should make a total commitment to the democratic concept of majority rule, and should not harass members in any way. The government should set the stage for a true democratic environment for all individuals and factions, and should release all political prisoners, so that they may do their share in serving their country, effectively and out of conviction."

What About Official Reaction?

On the government level, officials have not yet expressed their point of view on the ongoing debate regarding the return of parliamentary life to Bahrain. However, observers here stress that the government is cautiously following all developments touching on this subject. Political analysts here feel that the quick one-day visit of the Bahrain minister of information, Tariq al-Mu'ayyid, to the government of Kuwait, on the day following the announcement of the royal decree to restore parliamentary government to Kuwait, reflects the interest of Bahrain officials in any new development in the field of democratic government in the region.

However, this official attention does not mean, in the opinion of observers, a desire to hasten the return of parliamentary life to Bahrain, at least not in the near future. Bahrain officials had already announced, at the beginning of the year, their desire to review the [past] parliamentary experiment in Bahrain exhaustively, in the light of what Kuwait does in its new experiment. This means that Bahrain's steps in this connection will depend on the time span required to prepare for elections and parliamentary life in Kuwait. During this period, Bahrain will be preparing for the requirements of the new experiment.

Observers see in the faint voices given expression from time to time on the pages of the Bahrain newspaper, AL-MASIRAH, an official beginning for these needed preparations. Therefore, we might say that the ring of democracy in Kuwait will be echoed in Bahrain--but after some time.

LEGISLATION TO REVIVE EGYPTIAN RAILROADS OUTLINED

Cairo AL-AHRAM in Arabic 1 Aug 80 p 5

[Article by Ahmad 'Ismat: "Legislative Solution to Railroad Problems"]

[Text] Experts have decided that the railroads will now move forward after years of stagnation. More cars will not be imported to solve problems; instead, new legislation has been enacted. Maintenance has been poor, arrivals and departures erratic, and rail travel a torture, because of the awful state of the coaches. Maintenance facilities are in terrible shape, and technical personnel have quit due to low pay.

Antiquated government regulations and bureaucracy are leading enemies of the railroads and originators of their decline. The new legislation approved by the People's Assembly was prepared for this reason. How will this legislation improve the railroads?

One Hundred Engineers Quit

The main problem facing the railroads, besides bureaucracy, is the difficulty of keeping engineers on low pay. For example, authorities say that the shortage in railway and signal engineers is about 60 percent of those needed to carry on basic operations. This shortage is reflected in the [poor] quality of operations, particularly in maintenance. Presently, the number of engineers refusing railroad employment is one hundred.

Railway authorities add that they advertise for engineers, but no one responds. In contrast, during the 1940's and '50's, high grades were required of those wishing to work for the railroads.

Capable people prefer to work in public and private companies offering higher salaries. Railroad wages stand in the way of employees' advancement.

Backlog in Renovation of Cars, Roadbeds, Signals

Revenues have decreased due to fixed fares and worldwide increases in the cost of railroad equipment. Freight rates have remained static, in spite of inflation. Thus, the railroads have run into deficit since 1975. Freight rates have remained the same for the past 21 years, while passenger rates have increased 60 percent during the past 75 years. In 1975, the railways lost 2.7 million pounds, 14 million in 1976, 15 million in 1977, and 33 million in 1978. Poor maintenance and renovation, brought on by niggardly government appropriations, contributed to these losses.

Authorities say that there are 1,700 kilometers of roadbed that should have been renovated by 1979. This is some 38 percent of total roadbed kilometers. One hundred fifty-six bridges have been in use in excess of their estimated useful lives, including two spanning the Nile, 15 crossing canals and ditches, 67 stationary steel ones, and 72 concrete ones.

Three hundred seventeen coaches are over 30 years of age, 17 percent of the total number. Three thousand eight hundred twenty-nine freight cars are more than 40 years old, 21 percent of total freight cars. One hundred ninety-six locomotives are 20 years of age or over, or out of operation because of their rundown condition. This adds up to 23 percent of total locomotives. Most maintenance shops are between 45 and 90 years old, have deteriorated, and are incapable of meeting maintenance requirements.

Lack of Safety Procedures Increases Accidents

The poor state of the railroads is not limited to a shortage of coaches and to slow replacement and renovation, but is also reflected in the absence of modern safety procedures and resultant train wrecks. The signal system suffers from severe limitations. This has reached the point of operating most main line signals with kerosene lamps. A system for monitoring train movements, one that would permit total control over railroad traffic, keep in touch with breakdowns, change routes, and give instructions, has not been implemented.

The Legislation--How Will It Work?

Experts agree that the railroads cannot make any headway unless guaranteed a financial return in line with continuously rising operating costs. The government must, therefore, give the railroad authority the monetary difference between the fare for the service provided and its real cost. The authority must also be able to perform necessary repairs and renovation, be unhampered by government regulations, and be given a free hand to attract needed technical expertise by improving salaries and incentives. The authority should be able to choose a suitable form of administration to achieve its ends, be it by creating corporations, partnerships, or dealing with the private sector, etc.

Railroad requirements have crystalized in recent legislation designed to achieve these aims. How will this legislation improve the roads?

No Local Interference With Railroad Operations

The new law prepared by Engineer Sulayman Mitwalli, Minister of Transport, Communication, and Maritime Transport, emphasizes the national characteristic of the railroad authority's activities. This necessitates administering things centrally, since the railroads are in the forefront of national services and operate in all governates nationwide. They are not a local service, and local laws and rules do not apply to them.

Among the most important provisions of the new legislation is the right of the authority to set fares relative to costs, so that it will have the financial ability to achieve its goals. If the government does fix fares, it must now pay the difference in terms of real costs. The authority will set charges and tariffs for its various services. Its board will suggest a fare schedule, which will be announced by the minister of transport following submission to the council of ministers. The treasury will provide for differences between revenues resulting from the approved tariff and actual costs in the railroad budget for the following year.

The new legislation provides that the authority should use its money and budget in ways suited to its activities, and should modify its work to achieve its aims. This will be accomplished by having the railroads prepare their own budget according to their by-laws, without reference to national legislation governing budgets. The railroads will have their own account, into which their revenue will be deposited, and surpluses will be carried over from year to year.

Tax Exemption Allows Problems To Be Tackled

Since the railroads face many financial burdens as a result of high operating costs, the law exempts them from duties on imports of equipment, machinery, and technical supplies necessary for their operations. This is on condition that these items be inspected. The railroads will be required to give an affidavit that their imports are for internal operations. Customs exempt items cannot be sold within 5 years of the date of exemption, or they will be taxable. Since government contracts are usually subject to many restrictions which actually prevent their implementation, the railroads have been freed from these restrictions by special exemption from legislation governing imports and foreign exchange. The railroads can import on their own or via other channels without a license to do so. Their production requirements, raw materials, machinery, equipment, spare parts, and means of transportation can be imported according to their by-laws.

Creation of Railroad Corporations

The most important aspect of the new legislation grants the railroads authority to administer themselves. The railroads are allowed, given the approval of the minister of transport, to establish corporations, on their own or in cooperation with others, and to sell stock in these corporations following their establishment.

Board of Directors Sets Salaries

Low salaries cause technical expertise to flee. Thus the new legislation gives the railroads' board of directors the authority to draw up regulations governing appointment of railway employees, their promotions, salaries, bonuses, and all other personnel matters. The minister of transport will issue the final regulations. A workers' health and social care system can be created by the board. It can also suggest internal and external loans and set procedures governing contracts with customers, technical and financial matters, purchasing and warehousing, etc.

Can the railroads progress under this legislated reform and regain their lost reputation?

SOLUTIONS TO HOUSING CRISIS SOUGHT IN NEW HOUSING BILL

Cairo AL-HRAM in Arabic 17, 18 Sep 80

[17 Sep 80 p 3]

[First Installment by 'Abd-al-Wahab Hamid]

[Text] All Concerned Parties Engage in Lengthy Debate on New Housing Law Before It Goes into Effect.

New Law Realizes for Landlord:

1. A 150 Percent Rent Increase for Old Buildings After 10 Years;

2. The Right to Fix Rent After Rent Committees Are Turned into Grievance Committees;

3. Penalty for Key Money Is Civilian Not Criminal; 2 Years Advance Instead of 2 Months.

For the Tenant, the New Bill:

1. Reduces Returns on Buildings to 7 Percent;

2. Gives Right of Grievance Against Landlord's Evaluation;

3. Gives Tax Exemption for His Apartment.

What are the principal features of the proposed new housing bill before it is presented to the Council of Ministers and the People's Assembly for approval or modification?

What are the outstanding characteristics of the bill? Will it benefit landlords, tenants or both? Will it be a means for solving the housing crisis?

Many questions were being raised by average Egyptian citizens: some supported the bill and others opposed it.

Those who supported the bill said, "The new bill provides benefits to old and to future landlords. It does so by fixing rent and especially by changing the work of the rent committees and turning them into grievance committees to which the tenant would appeal. The new bill increases rent in old buildings so that the increase would amount to 150 percent after about 10 years; in new buildings it would amount to 50 percent."

The new bill also gives the tenant benefits. The most important of these is reducing returns on buildings from 10 to 7 percent. This reduces rent. The tenant is also exempted from all kinds of taxes which represent more than 50 percent.

The question now is this: What are the reasons that led officials to contemplate preparing a new housing bill at a time when the former law raised landlords' returns more than 200 percent over returns fixed by the law that was in effect before it?

What are officials saying about the features of the new law before it is approved?

Engineer Ahmad Fu'ad al-Juhari, assistant to the governor of Cairo for technical and engineering affairs says, "The outcome of our previous experiences indicates that it is necessary to have an agency that regulates the relationship between landlords and tenants instead of turning that task over to grievances committees. I believe that rent committees are more specialized in this regard than the courts. This makes the existence of rent committees as they are necessary since the courts basically depend on a report from an expert, whereas a committee's opinion is considered more comprehensive than that of one expert. Furthermore, there has been a backlog of court cases as a result of the fact that the committee's opinion was not considered final. This entailed a delay of over 5 years in settling rent cases."

Retention of Committees Essential for Relations Between Two Parties

Engineer Fu'ad al-Juhari is calling for "the retention of rent committees as a basis for relations between landlords and tenants. The feasibility of these committees has been established during the previous period, and their opinions have been accepted by landlords and tenants. The number of these committees must be increased, and they must be bolstered by providing them with the necessary means of transportation so that matters that are pending between landlords and tenants can be settled. Incentives for committee members must be reconsidered so that engineers who are capable of joining these committees can do so."

Regarding the proposed increase in rents [that were fixed in the past], Engineer Ahmad Fu'ad al-Juhari, assistant to the governor of Cairo for technical affairs said, "The thought of increasing rent is a constructive trend, especially since these are old buildings whose rents are low. Low rent makes a landlord refrain from carrying out the necessary refurbishing and maintenance operations for the building. I believe that the private sector can play a major role in contributing to a solution to the housing crisis. This increase [in rent] is considered one of the kinds of incentives for that. Tenants will not be hurt by paying the small proposed increase, especially since their incomes are increasing continuously.

The governor's assistant says, "Legalizing the payment of 2 years's rent in advance was also a positive trend. It will expedite the completion of buildings whose implementation is delayed at present because landlords do not have the necessary funds and because they will not go to the banks for funds because of the high interest rates."

The Advance Is a Contribution from the Tenant to the Landlord

Instead of having the landlord obtain the advance by illegitimate means that may endanger the relationship between him and the tenant, the legislator established a foundation that legitimized the payment of 2 years' rent in advance. The fact that this situation has been legalized protects tenants from having to pay sums of money without proof that they did so. Many tenants are now paying large sums of money as advances without any safeguards.

'Ali Hasan al-Imam, the authorized representative of the People's Council for the governorate of Cairo says that among the most important misgivings that he has about the new bill is the fact that the work of the rent committees, which is the basis for determining the relationship between the landlord and the tenant, has been changed and confined to the task of fixing rent in case a tenant has a grievance. He says that this means that thousands of cases will pile up in front of judges since it is not likely that the landlord will set the rent--and he is free to do so--that the tenant will approve of. Consequently, this will lead to many problems between landlords and tenants.

'Ali Hasan al-Imam is advocating that the rent committees be retained so that they would be the foundation between landlords and tenants for determining the rent. The committees had many advantages in the past since their appraisal was accepted by both parties. In fact, some landlords used to mention in the rent agreement the statement, "according to the committee's appraisal" without either party resorting to the courts. This strengthened relations between landlords and tenants.

Mr al-Imam says, "The subject of determining rents cannot be left to supply and demand since there is a big discrepancy in income, especially after the economic openness which led to the creation of a broad class [of people] who can purchase [goods and services] at the most expensive prices and who can afford to pay the most expensive rents because they can make up for the increase from the returns of projects. In such a case people whose incomes are limited will not be able to obtain housing at all. The matter of housing may be left to supply and demand under two conditions:

* When incomes are not so disparate; and

* When the supply of homes exceeds the demand.

Rents Were Very Low Before 1944

The authorized representative of the People's Council for Cairo adds, "The rents of homes that were built before the 1st of January 1944 were actually low. These rents must be increased, and the landlords must be obligated to conduct the necessary periodic repairs and maintenance."

Mahdi Judah says, "Undoutedly, there is a small group of landlords who will determine a reasonable amount of rent [for their property]. But what guarantees [for that] does the bill provide after the work of the rent committees has been changed? What is the difference between the greedy landlord and the temperate one? The abolishment of these committees will become a sword hanging over the heads of tenants." He says, "If the purpose of abolishing the rent committees is to encourage landlords, this menas that the landlord will be able to obtain more rent than the rental unit deserves. If the state does in fact want to encourage landlords, it has to offer them loans, and it has to go back to the old system of dispensing subsidized construction materials. Consequently, costs will be reduced, and this will lead to rent reduction."

Social Worker 'Abd-al-Ra'uf 'Aziz says, "If the purpose behind abolishing the rent committees or limiting their work is to curb the greed of landlords, I believe that this will never be achieved. The new housing law which has been in effect for less than 2 years had led to a rent increase in excess of 200 percent. A rental unit under the old law which was rented for 10 pounds is being rented now under Law No 49 for 1977 for more than 30 pounds. Landlords, nevertheless, are not satisfied, and they are still asking for better. This will be achieved if the committees are abolished."

He adds, "We were expecting the new bill to tighten controls on landlords who take advantage of people and who receive key money, but the bill made it clear that the penalty for accepting key money was civilian and not criminal. This would encourage landlords to continue accepting key money. I believe that this bill will not be approved by the Council of Ministers or by the People's Assembly especially since the state is now leaning towards reducing the burden that is borne by people whose incomes are limited."

Another tenant says, "The thought of limiting the work of the rent committees will backfire because we are in a society in which a greedy class has emerged. There is no better indication of that than the fact that President Anwar al-Sadat is standing firm these days against the class of merchants who are trading in the livelihoods of the people. The competition is clear: every class is trying to get more than the other. If [some people] are thinking of abolishing the committees, this can be done with regard to luxurious housing only; implementation of that is to be confined to the choice locations, which are the tourist areas."

A tenant says, "If rents for old homes were fixed on the basis of the prices that were in effect these buildings were built and in accordance to the actual cost of these buildings, how then can the rent be increased by a rate that varies from 5 to 15 percent over a period of 10 years? By the end of that period rent will have increased by approximately 50 or 150 percent. This is a major increase that could affect a large class of people [living on] limited incomes. Those people had established for themselves a lifestyle that is suitable to the rent [they have been paying]. In other words, the annual increase in rent will exceed the periodic increase in pay which an employee receives." This tenant is asking that this article of the new bill be reconsidered before it is approved since the bill does favor the landlord.

Landlords Calling for Retention of Rent Committees

Landlord Ahmad al-Disuqi is calling for the retention of the rent committees. He says, "If the relationship between landlords and tenants deteriorated under the rent committees even though the rent committees established what may be a fair foundation for a relationship between them, I cannot at all imagine that there will be a relationship between landlord and tenant if the committees are abolished. As is its custom the human spirit is not satisfied and asks for more. I believe that all tenants may file suits against landlords to determine [their] rents. This will lead to numerous problems as a result of the poor relationship between landlords and tenants and the lack of confidence with them. This will lead to a backlog of thousands of court cases waiting for their turn in a long line of thousands." Mr al-Disuqi supports the increases in old rents.

Ahmad Muhammad Khalaf, the director general of disbursements in the governorate of Cairo and a member of the rent committee says, "The proposed new housing bill is undoubtedly advantageous to both landlord and tenant. Some of its articles, however, must be reconsidered, especially regarding letting the landlord estimate the amount of the rent and confining the task of the committee to making an appraisal after the landlord [sic] files a grievance. I believe that the committees will be confronted with grievances from tenants because it is unlikely that the landlord and the tenant will agree on a reasonable rent."

On the proposed increase in the rent of old homes Ahmad Khalaf says that such an increase is necessary in homes built before 1944 since returns from those buildings are low. "Low returns may cause the landlord to neglect maintenance of the buildings, and that could [ultimately] cause the building to be torn down. But the proposed increase for the other groups [of buildings] must be reconsidered because these buildings were built at a time when prices had risen somewhat. The most important positive aspect of that increase is the reduction of the returns of buildings from 10 to 7 percent, and this will lead to a reduction in rents that will be in the interests of the tenant.

Attorney Kamal Ibrahim, undersecretary of the Ministry of Reconstruction and Housing says, "The new housing bill, which is still being considered, has tried to establish a balance between the landlord and the tenant. This is due to the legislator's conviction that the private sector plays a major role in contributing towards a solution to the housing crisis. Among the most important advantages to the tenant that the bill has determined are [the following]:

"* The bill limited returns from buildings to 7 percent instead of the 10 percent limitation in the current law. The 7 percent return is the basis for determining rents. This will help reduce rents by about 30 percent. In order to avoid damages to the landlord from this reduction, the state will bear some of the burdens: the revenues landlords receive from buildings will not be included in the public revenue coffers.

"* The new bill exempts the tenant from all taxes which represent over 51 percent [of his income] if the rent [he pays] for one room exceeds 10 pounds.

"* The unjustified delay in completing buildings: rent in this case will be determined in accordance with the prices that were in effect when the building should have been completed, so that the tenant would not be hurt by the price increases when the rent is set.

"* Ten percent of the profits earned by public sector companies are to be earmarked to finance housing units for their employees."

Attorney Kamal Ibrahim, the undersecretary of the Ministry of Reconstruction says, "The bill did not give a landlord [the prerogative to] set rent without [any] controls. The bill rather stipulated that the returns from a building were not to exceed seven percent of the cost of the land and the building. If returns [and accordingly rents] exceeded that percentage, the tenant may appeal to the rent committee so it can correct the situation."

He says, "The rent committees will stay as they are. No one is thinking of abolishing them. But there is an inclination to give landlords the freedom to come to an agreement with tenants over the amount of rent. If they do not agree, the landlord may file a grievance."

"Likewise, when the legislator proposed that the advance be 2 years' [rent], his intention was to have that advance secured instead of what is happening now, which is the payment of an advance that may not be acknowledged.

Balance Between Landlord and Tenant in Interests of Both Parties

Attorney Kamal Ibrahim says, "The purpose of the proposed increase, which is between 15 and 5 percent, over a 10-year period is to compensate the landlords whose rents are low, especially [for buildings that were built] before 1944. This increase will not be taken by the landlord only: one-third will be for the landlord; one-third will be for refurbishing and maintenance; and the last third will be for popular housing. This increase is still under consideration."

Engineer Taha 'Abd-al-Qadir, technical office manager for the governor's assistant for technical affairs says, "I believe that the thought of making the rent committees settle tenants' grievances against the appraisals of landlords will increase investments in the field of housing. This will encourage landlords to turn their savings into investments in this area. Returns from buildings will be proportionate to the prevailing interest rate in banks. Thus supply and demand will be balanced, and matters will return to normal after a period that may come to 3 years."

Engineer Taha 'Abd-al-Qadir adds, "Rent committees have not settled relations between landlords and tenants throughout the past period. The evidence of this lies in the thousands of court cases that are now pending in the courts awaiting settlement on matters pertaining to problems between landlords and tenants."

He says, "At present the work of the committees is advantageous to tenants at the expense of landlords. This is because the state is incapable of enabling the tenant to pay the landlord the real rent, and this is the result of the current wages policy and the discrepancy in incomes. If the state does in fact wish to help the tenant, it may build suitable housing for tenants instead of helping them at the cost of preventing landlords from obtaining suitable rents for their housing units."

[Second Installment by Muhammad Ahmad Hammam]

[Text] Why Are There 28,000 Vancant Apartments? 71 Percent of Urban Housing Lacks Sewage; 52 Percent Is Without Running Water; 38 Percent Without Electricity; We Need 1.8 Million Housing Units So We Can Look Forward to Future with Confidence and Reassurance.

If the proposed new housing bill which is now under consideration and under study is the beginning of a new chapter in relations between landlords and tenants and if we are really determined to overcome this crisis, what is called for is for us to reveal the magnitude of the crisis and its real features in figures to all the experts who are looking into that bill.

It has become evident that we have about 28,000 vacant homes whose owners for one reason or another do not want to have them occupied.

It has also become evident that 71 percent of the homes in the cities have no sewage; that 52 percent have no running water; and that 38 percent have no electricity.

It has also become evident that we need 1.8 million housing units so we can look forward to the future with confidence and reassurance.

At any rate the dialogue which was begun yesterday by "AL-AHRAM Investigations" to discuss the new housing bill continues.

The question with which officials are now preoccupied is that of the housing problem and finding radical solutions to it. Announcing the organization of a national housing agency was merely an announcement that the real battle for confronting that problem and for finding suitable solutions to it had begun. The recent ministerial decision to amend the ratio of the loans which are granted to cooperative housing and to individuals was part of the attempts [that are being made] to find a solution. The government is making an effort towards that end at this stage of [the effort to] build and to forge the foundations of the new society.

But the question is this: what is the magnitude [of the problem] that officials have to confront?

This question indicates that there is a need to explain and to present the real picture of the aspects of this crisis since it is not enough that citizens are complaining of the fact that houses are not available.

In fact, the real magnitude of the problem is much greater than that. The importance of this problem lies in the fact that it is forcing some people to look seriously into the aspects and the symptoms of the problem so as to come up with a diagnosis and a remedy that would be suitable to the disease. People should not be surprised by this expression because the housing crisis in Egypt is in reality a social disease and a defect in that social structure. How [can we make such a statement]?

[We can make such a statement because] official data that are available from the last census of the population and housing in Egypt, which was conducted in 1976, indicate that the number of existing buildings is 1,580,000 buildings and that these buildings contain 3,587,000 housing units. Dwellings that are used as private residences represent 94.5 percent of that total; units occupied by business represent 1.7 percent of that total. It is curious that we note a significant matter here: there are about 128,000 vacant dwellings. This [figure] represents 3.4 percent of total dwellings in urban areas. This phenomenon can only be explained by one self-evident fact: the landlords' desire to await suitable opportunities to realize the highest profit from these dwellings despite the devastating crisis that citizens are experiencing!

But it is certain that the recent bill which regulates the relationship between the landlord and the tenant and which will restrict ownership to one housing unit will increase the number of these vacant units, and the question then will become the need to regulate the distribution of these units to the citizens who need them.

Housing and the Crisis of Utilities

The fact is that the existing population figures have another meaning. This residential stock is divided into apartments and separate rooms.

These separate rooms which are mentioned in the census signify a shanty, a cabin, a garage and a hut.

This means that these separate rooms have been used as homes because the supply of housing cannot meet the needs of citizens within the limits of their economic standards. Consequently, these rooms are not suitable for housing nor even for human habitation. Without bathrooms, kitchens or running water they are merely shelters. The number of these rooms amounts to 677,000 units. That is 20 percent of the total housing units designated for private housing and business. Cairo's share of that ratio comes to 43 percent.

But are the basic utilities available to all these units?

Unfortunately, 52 percent of the buildings in cities have no water; 38 percent have no electricity; and 71 percent have no sewage. The real significance of this situation, according to Dr Mahya 'Ali Zaytun, assistant professort of economics at the College of Commerce of the Girls' Branch of al-Azhar University, is the fact that a non-negligible part of the buildings in cities are considered inaccessible to the principal utilities which are indispensable to a dwelling. What is even more serious than that--and of crucial importance--is the fact that 31 percent of the families that were available at the time of the census do not have running water in their buildings and that 23 percent do not have electricity. Similarly, the decline in the number of families that do not have utilities compared with the ratio of dwellings is due to the fact that the buildings which have utilities are designated for poor people. Consequently, they are made up of rooms or a limited number of housing units. This makes the number of families living in every building less than the number of families living in the buildings that have utilities. Most of these buildings consist of a number of floors that is not inconsiderable or a larger number of housing units.

In her study of housing in Egypt Dr Mahya Zaytun says, "There are no data about the ages of buildings even though a large ratio of these buildings are considered old. It has been estimated that the number of condemned buildings in Cairo and Alexandria in 1970 was about 140,000 buildings. In the other cities it was estimated at about 60,000 buildings or about 700,000 housing units."

If we were to turn to rural areas, we will discover the deterioration of the housing condition there. Available data indicate that 36 percent of rural families do not have any source of pure water and 81 percent do not have electricity as a source of light.

The sum total of this picture is that the condition of housing in the traditionally popular areas, which are usually old areas, is deteriorating. This is the case in Bulaq, Misr al-Qadimah and al-Sharabiyyah. As a result of residential encroachment, areas that were originally villages are now within city limits. These were usually centers where migrants from rural areas lived, as is the case in Shubra al-Khaymah and 'Ayn Shams in Cairo. In fact, the pictures include the distorted housing as is the case with those who live in cemeteries, huts and tin structures. It is estimated that the number of people who are living in cemeteries in Cairo alone is over 100,000 families. On the other hand research indicates that the decline in the income of families that are living in popular housing areas is due to the fact that a large percentage of them is trying to utilize their homes in some economic activities.

Towards a New Understanding of the Problem

If this is a diminutive picture of the aspects of the housing crisis in Egypt as it appears through the census information that is available and the social surveys [that may be found] at research centers, the question that is being raised now is not that of searching for a solution because the solution is known: it is meeting the needs of citizens. But the question is rather that of the magnitude or the extent of [meeting] those needs in an urgent fashion and that of their magnitude in the future.

Dr Mahya Zaytun points out the need for defining to officials some notions of the philosophy of housing in Egypt so we can determine the magnitude of the requirements.

Our interest must be focused on housing needs and not on the demand for housing. The demand for housing means the desire to acquire a residence, provided that this desire is accompanied by a purchasing power so that this demand can be realized in the marketplace. Housing needs, however, signify the necessity of providing housing to anyone who does not have shelter and to anyone whose dwelling does not meet a suitable standard of essential, sanitary and social conditions. It is this latter notion that the National Housing Authority must adopt because such a notion does imply the welfare of our society. Regarding current housing needs in urban areas, some people estimate those to be approximately 1.8 million units. These units will replace dwellings that are unsuitable and dwellings that have been condemned, and they will reduce the competition for existing dwellings.

Officials have to make their estimates of future housing needs until the year 2000 now. These estimates are to be based on the expected increase in the population until the year 2000 or on the increase in the rates of urbanization until the same year. In addition, officials are to consider the structural condition of the residential stock according to which will be determined the replacement housing that will be necessary for the future.

All this [must be done] so we can overcome the problem, avoid its future dangers and establish a sound society that would offer its citizens the best of good things as well as security.

SYRIAN AMBASSADOR LAUDS REVOLUTIONARY PROGRAM

Tehran KEYHAN in Persian 18 Sep 80 p 3

[Text] PARS NEWS AGENCY—The Syrian Ambassador to Tehran, Ibrahim al-Yunis, expressed in an interview his viewpoints about the Syria-Libya unification. Concerning the merger he said, "We consider it a fundamental factor because unity is the prerequisite of our political, economic and cultural life."

Regarding the Syrian-Libyan merger, Ibrahim al-Yunis said, "It aims at becoming self-sufficient symbiotically. Division is a heritage of colonialism still lingering on in our countries. Therefore, our struggle continues. As Hafez Assad has put it, Syria has not stipulated any condition for our union except that the union should be achieved for the sake of our deprived people. We consider unity a basic factor because it is a requisite of our political, economic and cultural life. We want to build a civilization of Arab unity."

The Ambassador was asked, "You said that this unity is a nationalistic one, whereas we see that the Algerian Minister of Religious Affairs says that Arab nationalism was tried to no avail. We should rely on Islam. If this is so, should the Syria-Libya unity not be an Islamic unity?"

Ibrahim al-Yunis replied, "The terms used in Iran differ from those used in other countries but the meanings are the same. Nationality does not conflict with Islam in any way. It is the usage of terms that differ in this area. As you see we attend most of the Islamic conferences."

The Ambassador was reminded that the call to unification was first made by Col Qadhdhafi and since it was promptly acceded to by Syria it seems that Syria had completely felt the necessity of this merger. The Syrian Ambassador to Tehran said, "A big conspiracy against the Palistinian nation has been hatched in the Camp David Accord. For this reason, any unity that takes shape against Imperialism which is actually antagonistic to nations, it will win our supports."

"The unity of Syria and Egypt against the regime occupying Jerusalem was a commendable unity but the Camp David Agreement gave birth to a second Israel and killed the previous unity."

The Syrian Ambassador was asked, "Considering the sterile unity attempted on numerous occasions previously, how much hope do you attach to this latest unity?"

The Ambassador replied, "This unity is imperative and it is our duty to attempt it tens of times until we arrive at a unity that serves our interests."

The Ambassador was reminded that the geographical distance between Syria and Libya would create problems. He was then asked whether this matter had been studied carefully.

The Syrian Ambassador answered, "As our leaders have said the very fact of our unity is a revolutionary concept. A revolutionary thing does not abort itself by the anticipated consequences. As the colonialism and imperialism of the regime occupying Jerusalem have not sprung from the love of Prophet Moses, but have been pursuing other goals, we should continue our struggle."

Asked what role Islam played in this unity, the Ambassador said, "We are Moslems and respect Islam. Islamic religious teachings even run through our state laws. If we run into any problems we revert to the Islamic theology and if the Islamic theology provides no precedent we deduct our solution by giving sway to justice and truth." Concerning the official view of Syria on the coup d'etat in Turkey, the Ambassador said, "Our government has not yet adopted an official position vis-a-vis this matter. We do not want to be dragged into secondary issues at the cost of losing sight of our principal objectives."

Asked about the impact of the role of Imam Khomeyni and the Islamic revolution of Iran on the people of the region, the Ambassador said, "We are of the same opinion as the Islamic revolution of Iran concerning the liberation of the occupied lands. Imam Khomeyni has such power that any time he wills he can put an end to unjust relationships in the world."

KERMANSHAH TRIBESMEN JOIN MILITARY MANEUVERS

Tehran KEYHAN in Persian 7 Sep 80 p 4

[Text] Kermanshah, KEYHAN's Despatched Reporter--Some 2,000 tribesmen of Kermanshah staged a military and guerrilla warfare maneuver with their own weapons and ammunitions and displayed their combativeness and individual dexterity in Mahidasht Plain.

Yesterday about 2,000 members of Kalhor, Kakavand, Jalalvand, Osmanvand, Balavand, Zardalan, Halilan, Sanjabi and a number of other tribes performed their intensive drills and staged a spectacular military maneuver in Mahidasht Plain before Pirhoseyni, the Presidential Aid, Ayatollah Kermani, the Imam's Representative in the Western region of the country and the deputy of the Islamic Consultative Assembly (Majles), the Governor-General of Kermanshah, Hojjatoleslam Majd, the Supervisor of the Iranian Mass Mobilization Organization, and hundreds of eager compatriots onlooking. The exercise was carried out without the smallest financial assistance from the government agencies or revolutionary institutions.

Before the military maneuver started, Pirhoseyni, the Presidential Aide, spoke at length about the unity and solidarity of the tribes and the impressive results thereof in uplifting Islam and creating security in the country and in the region. After him, a representative of the tribes and also Hojjatoleslam Majd spoke about the tribal problems and the arming of the tribesmen who were decent and devoted to the Revolution, respectively.

At this point, a number of the members of the Kermanshah Mass Mobilization Organization marched past, followed by the tribesmen. In this process they performed two military operations. The armed horsemen, too, went into a series of offensive operations and started shooting. Started sharp at 12 noon with the reading of some verses from the Holy Koran, the exercise lasted until 5 p.m.

Major Mo'azzen, who had taught the tribesmen military art during the past 10 days reported: "These valiant and courageous tribesmen, with their faith and power, can progress to the heart of Iraq to make their prayer at the holy shrine of Imam'Ali, Peace Be Unto Him."

Before the maneuver, the Governor-General of Kermanshah talked to the tribesmen and said, "After purging the rural areas and identifying the devoted persons, we shall issue weapons licenses to the devouts who own weapons and give arms to those devouts who do not have them. This is so they can preserve the security of the region effectively and to protect their homes and abodes against the possible dangers posed by the counterrevolutionaries. The tribesmen who took part in the maneuver used their own weapons and ammunitions and many of them were reluctant to leave the field even after the end of the maneuver and the beginning of the ceasefire.

The KEYHAN reporter adds in his report that despite the border skirmishes, Kermanshahan is in peace and the armed forces are completely in control of the situation.

Also with the unity of the tribes around Kermanshah and other parts of the province which was exemplified by their 5-hour military and guerrilla maneuvers, larger devoted and prepared forces shall be at the service of the people in the future in order to preserve the security of the region and to keep the aliens and the counterrevolutionaries at bay. Of course, despite the excellent morale and the extra-ordinary power of these zealous tribesmen who participated in the maneuvers with such a great enthusiasm, a great number of them must necessarily receive training because sometime later when some of the tribesmen have to take their animals migrating to the border areas or to the nearby regions they will face the enemies of Iran and will have to be equipped well in addition to their courage and zeal so that their significance to the preservation of the security of this land will be clear and so that they may be more successful against injustice and evil."

DIRECTOR OUTLINES ACTIVITIES OF RED CRESCENT SOCIETY

Tehran KEYHAN in Persian 7 Sep 80 p 15

[Text] The new Director of the Red Crescent Society of the Islamic Republic of Iran, Dr Ali Asghar Behzadnia, in a radio and television interview spoke about the plans and programs for reconstructing the Society and interfacing the operations of the Red Crescent Society with the goals of the revolution and of the Islamic Republic. He said that the Red Crescent Society would try to help the coreligionist, Third World and, generally speaking, the oppressed countries of the world--defined by the Koran--in the time of peace.

Concerning the creation of coordination between the Red Crescent Society and the Ministry of Health and Welfare in the field of medical treatment, the Director of the Red Crescent Society said that the former Red Lion and Sun Society and now the Red Crescent Society had medical treatment centers all over the country. As testified by all the persons who had benefited from their services, these centers rendered valuable services. He added, "In the rural areas, perhaps the most orderly buildings which are habitable and usable belong to the Red Crescent Society. But, unfortunately, all the hospitals and clinics of the Society were turned over to the Ministry of Health and Welfare in a hurry. Of course, the said Ministry also belongs to this nation, but this transfer caused their efficiency and managerial ability to suffer and their effectiveness to drop, whereas this Society reaches the rural heartland with its hospitals and clinics and has been rendering service as a medical treatment network. Where the hospitals and clinics could not reach, the relief workers of the Society reached with their service. It should now be rightly admitted that in this medicine shortage crisis the Red Crescent Society helps the entire country with its resources. Thanks to its relationships with the relief and medical treatment organizations of the world, the Red Crescent Society can easily get what cannot be obtained through the governmental commercial and other means."

Dr Behzadnia went on to say, "Fortunately, with the understanding that prevails and with the devout and committed officials that we personally know in the Ministry of Health and Welfare, the solution of this problem is very easy. Therefore, the aim is not to have this Organization under this roof or under this management. The aim is to cooperate and to help the Iranians and the human beings. We have actually one goal but are cooperating in two departments. However, it is unfortunate that in the atmosphere that was created after the revolution, each organization or group acted in its own name. This duplicity and multiplicity and flip-flop is not only impermissible when it comes to ensure the health and safety of people, but is a great sin. We believe that medical treatment services should be handled by an organized management."

Regarding the manner of the operations and management of the Red Crescent Society, Dr Behzadnia said that the Red Crescent Society "is the only organization that can be managed under a five-member board." According to "our new plan, we replaced the management with five experienced managers who are devoted to the revolution and to the Islamic ideological principles. With the approval of these five persons who constitute an executive board, any decision can be implemented."

With respect to the task forces of the Red Crescent Society, the Director of the Society said, "Part of our reorganization plan in the Society is to strengthen and expand the task forces. We have discussed this with our colleagues, the doctors and relief workers, and we decided to strengthen these groups. Each group comprises a surgeon, a general doctor, an internal diseases physician, and even specializing surgeon and pharmaceutists and relief workers. They are volunteers. So far we have formed three to four task groups. We hope to send them to the war zones and to the non-war zones. We plan to have a "mother" hospital to serve as the hub of the task project where task groups will be prepared for being dispatched to designated places to give services." He added, "One unfortunate thing that I have to say is that unfortunately as a result of the medical treatment plans and thoughts put forth after the revolution which were products of haste or, God forbid, negligence, medical treatment in this country has been plagued with incoordination and stagnation so that many of the experts have left and many more do not set their hearts on the work. As envisioned in our plan, we hope to attract the specializing forces, whether in the country or from abroad, who are devoted to the revolution and who have managerial skill and experience, as the Imam put it. I am sure we shall succeed."

Behzadnia said, "If I solve the financial problems for the experts and if I am not attacked and villified for it from all sides, obviously any physician desires to take one week off in every six months or devote one month a year so that he may serve his fellow men in the various parts of the country."

Touching on the importance of restructuring the Youths and Volunteers Department of the Society, Dr Behzadnia said, "The Red Crescent Society was really people-oriented. Apart from the higher echelons of the Society who were affiliated with the previous regime, the workers of the Society in the provinces and in the Capital were mostly people-oriented and praiseworthy, so much so that when the principal managers of the Society were dismissed, there would not be so much need for further purging. As it was reported then, apparently there were no more than 12 to 14 persons who had been connected with the SAVAK and the former regime. But the bulk of the personnel of the Society or, so to speak, those who served, are people-oriented and their work is laudable. There is no doubt that this Society has been successful in its social and populistic activities, excepting one department of it, viz. its Youths Department. My study shows that its plannings did not have the contents which is useful to the Islamic Republic of today. In this particular department, the idea is to prepare the youths for the goals of the Islamic Republic so that they are trained to be workers, scouts and helpers of the community, specially in the Ideological Section." The Society Director then spoke about the unwarranted take-over of the Youths Houses of the Society by the revolutionary institutions and the need to reopen these houses. He said, "This Society has 24 to 25 houses across the country. Each of these has branches which, put together, cover a great expanse of the country. Yesterday we appointed as the deputy chief of this Section Dr Ali Afrouz, a specialist, a Moslem, efficient and active brother, so that a new page is turned by his putting a person in charge of each of these houses in order that educational, ideological, relief worker training and local re-educational programs are implemented to benefit the youths.

In another part of his interview, Dr Behzadnia spoke about the necessity of preclusion of catastrophes. He said, "Instead of sitting idle and waiting for catastrophes to occur, we should try to preclude these. To achieve this with the knowledge that we have of the geographical and natural features of our country, we have set up a special section in the Society and it has been already manned, too. Its personnel are to forecast the services required in the form of the supply of tents, blankets, medicines and the basic needs. They are also supposed to study the local conditions. For instance, our farmers sow their fields for dry-farming and they build their houses next to their farms. The conditions the rural-folks opt for are vulnerable, because the same thawing snow that waters and ripens their farms can ruin their lives if unharnessed. Therefore, by proper planning we can build healthy and safe houses for these farmers farther from their farms with the help of the Ministry of Housing and other responsible organizations so that their houses are not in danger while their farms are prosperous. It is at this juncture that the issue of experts comes up again and a discussion with the Workers Program should be arranged. We hope that this atmosphere of chastising and slandering the experts and the devouts currently permeating the community may be dispelled and an atmosphere of understanding and inspiring devotion in the people may take its place.

CHRISTIANS CONTINUE TO LEAVE COUNTRY

PARIS LE MONDE in French 12 Aug 80 p 6

[Article by special correspondent J.P. Peroncel-Hugoz]

This, the least known among Christians communities in the Arab world, has lived through many tragedies* but has been more fortunate than the Iraqi Jews--practically all of whom have had to leave the country. Under the current Baasist regime, which chooses to remain secular, it [the Christian community] is becoming more and more involved in the life of the city. "Since the 1958 revolution, never have we breathed so freely," we were told by a priest, whose statement was echoed by a mother and by a Christian working in hotel management.

Still, in spite of administrative obstacles, the exodus of Mesopotamia's Christians, which began half a century ago in the village of Telkef, near Mossoul, is continuing, chiefly to the United States and Australia. After using the Lebanese and then the Greek exit routes--25,000 Iraqis, most of them Christians, are said to have traveled through Athens in 1979 in order to obtain U.S. visas--now a route through Eastern countries or through Egypt is chosen by the emigrants arriving from the country between the Tigris and Euphrates rivers. They may be poor people from the Bataouiyine neighborhood in Baghdad just as likely as residents of modern villas bordering the river, or else northern villagers.

A Divided Christendom

Like Egypt with its Copts, Lebanon with its Maronites, or Syria with its Greek Orthodox, Iraq has its "national" church. That church, designated as "Assyrian" in reference to remote pagan ancestors, is not devoid of the divisions and subdivisions that plague Eastern Christendom.

* We'll only mention the massacres of Assyrians by the Kurds in 1843 and 1845 and those committed in 1933 by some members of the Royal Iraqi Army, followed by the deportation of the Nestorian patriarch to Nicosia.

Thus the Assyrians are divided into the "Chaldean" Catholic Church (another remnant of ancient times), including some 70 percent of Iraqi Christians, and the Nestorian Assyrian Church. Although all other Christians living on Arab soil have long been Arabianized, linguistically speaking (except for the Armenians, who in fact are not indigenous to the country), their [the Assyrians'] liturgical language as well as their mother tongue* is Syriac, the latest stage in the evolution of Aramaic, the language spoken by Christ. However, Arabic is of course the working language of Christians in Iraq.

From the time of the Ephesus Ecumenical Council in 431, which condemned Nestorius, patriarch of Constantinople, for distinguishing two separate persons in Jesus Christ, until 1552, when a large number of Assyrians (since then designated as Chaldeans) united with Rome, Iraqi Christians have formed a single community. Today Catholics are under the authority of the Patriarch of Babylon, residing in Baghdad, while the Nestorians' spiritual headquarters are in Chicago, in the United States.

In addition to these indigenous Christians, there are in Iraq followers of the Catholic Armenian or Gregorian (Orthodox Church, of the Latin Church and the Syrian Catholic or Orthodox Church--all Iraqi nationals. The "Syrian" Church, which also uses Aramaic (or Syriac) as its liturgical language, is intellectually very active, especially its Catholic section, which for the past 16 years in Mossoul, has been publishing AL-FIKR, AL-MASIHI [Christian Thought], one of the best Arabic-language Christian publications, with a monthly circulation of 3,500.

The number of Christian faithful is a state secret in Iraq, as it is everywhere in the Near East. Still, until recently, their total number was generally estimated at 600,000. However, according to foreign experts, the first reliable general census, conducted in the country 2 years ago, showed 1 million Christians faced with 12 million Moslems, the latter divided into Shi'ite Arabs, Sunnite Arabs, and Sunnite Kurds, not to mention some other small minorities, such as the 60,000 to 100,000 Yezidi peasants who profess some sort of restored worship of Ibbis (Satan)--and who are, therefore, with some exaggeration dubbed "devil worshippers"--or the 20 to 3,000 Shebans, a syncretistic sect from the Mesopotamian marshes.

* Soureth, the contemporary Aramaic (or Syriac) spoken in Iraq, is almost as different from liturgical Aramaic (or Syriac) as French is from Latin.

 Aramaic is also spoken in a few Christian villages in Syria.

 The Latin Church, which originated during the Crusades, has always been linked to Rome. In addition to Arabic speakers (some of whom come from India, as far as Iraq is concerned), in the East it serves the needs of Roman Catholics traveling through the country. In Iraq Latins have an archibishop (the current one is French born), whose fictitious seat is in Babylon, as is that of the Chaldean patriarch.

A Poem

Even though inequalities subsist, for instance the fact that a Christian has no right to marry a Moslem women, Baas, which has been in power in Iraq since 1968, follows a policy aiming to abolish religious discrimination. Baas has also taken a great many steps to calm the fears of a community that has traditionally been suspicious and withdrawn. The ambassador of the Holy See became dean of the diplomatic corps. Christian pupils were excused from studying an Islamic textbook containing some uncomplimentary references to their religion. With great ceremony, President Saddam Usayn received some of his Christian compatriots who had become Americans, and he had gifts of money delivered to them for the purpose of building churches in the United States. He sent several donations to the Iraqi clergy and in 1979 paid a surprise visit to a Baghdad church while mass was being celebrated.

"We are appreciative of all this, but we still intend to emigrate in order to raise our children as we please," we were told in confidence by the head of a family, referring to the nationalization of all religious schools in Iraq, which took place 5 years ago. That step was directed mostly at the Iranian Shi'ites, but the Christians were not spared. He was also referring to the "Baasization" of the minds that goes on from kindergarten to university. Many Christians, however, state that they have joined Baas, a pan-Arabic, non-sectarian nationalistic party founded in 1939 by Michel Afiak, a Syrian Christian. They join it "out of conviction" or "to strengthen a regime that has outgrown the literal interpretation of Islamic law."

The Chaldean Church, quietly ruled since 1958 by Patriarch Paul II Cheikho, around 75 years old at this time, has neither the political clout of the Lebanese churches, nor the spiritual renewal of the Egyptian Copts, which might perhaps enable it to slow down the exodus of one of the East's oldest Christian communities. On the other hand, through the friendships that it has cultivated within Moslem society, the Chaldean Church could serve as a model to many other Eastern communities. What an incredible sight, in that same Middle East where the fires of the Iranian revolution have, nearly everywhere, kindled the move to reintroduce religion as a factor in social relationships, what an incredible sight indeed to see Sheik Jalal Hanafi, renowned Baghdad preacher, honor the patriarch of Babylon on his 50 years of priesthood by reciting a poem on "the virtues shared by Christians and Moslems!"

DEVELOPMENT OF ISLAMIC ARCHITECTURE REVIEWED

Jiddah ARAB NEWS in English 16 Sep 80 p 8

[Article by Yousef El-maleh: "The Foundation of Islamic Architecture in Medina"]

[Text]

Of all the arts, Arabic architecture has proved the most enduring, its trends having shaped the face of the Arab world. Patterns and edifices in the cities from which various schools emerged were all united by the distinctive characteristics of Arab Islam.

Islamic architecture was first modelled on the Prophet Muhammad's house in Medina, built by himself and his companions soon after the "hijra," his departure from Mecca to Medina.

The Prophet's house was used as the first "masjid" mosque for Muslims. It was a square enclosure surrounded by walls of brick and stone; part of it, probably the northern portion where the Prophet led the prayers, was roofed.

The congregation knelt facing north, the direction of the city of Jerusalem, and this direction or "qibla" was marked in some way. In 624, ("hijra 3") the objective for prayer was changed from Jerusalem to Mecca. "Al-Haram al-Nubawi al-Sharief" in Medina, as the first mosque is usually called, has been undergoing extension and renovation for fourteen centuries.

With the spread of Islam, mosques and Muslim houses were built in the new land.

With the shifting of the Islamic Caliphate from Medina to Damascus during the Ummayyads, Islamic architecture began to develop further, embracing palaces, forts, tombs and lavish mosques.

Perhaps the most noted of the early mosques is "Masjid al-Sakehrah," the "Dome of the Rock" Mosque. It was first begun in Jerusalem in 643 near the simple mosque which Caliph Umar Ibn al-Khatab had erected four years earlier. The mosque was built around the rock believed by Muslims to be the place from which the Prophet Muhammad ascended to heaven.

Reconditioned more than once, the mosque is a building of impressive size and monumental character, gorgeously decorated. A concentric annular structure, it consists of wooden dome with 16 windows. The lower-half was originally panelled with marble and the upper portion with glass mosaic on a beautiful golden background.

Internally all the arcades were likewise decorated with mosaic, and the walls with quartered marble panelling; each slab was cut in half and opened like a book, so that the veining ran towards the joint.

Al-Walid (705-715), the architect Caliph of Damascus, not only began the reconditioning of the silver-domed "al-Aqsa" mosque near the site of the Dome of the Rock, but also ordered the building of the Great Mosque in Damascus, this was considered one of the wonders of the world at that time, and the mosque was used as a model by many Muslim architects.

An outstanding example of architecture, the Umayyad Mosque is one of the most beautiful Islamic sites in the world. It is a masterpiece of art with its magnificent construction and gold engraved decorations.

The building, which was erected over the ruins of a temple of Jupiter and a Byzantine church, was completed in the early 8th century. The 145-yard long prayer-hall of the mosque is surrounded by beautiful arcades and walls decorated with finely-made mosaics. The shrine of St. John the Baptist, is found in the prayer hall of the mosque.

Gradually, as the people embraced Islam, isolated towns and small cities began to progress toward a framework of national unity. These three mosques were used by early Muslim architects as models for mosques which became landmarks of every Islamic center, houses of worship and notable monuments.

Style of mosques

Mosques gave Muslim cities their characteristic shape and personality. They still represent the Islamic style of architecture, and crystalize its features.

Mosques generally varied to some extent in plan and style but always retained the same basic features. One of the main reasons for this standarization of form is found in the annual pilgrimage to mecca.

The structural plan of a mosque took the shape of a rectangular open court enclosed on the four sides by vaulted halls or cloisters, surrounded by a wall with gates. The site is open to the courtyard or "sahn," usually covered with woven mats or rugs.

On the side of the main gate, which is arched and exquisitely decorated, there are plumbing systems sometimes in the form of beautiful fountains. These are mainly to provide water for performing the "wudu" (-ablution) which is a necessary preliminary to the prayers.

Mosques, as sacred houses, must be constructed in a way that enables the believers to face "Qiblah," the ordained direction for worshipping the Lord. The direction of Mecca or more precisely the Kaaba, symbol of spiritual power, is indicated by a niche ("mihrab") in the appropriate wall.

The wall is generally covered with mosaics, and the frame of the niche is almost invariably adorned with Quranic verses. Next to the niche in the wall stands a stepped pulpit or "mimbar" which takes the form of a throne. From here the Imam delivers his sermon.

The external characteristics of the mosque feature minarets ("mazzanah") and domes ("guba"). The minaret is a tall, pencil-shaped tower usually built over the doorway. The interior space is taken up by a spiral staircase leading up to a landing. Some minarets contain more than one landing. They are fine pieces of architecture believed to be pointing to heaven and God, and are used for giving out the call to prayer ("adhan").

Domes were adopted and became one of the most remarkable features of Islamic architecture. Usually there is a central dome with smaller domes tapering at the top in harmony with the minarets. Most domes are covered with dazzling glazed tiles and a substructure of glass mosaic, incorporating arched windows of coloured glass. The domes are awe-inspiring, designed to lift the Muslim's eyes to heaven, 'the seat of God.'

Arab domes, which gave Muslim cities a mood of poetic reverie, influenced the design of the City of the Sun, a Utopian city conceived by Tommaso Campanella (1568-1639) an Italian Renaissance philosopher and poet. Some Islamic cities are covered with massive domes and lofty minarets rising above the flat-roofed towns.

A few of the minor arts also contributed in one way or another to the architecture of the mosque: stucco, glazed tiles, metal and wood for instance were employed to create geometric and epigraphic designs of great intricacy, delicacy and charm.

Muslim interest in mathematics shows in the use of complicated geometrical patterns to cover walls that would otherwise remain bare. This style, termed "arabesque," influenced European designs from the end of the Middle Ages.

The Arabic language, the language of the revelation of the Quran, was also used in the form of calligraphy to decorate islamic architecture. Inscriptions were written at important places such as the entrance gates, around the 'mihrab' niche and below the dome.

Not only verses from the Quran were used: Arabic characters often also expressed the purposes of the building through prose or verse, sometimes adding the name of the ruler, the date and the architect.

The craftsmen of medieval Europe flatteringly imitated Arab calligraphy and so came unwittingly to adorn the coin of a European king and even the cross, undoubtedly not for its Islamic message but for the sake of decoration.

The building of mosques is credited to the divine guidance of Islamic architects and their skills. These architects worked as mathematicians, astronomers, craftsmen, calligraphers, illuminators and instructors, their genius always in harmony with the faith and needs of rich princes.

The mosque, spiritual center of early Muslim cities, crystalizes the Islamic style architecture, while its primary function remains that of a place where man prostrates himself before God.

IDF INTELLIGENCE CHIEF ANALYZES MIDDLE EAST SITUATION

Tel Aviv 'AL HAMISHMAR (Weekly Supplement) in Hebrew 10 Sep 80 pp 8-9, 16

[Interview with Major General Yehoshua Sagi, chief of the IDF Intelligence Branch, by Alex Fishman]

[Text] The central tier of the State of Israel's intelligence community has been Military Intelligence. By virtue of his position, the chief of the Intelligence Branch of the General Staff is responsible for warnings and political estimates. The Yom Kippur War did not significantly change the military arm's status in the intelligence community. Its head holds a power which has few parallels in the western world. The opinion of the chief of the Intelligence Branch has at times a decisive influence on the determination of policy.

The current chief of the Intelligence Branch, Major General Yehoshua Sagi, 47, belongs to the generation of officers who began their military service in the IDF after the War of Liberation. He has spent most of his service, beginning from his induction in 1951, in the Intelligence Corps and primarily in field intelligence positions, as an officer in an armored brigade and from 1960 as a command intelligence officer. During the Six Day War he served as the intelligence officer of the Sharon Division. In 1974 he was transferred to the General Staff and served as assistant chief of the Intlligence Branch for Research. In February 1979 he was appointed chief of the Intelligence Branch.

[Question] The IDF has recently expanded its operations in southern Lebanon. It seems that we are at the height of an offensive. In this counter-terror campaign, men are being killed in action, and political problems are developing. What are the objectives and achievements of this war?

[Answer] I believe that the question stems from an erroneous point of view. There is no solution, at least I recognize none, to the problem of terror, especially in the unique conditions of our region. In actuality, we have no severe substantial problem of internal terror. The terror being conducted along our borders or our coast is the dominant one. The terrorist base along our borders, primarily in Lebanon, Syria, and even Jordan, is very firmly established. If we tried to bring matters to the absurd and assume that the terrorist base along the borders will disappear, I do not think that there will be internal terror in the Land of Israel. Therefore, in my opinion, there is no military solution to the problem. It can only be solved by political means. The light which you are seeking at the end of the tunnel, that is that one day after 1,001 operations there will no longer be any terror, is not compatible with our situation. We are trying to reduce the attacks within the country and along its borders and coast to a minimum by strikes which are aimed directly at targets where actual terror is being prepared against us.

[Question] If I understand you correctly, the military activity is designed to give the political level a kind of breathing space.

[Answer] It is not a matter of breathing space. I maintain that we will be unable to solve the problem of terror by military action alone or that a very large military action will change the regional order. The objective is actually to prevent, albeit for a limited time, attacks against us.

How is this possible? The alternatives are very limited. Actually we have two possibilities: one defensive, that is defend your borders to the best of your ability; the second possibility is offensive. That is to say do not wait till they come to you and penetrate and then destroy the teams which are attacking you but rather try to strike them in their bases. The State of Israel does not have many alternatives. For a country of 3 million people, struggling with problems of reserves and economy, the significance of a defensive guarding of its borders is that half of the people will be mobilized all the time. In the light of constantly decreasing funds and constantly expanding terror, things are not working out using defensive means alone. The cheaper and more effective method is to attack the bases themselves.

For 2 or 3 months now we have undoubtedly had an increase in the wave of terror. The reasons are well known, they are not military but political. Al-Assad is occupied at home, and while the Syrian army and the Syrian regime are fighting for their lives, there has been a weakening of the restraint of the Palestinians who are completely supported by the Syrians. There are internal disputes within the Palestinian factions. We have stood up to the Palestinian Council where there has been a rise of the military faction and a decline of the political faction within the PLO. In regard to the problem of Jerusalem, the Palestinians feel now that their strength is increasing in the international community. The PLO is beginning to become an accepted institution in the European Community and in the institutions of the United Nations. You know what? I will also add the Egyptian issue. The suspension of the talks at the present time has raised the hope in the Palestinian sector that al-Sadat will change his policy, and perhaps it is only necessary to give him a little push so that he will return to what is called "the Arab road." All of these factors together require the Palestinians to emphasize their presence. It reduces to one rule: You act, that means you are alive. So we have an increase in the wave of terror...

In the fight against terror, there is no 80 percent success. There is either 100 percent or nothing. When 10 penetrations have failed and one operation on the coastal road has succeeded--a failure is 100 percent. In recent months we have prevented about 10 actions, each of which was designed to be an action of killing and bargaining.

[Answer] Both from the other side and along the border, however primarily from the other side. The course of action which we are taking is that the moment when we have intelligence about teams on their way and the bases of departure, the cheapest and safest course of action is to try to prevent the departure and to cause the terrorists to reconsider or learn a lesson--and we gain time. Time provides room for flexibility for the political means. We are involved today in the midst of some very substantive discussions about our future: will there be or will there not be autonomy? What kind of autonomy? Ultimately, this is the solution to the terror. With military means you can destroy. How much can you destroy? You can not eliminate all the terrorists. That is absurd.

There is also the very serious problem of how we attack. We cannot permit ourselves a situation in which the innocent and the guilty die together. That is to say, our attacks are very precisely directed, almost surgical in nature.

[Answer] This is not true for thebombings...in part. For the air force's bombings of known terrorist bases or a certain house where you can be sure that there will be no civilian casualties in the vicinity or an attack on a team under a tree, it is true. It is not true for massive bombings of an area. However I do not remember that we have ever launched massive bombings. It is not true for artillery shellings or almost not true because in those cases, the pinpoint striking of a target is very difficult.

We are up against a group which learned its lessons and tried to respond in the best form, in conditions available to it, to our sophistication. For example, they have learned that their entry into camps and their residing within a purely civilian environment prevents us from taking massive actions. We have not yet reached a situation where the terrorists would be evicted from the civilian settlements. This could have been a solution, however the terrorists are doing precisely the opposite. They take a house in a refugee camp or a house in Beirut, for example, and establish a base there. We do not attack Beirut in spite of the fact that it is an infested area. Most of the terrorist headquarters and most of the logistics are located there. We know where they are, the problem is how to attack so that the innocent do not die with the guilty. In the last operation, I can say conservatively that about 40 terrorists were killed. This was a large operation. Not one civilian was killed, not one! I think that this speaks for itself.

In your question you mentioned the word offensive. IDF action is an escalated response to an escalation which has already begun in the number of penetrations. Check the statistics. How many penetration attempts have there been in the last 2 months? You will see that the terror is increasing. A number of the teams do not succeed at all. UNIFIL stopped 20 or 30 teams in the last 2 or 3 months. But then, UNIFIL acts against the teams which have been caught in its own way even though we are not happy with it.

So we are not responsible for the escalation. There has also been an increase in internal terror. If in the past the terrorists have succeeded in striking once out of five times, today they are making 25 attempts in order to succeed once.

[Question] Are the recommendations of the Agranat Commission regarding pluralism in intelligence estimates being implemented? There was talk of two more centers, besides the Intelligence Branch, which would be involved in intelligence estimates.

How is this system functioning? Can it be correctly stated that the chief of the Intelligence Branch still is the intelligence officer of the people of Israel as was the case before 1973?

[Answer] You are simply not correct. There is an enormous difference between the situation then and today. The difference is not in the change of the status of the chief of the Intelligence Branch. The chief of the Intelligence Branch, in my opinion, is in charge of or responsible for warnings and political estimates (as derived from the delineation of the responsibility of his position). This responsibility of mine has not been divided between others and me. That is to say, with the establishment of research institutions both in the ministry of foreign affairs and in the intelligence institution, the responsibility of the chief of the Intelligence Branch has not been divided. In a word, a national security council has not been established. The chief of the Intelligence Branch is responsible for national estimates and warnings. This is actually the substance of the entire matter.

[Answer] Look, in de facto terms, we are still in a war. The response to the military issue, to warnings, is in the military area. One of the mistakes on Yom Kippur eve was that we attempted to analyze the political level and did not thoroughly examine the facts in the military area. If we had at that time separated the two subjects and asked ourselves the question: In the current situation as it now exists, in military terms, are there or are there not preparations for war here? The response should have been short and clear.

In the military area, the intelligence branch remains exclusive. Even after 1973, this area was not divided between others and ourselves. In the estimate of a military situation, you require the [military] arms. It is a joint product of Intelligence Branch research, air intelligence, and naval intelligence. In order to create duplicators for the Intelligence Branch, you must actually produce double studies in terms of the scope, both in the [specific military] arm and in the quantitative sense. For example, you receive intelligence from the analysis of radio signals. If you do not have an air arm (let's say in the air sector) which would interpret, study, and give you the final product of the estimate on this subject, it is as if you have done nothing. I can pass the information to the ministry of foreign affairs or to the Mossad, however there is no one there who will analyze it. Therefore, these institutions concentrate in the political-strategic area.

[Question] Political-strategic research which you also provide to it...

[Answer] I do not provide that to it. I am responsible for it.

[Question] That is to say nothing has changed since the Agranat Commission?

[Answer] That is precisely what I have not said. Before 1973 the chief of the Intelligence Branch was an institution who was obeyed implicity. He had no competitor in the arena. After 1973, the chief of the Intelligence Branch must answer questions, and difficult questions. The leader who must decide receives an estimate parallel to ours, from a sister institution which at times takes an opposite view. When such a situation is created, I, for example, do not permit my professional people to read the situation estimates of the sister institution so that a condition of national consensus or national conception will not be created. I prefer to see two or three opinions, call together all the parties, and endeavor to formulate the balanced estimate.

[Question] Are you the one who decides if there is a confrontation?

[Answer] No. The same different estimate from a sister institution which I receive is also received by the prime minister and the minister of defense. When an estimate of the national situation is being considered, one must first collect the facts. Facts and statistics are not a mathematical thing but a process of reaction and briefing.

The chief of the Intelligence Branch reads an average of 6 hours worth of raw material. He asks questions about some of this information. The assistant chief of the Intelligence Branch for research does the same thing. The same applies to the chief of the areas of research, air, and sea. In this way, the questions become "notations of vital information," which are fed back into the collection system and subsequently receive reactions. This is a continuous and repetitive process of question, answer, and reaction. You cannot get up one morning and say: The time has come to prepare a national situation estimate, and you as chief of the National Security Council begin to consider the facts. You must live the facts, you must collect the instruments. Therefore, if you would establish a national security council, you would have to do one of two things: either give it the position of the chief of the Intelligence Branch and the sister research institutions and then matters would be summarized in a forum similar to that of the chief of the Intelligence Branch, or as happens in other countries which have a national security council, the council would receive three working papers, different situation estimates, and in order to check to see that they are not contradictory, it would be assisted by an apparatus which would provide the facts. This is the basis. The question is if in a country of 3 million people, when you are struggling over the quantity of research material for one institution and certainly for 2 or 3, you can permit yourself this luxury.

[Question] In regard to the autonomy, to what extent do you feel that the Intelligence Branch has contributed its part? Have you as chief of the Intelligence Branch had an influence on the processes which have occurred?

[Answer] I will describe it in a different way, I believe that I have had the full opportunity to express my opinion.

[Question] Are you satisfied with the extent of the influence which the chief of the Intelligence Branch has had on this issue?

[Answer] You will not find a chief of the Intelligence Branch who would be completely satisfied. When you are the prime minister or the foreign minister and you have another matter in which you are involved and on which all your thoughts are concentrated, you naturally drop or defer matters which appear to you to be secondary and marginal and which can be viewed by the chief of the Intelligence Branch as no less important. Then the chief of the Intelligence Branch will not be satisfied. This is a subjective matter. I am satisfied the moment that I can enter a forum, express, fight for, and explain my view. Whether my opinion is accepted or not is irrelevant. For this there are parliamentary and political institutions which will choose from the alternatives which I present to them.

[Question] Didn't the National Planning Branch take over some of your functions in the autonomy issue?

[Answer] No. For both the National Planning Branch and the Planning Branch of the IDF, the basis for developing the strategic picture is the intelligence basis. This we provide. There is no substitute for this.

[Question] However the estimates and advice on the autonomy issue were accepted by the leaders from the National Planning Branch and not from the Intelligence Branch...

[Answer] This is legitimate. The leader listens to me and to him, and he eventually decides to accept his opinion. This is the leader's right. Period. It is my obligation and my right to express my opinion.

[Question] Do you believe this is the normal situation?

[Answer] You are continuing in the wrong direction. An organization works in accordance with the way its chief has built it. If the leader thinks that this is the way he wants it to work, then this is fine. It is his right, and you cannot prevent him from doing so. The chief of the Intelligence Branch does not dictate policy. Under no circumstances should this happen.

[Question] What are the positions of the chief of the Intelligence Branch regarding the normalization with Egypt and the autonomy?

[Answer] We expected difficulties. The difficulties are now occurring. It was the view of the chief of the Intelligence Branch that peace with Egypt must pass the test of time. Peace is not a condition where you can say: A peace agreement has been signed, and from that moment, hostility has ended, the danger that Egypt will take part in some Arab alignment in the future has been eliminated, and actually what happens is not important, we are advancing along the road of peace. We expected difficulties also in the autonomy issue because we saw that at the very beginning there were actually opposing views. The Egyptian view is not ours, the American view is not ours. Let's say that in the view of the autonomy, the Americans are closer to the Egyptians. It was difficult for us to see how things would eventually develop, and therefore, we expressed them in concrete terms.

[Question] After the Six Day War, the then Chief of Staff, Mordekhai Gur, said that we would no longer base our reaction on an estimate of intentions. When there were concentrations, unusual movements, or unusual phenomena, immediate action would have to be taken. Is this policy still in effect?

[Answer] Yes. It is different than the past. I will give you an example of a situation in which I differed with Chief of Staff Motta Gur. In 1975, a state of readiness was declared as a result of unusual movements in Syria. The chief of the Intelligence Branch did not detect the intentions, and his opinion was not to take action. The chief of staff decided otherwise. In this case, the chief of the Intelligence Branch was ultimately proven right. However, in my view, the general staff took the correct action in spite of the fact that my opinion was not accepted.

[Question] This is a revolutionary policy in that in the past there was concern about taking the initiative because of political considerations.... Can one say that today these inhibitions do not exist?

[Answer] It is impossible to be free of these obstacles. This is a human function. However, as long as I am chief of the Intelligence Branch I will adopt this policy. I will also explain the reason. Al-Sadat can talk about two democracies, Israel and Egypt. Anyone who has visited Egypt knows that when one speaks about Arab democracy, one is actually speaking about a totalitarian regime of one form or another. If you need proof, look at the isolation of Sadat in Santa Katherina or in Isma'iliyah before his trip to Jerusalem. In the Arab world matters are decided by one man or a very small group of men. We are living constantly in three circles of deception in the intelligence area. One circle of deception is that of the ruler and his subjects. That is to say that the ruler makes a decision and does not want his subjects to know about it. The second circle of deception is that of the ruler and his fellow rulers. Al-Assad tries to deceive Hussein, Sarkis, and Saddam Hussein. The third circle of deception involves us--it is very difficult to say that you know the intentions because you are speaking about one man who makes a decision and the intentions change. Today he can decide one way and tomorrow another, we have already witnessed this. Therefore, I say knowledge of the intentions will not dictate to me on a subject so vital to my security, that which is called warning, but rather the actions which would be taken. The facts in an area will dictate the picture to me. Had this been the policy before the Yom Kippur War, I think we would have not encountered what we did.

[Question] What is the significance of the tightening of the military ties between Egypt and the United States on two levels: the supply of sophisticated weapons systems and strategic cooperation?

[Answer] These things stem from the new regional arrangement which has been creates. Iran has fallen; there has been Afghanistan with or without the American reaction. I think that the Americans have finally accepted what we have maintained for a number of years. The Russians have made a change in their targets. Europe is no longer in first place. The Soviet spearhead is now aimed, in a long-range plan, at two points. The first is energy and the second is Africa. If you want raw material, take the map of Africa today and compare it to the map of Africa of 5 years ago. Take a look at the Soviet achievements. Take a map of the Middle East and look at the achievements... Actually they have suffered one failure--Egypt.

[Question] Perhaps Iraq in the future?

[Answer] No. Iraq represents a prospect for the United States. I believe there is a joint American-Iraqi interest. In spite of the fact that the Americans are trying to find the connection to Iraq, the Iraqis have not yet moved down this road toward the Americans. In such a strategic situation, the United States is seeking to create footholds in the region in order to block Soviet expansion, a process which represents a direct threat to the Gulf nations. The image which has been created for the United States after Iran has led to a situation in which the nations of the Gulf, who can protect their regimes with difficulty, are tying to seek immediately an alternative by a compromise with the hostile environment. This is also the case with Saudi Arabia's turning to Iraq in spite of the fact that they are at two opposite poles. The Iraqis are pushing for a defense pact among the Gulf nations under Iraqi hegemony. They need the United States in order to achieve this. Here is where there is a joint American-Iraqi interest. Such a pact is aimed against Khomeinism and Soviet expansion. I do not assume that regimes such as Saudi Arabia and Iraq will be able to live side by side for a long time. In the American world view, Egypt is the first place on which it can depend. Egypt also has importance as Egypt--as one who has led the Arab world in the past. There is an American desire to restore it to a position of hegemony in the Arab world. The United States would emerge actually as a beneficiary.

[Question] However, Egypt has a tradition of expelling foreigners. That is to say that the Americans are taking a risk.

[Answer] Yes. It means that they are taking a risk. An American-Egyptian strategic pact has been created. Al-Sadat is developing these relations. Actually, he began to develop them even before he went to Camp David. In his world view, the United States is the main support. Therefore, in spite of the fact that perhaps the main and only ally of the United States in the region is Israel, a closer tie has paradoxically been created with Egypt. This pact between Egypt and the United States can have long-range implications and can also have very disappointing developments. American bases in Egypt is an idea which is compatible with the strategic view of the United States. There are two at this time: in Qina and Ra's Banat. These bases are on the periphery and they do not disturb the Egyptian administration. The dangers to us are those of preference and limitation.

[Question] Has this already been manifested?

[Answer] I do not think that we can feel this in the military area, however we already feel it in the political area, and in the future we will feel it much more. Egyptian willingness has an importance to the Americans beyond that which it actually has, whether it is or is not compatible with the American view.

The equipping of the Egyptians with modern weapons is secondary in importance at this time. On the other hand, I have already said that I cannot ignore Egypt as a potential confrontation state until proven otherwise through the years. There are several key dates which we must pass through in order to be shown that Egypt is indeed moving in consonance with the peace agreements. For example, the evacuation of the Sinai in 1982. What is beyond that? Why does the Egyptian Defense Minister Badawi maintain that the first target of the Egyptian forces is still Israel? Why have the Egyptians deployed five divisions along the Canal whereas on the Libyan border where the Egyptian problem is concentrated there is only a small segment? The questions are difficult ones. An Egyptian army equipped with American weapons will be a completely different army, a much better one. There is no need for there to be doubts on this issue. I do not say that Egypt does not have peaceful intentions. I think that al-Sadat's intention is for peace. The question is what will happen after al-Sadat. What will happen in the upheavals in the Arab world during the course of time, which for me are the years 1983, 1984, and 1985, 2 or 3 years after the withdrawal to the international border. Then we will be able to really determine the Egyptian intentions.

[Question] What is the extent of the effect on us of the diminishing image of the United States which is our major ally?

[Answer] In our microcosmos, it is not much different today. First of all, we are in a no-alternative situation. We cannot say: Let's leave this ally and go over to the Soviet Union. Secondly, things balance out because of the upheavals in the Arab world, and the targets of the Soviet Union are farther than our region. The Soviet Union is basing itself in Afghanistan, in my opinion, as a bridgehead to Iran. It is only a question of time. It will do this before it will apply pressure or aim for a flareup in our region. The United States is using the time to attempt to create an anti-Soviet front based on its spearhead--Egypt. If the United States becomes firmly established in Egypt and succeeds in creating the Egyptian bridge to the Gulf countries, a bridge which actually existed in the past, then in this circle it will succeed in creating an anti-Soviet bloc. As Israelis, we have a problem with this. We will pay part of the price of the American action.

[Question] You spoke about the internal situation in Syria. I have a specific question on this subject. If the internal situation deteriorates, to what extent will we find the Russians in Syria?

[Answer] This is a possible development. The Soviet Union has no alternative to al-Assad today. The processes today in Syria are moving in an anti-Soviet direction. In order for al-Assad to continue to stay in power, he is likely to come to a situation in which he will ask the Soviets to enter Syria. I think that the Soviets have found, for example, in Afghanistan, that their intervention in foreign countries has not encountered an appropriate American reaction.

[Question] Do you see Afghanistan as a precedent for many things which are likely to happen to us?

[Answer] Correct. The main precedent is that until the invasion of Afghanistan, the Soviet Union had not intervened directly in places other than its satellites. According to the reaction which this intervention encountered, the Soviet Union can permit itself to do the same thing a second and third time in other places.

In conclusion, I would like to add a few words about the people of the Intelligence Branch. I think that today, 7 years after the Yom Kippur War, one can praise the people of the Intelligence Branch. in all its sectors, both in the collection sector, about which there were no complaints in the war, and the evaluation sector, about which there were complaints. The praise is not only mine. Prime Minister Yitzhaq Rabin specifically cited the intelligence after the attack on Entebbe, and the chief of the general staff cited the intelligence after the last operation in the north. Those who are performing in intelligence work are being praised, and it is important that the people know that they are doing good and important work. The strength of the Intelligence Branch is in its reservoir of manpower. It has no other strength. If you take the people away from the Intelligence Branch and compensate it with equipment, you have not increased its strength. It has a tradition of sacrifice and dedication to profession, duty, responsibility, and mission assigned to the people. This dedication, which wears out the people, is one of the things which surprise me. When I try to compare the motivations even of a low-ranking officer in any Intelligence Branch occupation, they are completely different than those of an officer in other places. The weight of the responsibility here is emphasized much more, from the lowest ranks to the top.

MIRAGE MAINTENANCE IN COLOMBIA--Bogota (AFP)--Maintenance and repair of French Mirage fighter planes, sold to Colombia in 1970, will be entrusted to an Israeli company. The disclosure was made in Bogota on Wednesday, 6 August by General [words missing], the defense minister of Colombia. The Company, Israeli Air Industries, or IAI, was in competition with the French firm Dassaut-Breguet, builder of the aircraft, and with a Spanish firm for maintenance and repair of the 16 Mirages based in Central Colombia. IAI won the contract, having made the lowest bid and allowing Colombia an $8 million saving (around 32 million francs), as the minister also noted. In addition, IAI pledged to provide the Colombian Air Force with the necessary industrial and military substructures to effect partial repairs on the aircraft locally. NEW RAPPORT WITH INDIA REPORTED

London 8 DAYS in English 27 Sep 80 p 25

[Text]

The visit by a Kuwaiti delegation to India in September opened a promising new chapter in industrial, economic and commercial cooperation between the two.

KUWAIT'S DECISION to make substantial investments in India and enable India to participate in its own industrial development has left Indian industrialists with much homework to do. Trade between the two countries has been stagnant in the last three years and Indian officials admit that no serious market surveys have been attempted in order to assess Kuwait's capacity to absorb Indian industrial products.

A promising new chapter in the countries' bilateral cooperation in the economic, industrial and commercial fields began following a visit to India from 9-11 September by a Kuwaiti delegation headed by the ruler, Sheikh Jaber al Ahmed al Sabah — his first official stay. After talks and an unprecedented lunch for the Emir and his ministers at Prime Minister Gandhi's house, it was announced that Kuwait will make sizeable investments in selected Indian projects and cooperate with India in sponsoring joint ventures in third countries.

The choice of projects to receive Kuwaiti petrodollar backing has yet to be made. It is likely that a Kuwaiti delegation under the auspices of the Gulf Corporation will visit India in the next month or so to discuss concrete proposals. In the matter of joint ventures, the two countries' industry ministers — Kuwait's Abdul Wahab al Nefisi and Dr Charanjit Chanana of India — agreed that no time should be lost.

From New Delhi's point of view one sombre fact which emerged was that the Indian government as well as private industrialists have done practically nothing to establish greater rapport with Kuwaiti officials and industrialists. The Kuwaiti industries minister stressed frankly the need for special Indian efforts to bridge the information gap by organising trade fairs and exhibitions.

The major items of Indian export to Kuwait include spices, iron and steel, machinery, meat, rice, vegetables, coffee and tea, wood manufactures, fruit and clothing. India's imports from Kuwait include petroleum products, urea, ammonia, copper waste and sulphur. Chanana was told by Nefisi that Indian assistance would be particularly welcome in setting up petrochemical and machine tool industries in Kuwait.

The talks covered a wide area. It is understood that the Emir agreed in principle to Prime Minister Gandhi's suggestion that there should be a world oil conference specifically to discuss the problems of the developing countries in the face of galloping oil prices. Mrs Gandhi made a forceful plea that the present categorisation of countries by the strategic committee of Opec is very unfavourable to India and that New Delhi is entitled to concessional treatment by virtue of her per capita income and oil consumption. According to an Indian official, this view, which has been accepted by both Indonesia (see page 48) and Iran, appeared to have made more than a marginal impact on the Emir and his advisers.

Without naming Afghanistan, the joint communique issued by the Emir and Mrs Gandhi at the end of the visit expressed strong opposition to the use of force in the settlement of disputes, which it stated 'should only be resolved peacefully bilaterally and in accordance with the charter of the United Nations and within its framework'. The two leaders said that the presence of foreign troops contributed to instability and heightened tensions, and voiced their grave concern over the growing escalation of great power rivalries in the region. They called upon the concerned states to convert the Indian Ocean into a zone of peace and to keep the Gulf free from superpower military rivalry.

On the Middle East, the Emir and Mrs Gandhi were more specific and forthright. They emphasised the urgency of finding a just and durable solution based on the complete withdrawal of Israel from all occupied Palestinian and Arab territories, including Jerusalem, and endorsed the inalienable right of the Palestinian people under the auspices of the Palestine Liberation Organisation to return to their homeland and establish an independent state of Palestine.

It is understood that the visiting Kuwaiti ministers and officials extensively briefed the Indians on their country's problems with Iran. According to Arab sources in New Delhi, Indian leaders and officials agreed with the Kuwaiti stand strongly deploring Ayatollah Khomeini's repeated calls for Iran-type uprisings in Arab countries.

The visiting Kuwaiti officials also explained to the Indians why Arab countries had endorsed Saudi Arabia's proposals to set up a Pan-Arab institute for Arab studies in Riyadh which will, among other things, lead to the establishment of an 'Arab Interpol' to tackle insurgency problems.

CENTRAL BANK REPORTS ON YEAR'S DEVELOPMENTS, FUTURE PLANS

Kuwait AL-QABAS in Arabic 21 Jul 80 p 12

[Article: "Annual Report of Central Bank of Kuwait"]

[Text] The annual economic report issued by the Central Bank of Kuwait yesterday says that the bank approved at the end of last year a new and important plan to streamline and regulate the banking credit system through gradual transformation from the system of open account credit facilities to the system of programmed and set-term loans.

In its report, the bank reviews the measures that it took to strengthen the liquidity of the banks last year, the oil developments that have led to raising oil prices and the international economic situation.

The report says that the total local production amounted to 6,430,500,000 dinars in 1979, of which 4,650,300,000 dinars came from the oil sector whose relative contribution to the total production rose from 60.7 percent in 1978 to 72.3 percent in 1979.

The report points out that Kuwait held fourth place [not further specified] among the OPEC and Middle East countries in 1979, third place in OPEC behind Saudi Arabia and Iraq and sixth, instead of seventh place in the world [presumably meaning in oil production].

The rise in crude oil production in 1979 was accompanied by a rise of nearly 20 percent in the volume of oil exports, by an increase of nearly 17 percent in natural gas production and by a growth of nearly 38 percent in the use of natural gas in comparison to 1978. One of the prominent features of the development of the oil sector in Kuwait in 1979 was the putting into operation of the new gas liquefication plant at the outset of that year. This plant has added nearly 3.3 million tons to Kuwait's total annual liquid gas production.

Regarding oil prices, prices rose by the end of 1979 to almost double their level at the end of 1978.

The report also points out that the year's general revenues in the 1979-80 budget have been estimated at 3,863,000,000 dinars, that the oil share of these revenues has been estimated at 3.12 billion dinars and that the government spending has been estimated at 2,453,000,000 dinars.

Currency Expansion

The economic report also says that the currency expansion--reflected in the percent increase in the local liquidity--continued to decline for the third consecutive year.

The report attributes the main reason for the decline in the currency expansion rate to the transfer of a large part of the local liquidity to the outside world, either in the form of current remittances to pay for imports or in the form of capital outflow seeking the investment opportunities available abroad, especially as a result of the high international interest rates.

The report adds that even though some of the factors which had contributed to the outflow of local liquidity to the outside world disappeared or lost their intensity at the end of 1979--such as the temporary halt in the trend toward sharply rising international interest rates, suspending the creation of new Gulf companies and suspending the issuance of new bonds recorded in dinars--the liquidity of the local banks in dinars continued to experience rising pressures which motivated the Central Bank to strengthen the liquidity of these banks by supplying them with money at a relatively low cost through the discount window whose operations amounted to a total of 195 million dinars by the end of the year and through the system of the exchange of currency for a set term. The total value of this type of operations amounted to 202 million dinars.

Strengthening Liquidity

The report also notes that in addition to the Central Bank's continued support for the liquidity of the commercial banks, it started for the first time in 1979 issuing its bonds which can be considered a nucleus for the operations of the future open market. The bank also approved at the end of 1979 a new and important plan seeking to streamline and regulate the banking credit facilities policy through gradual transformation from the system of open drawing credit facilities to the system of programmed loans for set terms and purposes.

The economic report also says that the Kuwaiti paper money market experienced in 1979 a number of developments including the issuance base and a number of regulatory measures in the Kuwaiti stocks and bonds market.

The issuance base has expanded by 15.7 percent as a result of the issuance of 58.5 million shares in the form of free grant shares and shares to increase capital offered to subscribers with an issuance allowance.

The stock market activity in 1979 resulted in an increase of nearly 20 percent in the prices [of shares] and with the appearance of long periods of recession.

The report notes that the record figure for wholesale prices rose from 164.5 percent in 1978 to 175.6 percent in 1979, with 1972 as the base year. The record cost of living figure rose from 166.4 percent in 1978 to 175 percent in 1979, with an increase rate of 5.2 percent.

Rise in Trade

The report also says that Kuwait's foreign trade in 1979 experienced a tangible increase in both exports and imports and in the balance of trade in comparison to the preceding year.

The total surplus in the 1979 Kuwaiti balance of payments amounted to nearly 3.1 billion dinars, i.e. it rose by nearly 364 percent over 1978, as a result of an increase in the current surplus amounting to nearly 115 percent on the one hand and the inward shift in the net movement of foreign capital belonging to the commercial banks on the other hand.

International Economy

The report also notes that there were successive developments in many countries of the world in the past year as a result of the high inflation rates and as a result of the turmoil in the oil market in the first half of the year and the tendency of the oil prices toward rising in the second half of the year. However, the major OPEC countries were able to realize a high surplus in their 1979 current account whereas in 1978 this surplus had reached its lowest point since 1974. By the end of 1978, a number of the major powers had taken joint measures to bolster the dollar exchange rate. Those measures did not prove effective beyond the first half of 1979 when the dollar began to face some pressures.

Gulf Currencies

The European currency system which was initiated in March 1979 reflects further interest in the exchange rate. This system has been established as an advanced phase of the serpentine system [nizam al-thu'ban] with the aim of stabilizing the exchange rate among the currencies of this system in order to reach the phase of currency unity. In fact, the first European Currency Unit (E.C.U.) has already been issued.

The developments have shown that the currencies of this system, led by the Deutschemark, have realized an improved position vis-a-vis the dollar, with the exception of the Danish crown which has deteriorated somewhat. As for the Gulf currencies, they have been characterized by stability in the face of the dollar, with the exception of some slight fluctuations.

One of the most prominent international economic events in 1979 was the evident rise in gold prices in the last part of 1980.

MALAYSIAN INVESTMENT--South East Asia provides good investment opportunities for Kuwait, Kuwaiti Finance Minister Abdul Rahman Salem Al Ateeqi said last week. The Minister, who was a member in the delegation accompanying the Ruler of Kuwait to six nations in Asia said that region would also provide means for diversifying Kuwait's foreign investments. Kuwait's Asian investments will be based on a clear vision and previous experience, the Minister said, adding, "we simply cannot be absent on that platform." Commenting on the Emir's tour which ended last week, the Chief of Kuwait's Real Estate Consultative Group said South East Asia is a 300 million man market. Ahmad Al Duwaij, who supervised the formation of Kuwaiti-Malaysian Investment Company said that Kuwait was not seeking special concessions in moving towards the Asian market. Al Duwaij ruled out allegations that investments in Asia would involve risks. Industrialised countries who are focusing on the South East Asian market are not doing that for humanitarian purposes, he said. Developed countries are seeking to serve their own ends and to realise profits, Al Duwaij added. Investment in South East Asia, contrary to that in industrialised nations will be highly profiting, the chief of the consultative group said. Kuwait's investments in South East Asia will start with projects aiming towards constructional development, Al Duwaij said. This would be followed by industrial projects. We are at present studying the investment laws of those countries but we are confident the investment potential is big and wide, Al Duwaij added. Kuwait-Malaysia Investment Company is a Mal. Din. 250 million ($120 million) joint venture in which Kuwait holds 48 percent. The Kuwait stock in the venture is held by the Ministry of Finance, the Real Estate Consultative Group, and Kuwait's Social Security Organisation. NEW POWER, WATER PLANT--The site for a new power station and water distillation plan was discussed last week at a meeting between officials of the Ministry of Electricity and Water and the Municipality. The new plant will be located at Julaa, on the Southern coast of Kuwait. Some chalets at the proposed site will be demolished. No decisions were reached at last week's meeting and another meeting will be held this week. An official said that the Ministry had succeeded in overcoming the consequences of the fire at south Shuaiba Power Station and that the supply position was now satisfactory. The fourth unit at South Shuaiba will start operating within a few days and this will increase the electricity supply load and provide a good margin against any sudden demand. He added that consumption is expected to fall as the weather becomes cooler. The remaining two units affected by the Shuaiba fire will become operational during the winter. The Electricity Ministry expects the maximum load to reach 2,725 megawatts in 1981, 3,150 megawatts in 1982, 3,600 megawatt in 1983 and 4,075 megawatts in 1984. The forecast for 1990 is the consumption of 7,450 megawatts. The Ministry is taking steps to meet the expected future demands. [Text] [Beirut THE ARAB WORLD WEEKLY in English 27 Sep 80 p 13]

FORMER PREMIER AL-SULH INTERVIEWED

Paris AL-NAHAR AL-'ARABI WA AL-DUWALI in Arabic 1-7 Sep 80 pp 10-12

[Interview with former Premier Taqiy al-Din al-Sulh by Talal Haydar, in Beirut; date not given]

[Text] He picked up the morning newspapers, leafed through them, expressed resentment over a weekly paper's report that he has proposed formation of an ordinary government headed by al-Huss. He read a telegram received from the Jordanian king. We reviewed the background of the Lebanese war, and he said: "The Lebanese war has ended, but it appears that other wars are still raging in Lebanon."

[Question] The story of your appointment as premier-designate and your subsequent stepping down is so far still more important than the formation of a new government. What provocative and surprising situations did you discover during the contacts you made with the various factions, in order to form the government of political activists? And what were the basic obstacles which impeded formation of this government?

[Answer] Some 19 days passed between commissioning and calling off the formation of the new government. There constituted an extraordinary transition period in the Lebanese situation, because many issues crystallized, even though they are not yet apparent to the public.

First, the contacts were tantamount to an initiative to stop the war. We did stop the war between the Lebanese. Discussions had been under way to transfer the Lebanese issue to Paris, as was done with the Vietnamese question, because of the difficulty of conducting [at home] a direct dialogue between the parties to the dispute. Then, all of a sudden, the Lebanese factions agreed to meet around the same table in the premier's office at the presidential palace.

I discovered that there was a group of positive factors. I sensed a sincere concern for Lebanon, for Lebanon's unity and for its moral values.

All the factions wanted to finally end the war and begin a stage of positive construction. They did not want "to call it quits" in just any old way. It was clear that they did not want a truce, after which the war would return, as some feared. On the contrary, I sensed that all parties loved Lebanon and were concerned about its unity. Each faction knew that it has a stake in Lebanon.

[Question] The discussion was not about the past or future of Lebanon?

[Answer] The discussion was about one Lebanon. We did not want Lebanon as it was. We wanted to introduce the necessary, contemporary developments, and to modernize all institutions. Past shortcomings were clear to the parties in conflict, but positive views were a common denominator.

Both the extreme right and the extreme left appreciated the values of Lebanon, such as its democracy, and all were anxious to maintain these values.

I felt that all parties had a strong desire to participate in achieving Lebanese unity, which has always been composed of various sects and religions working for the development of a united nation and state.

Lebanon appears to the world as a radiant democracy representing a higher culture and a civilized partnership, progressive and liberal, setting a high standard of coexistence to every society which suffers from sectarian, religious, or ideological incompatibilities.

The Lebanese formula must be maintained in the interest of the Palestinian cause and to confront Israeli racism through coexistence among the various religions.

When the delegation of American blacks (Jackson) arrived, we met with him at the "Islamic Coalition" center. I told him that, in my opinion, the war began when the Arabs in general, and the Palestinians in particular, offered the world a rational and advanced picture of the type of state contemplated [for Palestine]. The model was the Lebanese formula where everyone, Moslem and Christian, lived in a democratic climate. Lebanon was the model which stirred up Israeli racist fears and unmasked Israel before Western public opinion generally. This was the biggest political arrow to hit Israel in the heart. The Israeli response was war and the "destruction" of the Lebanese formula.

This was the cause of the Lebanese war. Today, the conflict in the Middle East, especially in Lebanon, can be summarized in two ways:

Either Palestine will be in Lebanon's image, or Lebanon will be in Israel's image.

We say that Palestine must be like Lebanon. All the factions that accepted the idea of a government of activists shared this view.

[Question] During your discussions with Christian and Moslem leaders, did you feel that the Christians were still afraid of the Moslems and uneasy about their loyalty to Lebanon, and that the Moslems lacked confidence in the Christians and did not truly desire national partnership and unity?

[Answer] The Christians' feelings of fear were matched by the Moslem's feelings of being wronged.

I felt, during my efforts to form a government, that the two factions understood that fighting would not solve the problem. On the contrary, war would aggravate the problem even more, and has aggravated it quite enough already.

I also sensed that the two sides believe in the need to resort to dialogue to solve this problem, that is, to abolish war.

In 1943, the year of true independence (not of the lip-service independence of 1922 and later years), the difficulty of Christian fears was present, but the solution was found in the national charter.

Lebanon has been trying to solve these two problems since it obtained its true independence, because the two sides were convinced of the presence of fear [by the Christians] and of a sense of being wronged [by the Moslems]. Each side began to try to solve the problem of the other side. The Moslem was trying to solve the problem of fear which the Christian had and the Christian, for his part, was trying to solve the sense of feeling cheated which the Moslem had. However, big mistakes were made during the more than 30 years that have passed, because Lebanon did not find a satisfactory remedy for these two difficulties.

These mistakes have helped to cause the war and to open the way for the plot hatched by Israel and those who back Israel.

The Moslem and Christian leaders now agree on the need to cure Lebanon of this chronic disease.

The Political Activists Would End the War

[Question] If the government of political activists had been formed, would reconciliation have been achieved, or would the war have been moved from the street to the palace, which would have been more serious?

[Answer] The possibility of mutual incompatibility and conflict are always present, but in the case of a government of activists, the conflict would have switched from a contest of weapons to a contest of dialogue and resolutions.

We are now in a phase of possibility of war. And I tell you, very simply, that we would have been moving toward the possibility of abolishing war. The activists were not responding to a call to war by agreeing to participate in the new government. On the contrary, the desire to end the war was inherent in everyone.

[Question] Why was it no longer possible for you to continue your commission and consultations? What was it that caused you, after 19 days of trying, to stop your efforts and submit a letter of resignation?

[Answer] The path we were following was very difficult. Moreover, we found obstacles we could not quickly overcome. Preparations could have taken longer than the citizens could endure. Mistakes were made by the government and by me personally. However, everything that happened must be reconsidered and reviewed.

Self-criticism is very necessary at this stage, not just to look at the past, but rather, at the future as well, because the initiative continues. The initiative to end the war has not ceased, even if the formation of a new cabinet has stopped.

It must be followed up by all parties. As for the mistakes, they can be remedied in due course. There is no substitute for the principle of a government of activists itself. There can be no backing away from it. The period of preparing for it might have been insufficient; therefore, we have not abandoned the idea. Rather, we have stopped naming the ministers. Whether it is myself or someone else [who would form the government], I reiterate the need to continue this effort, the effort of ending the war, because it affects national destiny.

On the day I was commissioned, and on the day I declined the commission, I sensed positive relations. I felt as if our hopes had landed on difficulties, not on despair.

A Way In For a Government of Activists

[Question] If the object of trying to save the country is noble and valuable to this degree, why did it not merit further patience and efforts on your part? Or, did you arrive at a point where patient efforts were no longer of any use, so that you stopped trying?

[Answer] Not exactly, I now feel a need to change the approach I followed in this round, as well as the way to prepare for the future. A transitional government, as the next government might very well be, could be a suitable prelude to the inevitable next phase, which is a government of political activists.

I wish we would have a government of activists right now. But I firmly believe that it would face the same difficulties and obstacles [I ran into]. Still, there is no substitute for a government of activists, since there is no way to end the war, except through a dialogue between the combatants and a resolution to abolish the method of arguing with weapons, especially among citizens of the same country.

In our efforts and discussions, we felt that the war between the Lebanese had ended, because there was a sincere desire to end it. However, it is obvious that there are several wars within Lebanon. During the visit I made to the Arab kings and presidents, I said to those in conflict with Syria: "We asked you to end our war, but we suddenly realized that we had to end a war between the Arabs."

We were waiting for an end to the Lebanese-Lebanese war, when we discovered that we were called upon to end an Arab-Arab war. This is an example of some of the obstacles that stood in my way. In any event, an end to the war between the Arabs is not just in Lebanon's interest. Rather, it is chiefly in the interest of the Arabs themselves, especially following the fierce Israeli onslought and the disgraceful American ineptitude.

What will history say about us? It will say that in the days of such and such [government leaders], Jerusalem was lost, and in the days of such and such leaders, the south [of Lebanon] was lost.

History has immortalized King Faisal's famous words, "I shall pray again in Jerusalem," even though he died as a martyr without doing that. History will not forget those who lose Jerusalem, so let them make a choice. The Arabs might have an excuse that Israeli know-how is superior, or that international support [for Israel] is stronger, or that Israel's weaponry is more advanced. However, they have no excuse for their disputes, because mutual agreement is within their own reach. It is their only weapon, so why don't they use it?

This weapon would solve the problem of Lebanon and Palestine as well. The picture of a fragmented, partitioned Lebanon is the picture of war. The importance of Lebanon is that it is a mirror, a pulpit and a voice. This is the source of the grandeur of this small country, and we expect it to rise again. If Lebanon were sound and healthy, there would be no Camp David accord. Lebanon's return to good health would be the greatest blow to that agreement.

From Jumblatt to al-Jumayyil

[Question] Let us return to the Lebanese scene. The failure to overcome the obstacles in the way of a government of activists makes a "transition" government necessary. Why didn't Premier Taqiy al-Din al-Sulh form a caretaker government?

[Answer] I believe that to give the greatest possible thrust and impetus to the idea of a government of activists, we should insist on it and abandon any other course. To emphasize the strength and importance of this idea, I tried to make it look as if it were the subject of a referendum.

It might be preferable for someone other than myself, to form a caretaker government, because he would not be tied to the issue as I am. If I agreed to form a caretaker government, I fear that it would put an end to the concept or objective [of a government of activists]. It is no longer my property; it has become the property of every Lebanese, including Walid Jumblatt, Amin al-Jumayyil, and the silent majority. It would not be proper to deal with this idea as if we were dealing with an ordinary matter.

Obstacles to the formation of government only increase the people's desire for it. These obstacles are the current fragmentation. Once that is gone, the formation of any government becomes easy, because this will open the way for a new, healthy Lebanon. The need is to form "the government," not "a government," because there is a government now, so why change?

Our generation has had its day, but the new Lebanon can only be rebuilt by the new generation of activist forces.

[Question] Walid Jumblatt, Ibrahim Qulaylat, and Amin al-Jumayyel all concurred about this government which....

[Here Premier al-Sulh interrupted, and said:] They concurred.

This is the important accomplishment. The government was not formed, but the activists concurred. There has been a meeting of minds. This accomplishment is very important. This is what the Lebanese people applauded when the formula was broached. It became a specific goal this is the road we shall take.

My Presence Is Evidence of Their Accord

[Question] Any government formed now, by any other method, would not be "the government," according to your view. When will the time come for "the government?"

[Answer] The time depends on the effort of those doing it, on their intelligence and devotion, and on the way they work to establish "the government," which is the government of activists.

I say that we have made mistakes. Certain parties have not yet been convinced, and not all difficulties have been overcome. But this does not prevent us from pursuing efforts and reconsidering the matter, in order to extricate the country from this worsening situation.

The difficulty of any head of a coalition government--such as a government of activists--is that his presence is evidence of disagreement of the various factions. I want my presence to be evidence of unity. [End of answer].

(It is well-known in Beirut streets that when al-Sulh was asked when the crisis would be over, he replied: "When you see that I have formed the cabinet.")

[Question] If a government were formed this week, but the situation worsened and became explosive, leading to the government's resignation, would it be possible to form a government of the same type, no matter what the obstacles or difficulties?

[Answer] This would not happen. From now on, we must not lose the slightest opportunity to form a government of activists. Taqiy al-Din al-Sulh will not fail to do everything possible to help any premier-designate implement this concept.

[Question] There are many voices calling on President Sarkis to assume responsibility for everything going on. Did you cooperate with him at the crucial stage, and what is your view regarding everything being said?

[Answer] President Sarkis believes in the need for a government of activists. He is sincere and earnest in his untiring, silent efforts to extricate the country from its ordeal.

Sarkis and I Believe

[Question] If the formation of any new government will not change the situation, did President Sarkis err in accepting Prime Minister al-Huss' resignation and appointing you as premier-designate?

[Answer] I think that if President Sarkis had not believed in the possibility of forming a government of activists, he would not have pursued this effort. And if it were not for my belief in the idea, I would not have accepted the commission. It is certain that it was and still is possible [to form such a government]. There was some gain in what has happened. Credit has to be given to all those who tried to help.

The crisis, in itself, transformed a potential idea into near reality. This was a big accomplishment for Lebanon, whether a new government was formed or not. President Sarkis adopted a clear position regarding the idea. This is a very important matter.

[Question] When you agreed to form a government of activists means, did you believe that they could also be political leaders? And was it this belief that led to your stepping down?

[Answer] There is no doubt that they possess the military power that no one else has. In addition to that, they have their major political role. The proof is that they were called upon to undertake a major political task. This does not prevent senior politicians from joining them in the mission. A government of activists would not be limited to them. (I myself am not a soldier). Influential personalities include military/political leaders as well as pure politicians.

Walid Jumblatt and Amin al-Jumayyil, for example, both have political influence, with or without weapons. Armed as well as unarmed political leaders are willing to talk to one another, and acknowledge the importance of each other.

Under war conditions, each side rejects the other. But today, all Lebanese accept one another. This gives a true picture of the unity of the country. All of them want to come together, from the pulpit and from behind the barricades.

[Question] Will the obstacles which blocked the way of a prime minister of activists, also block the way of a president of national reconciliation in 1982?

[Answer] People are afraid of that, but, God willing, the matter will not be like that. I believe that there are activists who believe in the preservation of the legitimate political machinery, and who would prevent a constitutional vacuum from developing. I am one of those who believe that a vacuum will absolutely not occur, and that the idea of a government of activists will materialize in due course and prevail until that time [when a new president is due to be elected].

Arab Disunion

[Question] What do you suggest the Arabs should do to confront two dangerous situations: the judaization of Jerusalem and the effort to judaize the south [of Lebanon]?

[Answer] Why do the Arabs find the judaization of Jerusalem strange? Israel was created to do that, and judaized Palestine before Jerusalem.

There is terrible Arab disunity. The proof is to be seen in the peripheral, regional conflicts. In the opinion of every Arab citizen, the issues involved in these conflicts are completely insignificant when compared to the idea of the establishment of Israel.

I have never seen such a shameful, disgraceful, most impotent resolution as the "Jerusalem Committee's" resolution to boycott the nations that move their embassies from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem. This resolution will be cursed by future generations.

The Arabs have disregarded the reality of what is happening. Two years ago, I said in the Chamber of Deputies: "All Arab League nations have paid a price for independence. Some of them paid with 10,000 martyrs, and some with 100,000. Then came Algeria which paid the price of a million martyrs, not a million pounds, or a million protests, or a million statements."

Palestine has a price. When the Arabs decide to pay it Palestine will return to them.

As for judaization of the south [of Lebanon], it is a part of Palestine's judaization. A quick look at the history of Israel and the nature of Zionism shows us that they have expansionist ambitions. We should have prepared for that a long time ago. The Palestinian weapon is a legal weapon, because it is the way conducive to the payment of the price.

The Arabs did not only lose Palestine. They also lost Egypt, and are losing the south.

CURRENT UNREST IN TRIPOLI ANALYZED

Paris AL-NAHAR AL-'ARABI WA AL-DUWALI in Arabic 1-7 Sep 80 pp 13-14

[Article: "Fighting in Tripoli: Is It the Turn of the North After the South?"]

[Text] Fighting has broken out unexpectedly in the streets of Tripoli. It is true that the atmosphere of the northern capital was charged, but incidents occurred as if they were timed to match the general political climate.

Last week, President Sarkis met with one of his senior security officials, who is considered among the most prominent candidates to form a new government. They reviewed together the various phases of the effort to form a new government, and the difficulties still in the way of forming a government of minimal effectiveness. This follows the failure to form a government of maximum effectiveness, that is, a government of political activists, or a government of reconciliation and high aspirations.

The two men reviewed the political positions. Then, President Sarkis expressed his fears that security breakdowns might recur in certain sensitive areas, blocking all attempts to extricate the country from its present crisis.

The president's fears were justified. Last week was marked by security incidents extending from the south, where the matter has become the norm; to Jabal Lubnan, where explosive conditions have returned; to the north, where fighting has erupted in Tripoli this time, accompanied by direct clashes with "the deterrent forces." Perhaps the common denominator of the scattered disturbances throughout Lebanon, was the falling of many dead and wounded, the destruction of property, the escalation of the wave of terror, and the emergence of new obstacles in the path of [pacification] moves by several Lebanese who have become involved in current developments without their knowing it.

War of City Districts

Perhaps the thing that disturbed officials most last week was the bloody clashes in Tripoli. These took place between the districts of Ba'l Muhsn al-'Ali, al-Tabbanih, al-Qubbih, Ba'l al-Saraqbih and al-Mankubin. These clashes were almost sectarian in character, especially as migrations [separating the sects] have registered a noticeable increase.

The clashes shut down all parts of the city of Tripoli, which was already experiencing a severe food crisis. Bakeries were closed down, and vegetables and fruit were unsaleable, because the markets were closed. Electricity was cut off in the city, and terror stalked its streets, to the sound of bullets and explosions. The local heroes of "popular resistance" in the various districts regained the roles, for which they had been waiting for a long time. Many districts have been closed to strangers.

The dangerous direction in the course of events in Tripoli became more and more manifest when Syrian forces operating as deterrent forces, were exposed to sniper and militia fire resulting in a number of casualties. This was regarded as a serious development.

Severe fighting broke out continuously over a 3 day period, during which there were more than 25 killed and scores wounded. All attempts to stop the firing failed. The chief of intelligence of the Syrian forces operating in Lebanon, Col Muhammad Ghanim, and "Abu al-Hul," member of Fatah's central committee, went to Tripoli, and together attempted for 2 consecutive days to arrange a cease-fire, the withdrawal of militias, and the removal of barricades. Finally, they were able to achieve an uneasy calm in most of the city's districts--with the exception of al-Qubbih and al-Tabbanih and their environs--in exchange for a fresh deployment of deterrent troops, a better definition of their role, and certian "guarantees" requested by the militias in the districts.

A Power Struggle

In spite of the relative calm obtaining in the city in the days that followed this agreement, Lebanese security authorities still fear that it is the calm before the storm, because the causes of the recent fighting have not been dealt with in depth. The mistake, as security authorities themselves say, was to view the incidents as "individual disputes" or as the result of "behavior of undisciplined elements." These authorities believe that it is the behavior of certain leadership elements, created by the war, which caused the problems, created estrangement, and induced the Tripolitanians to demand that the army be deployed to separate the belligerents. A delegation was even sent to visit former Premier Rashid Karami, at his summer resort, to ask him to see to it that the army is deployed.

A report received by Lebanese security indicates that a struggle for power between two factions is behind the Tripoli incidents. Both of them want to monopolize the support of the Tripolitanians who, apparently, want their leadership to be in the hands of residents of the city and its leaders.

The report notes that the cease-fire was arranged only after an understanding was reached between the Syrian command and the Palestinian Resistance, which sent "Abu al-Hul" to settle the matter. The report acknowledges that the situation in Tripoli is very complicated. There are groups which support political parties. Others favor other types of organizations, which causes some difficulty in determining each faction's loyalty.

During the negotiations conducted to establish the cease-fire between the parties' militias, the Syrian side emphasized that "deterrence" applied to all, and that the Syrian force did not enter Tripoli years ago in order to side with one faction against another. On the contrary, its mission is to maintain the city's security, and it will not allow anyone to try to use it, so as to undertake activities which do not serve security and stability.

Observers fear that the Tripoli incidents will be a fore-runner of continuous tension in the north. However, there are those who believe that the Tripolitanians' desire to overcome these incidents remains strong, and that contacts are under way to end the tension, eliminate the consequences of the disputes, do away with those who have caused the alienation and take another look at the activity of the security system in the city, so as to make it more effective.

It remains to be said that officials fear that security disruptions in the north may become chronic. If tension does not originate in Batrun and its environs, or in the heights of Jubayl, it is likely to develop in Tripoli and its suburbs. And if these two fronts simmer down, incidents are likely to break out in 'Akkar.

ANTI-QADHDHAFI STUDENTS IN U.S. ISSUE STATEMENT

Cairo AKHIR SA'AH in Arabic 10 Sep 80 p 6

[Article: "Important Statement by Libyan Students in United States; Leaflets Circulated Against al-Qadhdhafi, 'the New Mussolini of Libya'"]

[Text] The Federation of Libyan Students in the United States has circulated an important statement against Col al-Qadhdhafi, the dictator, or "the new Mussolini of Libya," as the students call him. The students reveal in the statement the policy of repression, terrorism and assassinations which he has been following against the forces of the national opposition. The statement says the following about the Libyan students' movement:

"The Libyan Students' Movement in the United States of America has decided through its organizational committee to carry out a protest demonstration against the nest of crime--which used to be called Libyan Embassy--in the United States. When the students carry out this demonstration and when they sit in front of the embassy building, they will be expressing their dissatisfaction with the conduct of al-Qadhdhafi's regime. The purpose of our demonstration is to reject the policy of 'Libya's new Mussolini.' This is the policy revealed by al-Qadhdhafi's recent conduct. It became evident in the bargains he tried to strike with the students and with the forces of the national opposition as well as in his promises, threats, intimidations and inducements.

"On the basis of our faith in God, in our homeland, in the fight and in the struggle of our people, and because of our awareness of our responsibility towards the questions that are of interest to our people, we proclaim the following:

"First, we strongly reject the chaotic, terrorist regime and its repressive measures, and we join those who struggle for and champion the cause of freedom everywhere in the world in asking that they boycott Libya's illegitimate regime. We call upon all nationalist forces to work for the overthrow of this regime.

"Second, we ask for the release of all political prisoners and detainees, who are currently being subjected to the worst forms of torture, subjugation and mistreatment in al-Qadhdhafi's prisons and detention camps.

"Third, we affirm our solidarity with our people in Libya and abroad, and we pledge to God and to the homeland that the day when we will be united is near.

"Fourth, the students, through their organizational committee, reject all the bargains which the Libyan regime is trying to offer. They see these bargains as nothing but attempts by the Libyan regime to gain time.

"We express in this statement our regrets, our sympathies and our condolences to the families of the fighters who have sacrificed their lives for God and for the homeland, and we remind them of what God Almighty said: 'You must not think that those who were slain in the cause of Allah are dead. They are alive, and well provided for by their Lord.'"

In a previous statement, the Federation of Libyan Students had warned the students against the assassination attempts and the liquidations being carried out by al-Qadhdhafi's teams. The security instructions were [as follows]:

1. Every student residing in the United States has the right to own a personal weapon to defend himself. He may keep that weapon in his home or in his private car, and he has the right to use it, provided he observes the laws of every state.

2. Packages or parcels containing explosives may be used against the students. Accordingly, it is advisable to take security measures with regard to the sender of these packages or parcels, and to check with the police department in the city or the state when there is doubt.

The union distributed leaflets and posters against al-Qadhdhafi in New York, Washington and other state capitals. The bulletins carried al-Qadhdhafi's picture, and stated that he was wanted for murder and for kidnapping.

TWO LIBYAN DISSIDENTS FLEE TO EGYPT, ASSAIL QADHDHAFI'S REGIME

Cairo AL-AKHBAR in Arabic 16 Sep 80 p 3

[Article by Ahmad al-Jundi: "Two Young Men from Libya Escape to Egypt"]

[Text] It is the hope of any person anywhere to live and to die in his homeland. When a person thinks of escaping from his country, this simply means that life in his country is tantamount to death. Free people at all times and in every place consider death a lesser evil than life in fear, terror and resentment.

Two young Libyan men escaped from al-Qadhdhafi's purgatory, and sought refuge in Egypt. They broke through the armed blockade on the Libyan borders. After a harrowing adventure with the colonel's reconnaissance troops, they disappeared in the desert for three nights. They traveled 1,950 kilometers without water and without food until they reached the Egyptian borders.

The two escapees, Hamad Salih Zayd, a university student, and Muhammad 'Ali Nasr, a driver, announced that they took these risks, because life in Libya was like death. They said that al-Qadhdhafi's opponents were everywhere in Libya, even in the revolutionary committees which are dear to the colonel. They said that there were 82 prisons in Libya, 14 underground detention camps, 10,000 prisoners and a day for revenge.

They said, "Don't believe Libya's broadcasts. The Libyans use devices to amplify the sounds of cheers." They said that al-Qadhdhafi claimed to be austere, but that he owned a yacht that cost 70 million dollars; that his airplane cost 150 million dollars; and that he had spent 2 million dollars for his son's circumcision. Members of al-Qadhdhafi's family are now among the wealthiest people in Libya; they had been among its poorest tribes.

They said that the Libyan citizen was living in a purgatory, and that he was being subjected to terrorism and tyranny everywhere and at all times.

They affirmed that the Libyan people had grievances against the regime of al-Qadhdhafi, and that they were getting ready to attack it sooner or later. No one [in Libya] has any sense of his human nature. Every citizen feels that his home, his children, his livelihood and his life are being threatened. The Libyan has lost his dignity, his sense of security and his honor, and his fate is now subject to the mood of the members of the popular committees which include the rabble, the unemployed, the illiterate and the ignorant.

Resentment Towards al-Sadat

They said that al-Qadhdhafi harbored [a feeling of] resentment against Egypt, and against al-Sadat in particular, becuase al-Sadat had broken al-Qadhdhafi's insane ambition to lead the Arab nation. Al-Qadhdhafi's insanity had led him to believe that he would have been capable of realizing this ambition with the funds of the Libyan people.

They said that al-Qadhdhafi was not a suitable ruler, because he was afflicted with schizophrenia, megalomania and hate. The Libyan people know that. Despite the violence and the terror they will not surrender; this regime will be overthrown, and al-Qadhdhafi will meet his inevitable destiny.

Details of the Adventure

Libyan student Hamad Salih Zayd narrated the details of the escape adventure.

He said, "We knew it would be risky. Al-Qadhdhafi knows that any Libyan citizen would like to escape from Libya to Egypt, because it is the only country where a foreigner can feel safe and immune from vengeance. We thought of escaping to Greece, Italy, London or Germany, but we changed our minds after al-Qadhdhafi's agents went to these countries and murdered those who opposed his regime. We decided to escape to Egypt.

The Risk or Death

"As I said, we knew it would be a risk that may end in death. Al-Qadhdhafi had placed an armed blockade along the desert and the Libyan-Egyptian borders to prevent any attempt by any Libyan citizen to escape. We also knew that reconnaissance patrols patrolled the area regularly around the clock. We had to observe their movements and their schedules, and we were helped in this by a member of the popular committee in Benghazi. They gave us accurate information about the areas where the patrols pass; they gave us their schedules and they also gave us a simple map which we committed to memory lest it fall into the hands of any patrol.

"It was risky even if we supposed that we would not be captured by the reconnaissance patrols. We had to travel in the desert, without a map, on a sandy road that had no signs to show direction for a distance of 1,950 kilometers. Every day many travelers who travel on a similar desert road that is only 250 kilometers long from Benghazi to al-Jalu lose their lives [during the journey]. We were facing the possibility of death, but we did not hesitate because the risk meant deliverance from humiliation, degradation and threats of death at every instant, but the risk meant the hope of escape, of arriving in Egypt and of being rid of the evil of this insane al-Qadhdhafi and his aides."

The Libyan student who escaped from al-Qadhdhafi went on relating the details of the adventure.

With the Assistance of the Revolutionary Committees

"We prepared everything 3 months before the zero hour which was 1 a.m. on 5 August 1980. We had concealed this matter even from our closest relatives; only two members of the popular committee in Benghazi knew of our plan. Muhammad and I had planned to drive the car he operates, which is a Toyota Landrover that can be driven in the desert and on sandy roads. The problem, however, was to provide the gas that was necessary for this long distance. Al-Qadhdhafi's orders were that no one was to be given a permit [to purchase] more than 60 liters of gas so that he could ensure the failure of any attempt to escape by car. The distance between the area of al-Kafrah in south Libya and the Egyptian borders requires at least 1,000 liters of gas. We contacted a friend who was a member of one of the revolutionary committees--we knew he was one of those who detested the regime despite the fact that he showed support for it. He promised that he would do what he could to give us a few permits. Muhammad contacted another member of the revolutionary committee in Benghazi whose acquaintance he had made previously during a trip in the car he was driving. He had discovered that that person hated al-Qadhdhafi but that he had felt compelled to join the people's committee so he can have the privileges that its members have. Muhammad succeeded in persuading that man to give him a few permits to purchase gas. We were thus able to provide the quantity that was necessary.

In the Direction of the Sun

"On the night of the escape each one of us told the members of his family that we were going to Benghazi to purchase clothing, and the adventure began. We turned towards the east. We had only one canteen of water and food for two meals only. We did not want anyone to suspect that we were going on a longer journey. After 3 hours we saw one of the reconnaissance patrols at some distance so we turned off our headlights and we waited until dawn. We began to move towards the sun just as the member of the revolutionary council had advised us. We traveled about 400 kilometers and suddenly we saw another patrol. We hid quickly beside one of the sand dunes and we were about half a kilometer from the patrol. We thought that we had been discovered, and there were moments of unlimited terror. Muhammad told me, 'If they come close to us, we will have to commit suicide. Death is a lesser evil than being arrested. Our fate will be the same if they capture us, except that if they do, we will die after being mercilessly tortured.'

"We recited the opening verses of the Koran and the Moslem creed and we waited. God preserved us; no one had seen us; and the patrol disappeared. We resumed the adventure until night fell and then we waited until dawn so we would not lose our way.

A Day Without Problems

"The following day went by without any problems. We had traveled a long distance in the desert. We began to feel exhausted after we ran out of food and water, but every kilometer that we traveled brought us closer to life. We continued our journey with the dawn of the third day, and we began to sense danger. We were approaching the borders which were regularly monitored by airplane reconnaissance patrols. But, fortunately, not a single airplane went by, and we approached the borders and gave ourselves up to the Egyptian police authorities. We thanked God that we had arrived in Egypt, the safe refuge for every Arab."

A Hypocrite and an Atheist

The Libyan student went on to say, "No one understands the conduct of this mad man al-Qadhdhafi. But he is a hypocrite, an atheist, a liar and a wicked, malicious swindler. All the people know this about him. He pretends in front of the people that he is indifferent to worldly goods and that he only wants to live in a tent, but the people know that he spent 2 million dollars to marry the Tunisian Jew Mishka Hasanayn. The people know that al-Qadhdhafi has two palaces on the island of Corfu in Italy and that he owns two yachts, one of them is the al-Mahrusah which cost 70 million dollars. Everything that the colonel touches in that yacht is made of gold.

"Al-Qadhdhafi's Boeing airplane cost more than 150 million dollars of the people's money. The people are now suffering from need. No one in Libya now owns more than 100 dinars."

Everything Is Out of Commission

"People in Libya now are suffering from the lack of production everywhere. The farms are managed by the state, and this has led to diminishing harvests. We are now importing everything from abroad. About 300,000 Libyans immigrated from Libya in 1977, and restrictions, therefore, were placed on immigration. But by then all the producers had actually immigrated, and there were no more new projects. Everything has come to a standstill.

"There are now 82 prisons in Libya; these were built by al-Qadhdhafi after the revolution. Before then there were only two prisons in Libya. Libya has 14 underground detention camps. There are more than 10,000 prisoners in the prisons and the detention camps. Every day hundreds of innocent people are arrested simply because they did not march in the support demonstrations or because they stayed away from the celebrations that al-Qadhdhafi holds so he can deliver his speeches and explain his theories which no one understands."

A Day for Revenge

The Libyan student asked, "Have you ever heard of a ruler, no matter how insane or unjust he was, who sets a day for revenge? Al-Qadhdhafi did that. He declared the 7th of April of every year to be liquidation day or revenge day, so he can get rid of his opponents, those whose loyalty is suspect, those who disobey his instructions and those who have renounced the Green Theory.

"All values and principles are being violated in al-Qadhdhafi's administration. These violations are almost sacrilegious. Homes and wedding parties are attacked, and women's jewelry confiscated. Girls' revolutionary committees have the right to enter any home or any public place and confiscate all the money and jewelry that women and girls have.

"One cannot find a gloomier picture of life anywhere in the world that is worse than the picture one finds in Libya now.

"The Libyan people feel they are oppressed. It is the sense of oppression that creates revolutions. Therefore, there is much hope that the people will rebel against this insane oppressor."

Strong Opposition

The second young Libyan man, Muhammad 'Ali Nasr, spoke and added the following to what his colleague had said:

"There is a strong opposition in Libya, but it is under the surface. Al-Qadhdhafi's opposition can be found even in the revolutionary committees in Benghazi, in Tripoli and everywhere.

"Libya's voices abroad are heard everywhere. There are those who hear those voices, sympathize with them and support them. The feeling that there is a strong opposition abroad strengthens the will of the opposition in Libya and encourages them to prepare themselves to get rid of al-Qadhdhafi.

"Do not believe what is broadcast by the Libyan media. Sound amplifiers are used in any broadcast of al-Qadhdhafi's conferences to amplify the limited cheers that are made by his followers who are members of the revolutionary committees and the workers who are rounded up from the factories so that the cheers would sound tremendous and resounding. Do not believe this: there is a resistance in Libya and an opposition; they are growing continuously, and they are making plans to confront al-Qadhdhafi."

Muhammad 'Ali Nasr went on to say: "Al-Qadhdhafi's tribe is now called in Libya the al-Damm tribe [the tribe of blood]. Sayyid, Hasan and Ahmad al-Qadhdhafi as well as Khalifah Hasanayn and other tribesmen will do anything to obtain a fortune.

"Al-Qadhdhafi's tribe was one of the poorest tribes in Libya, but it is now one of the wealthiest. Meanwhile, the ordinary Libyan citizen is denied the right to own his own home.

"On the day he left London Sayyid al-Qadhdhafi spent 2 million dollars for his farewell party."

Reasons for Unity

"Is there a rational ruler who would pay billions of dollars for a unity between two countries, one of them is in the east and the other is in the west of the Arab homeland? Is not this madness and stupidity? But al-Asad knows al-Qadhdhafi's nature, and he wants to take from him as many dinars as he can in return for a paper unity. However, al-Qadhdhafi, imagines that he can get rid of the officers and soliders who oppose him. He would send all those who oppose him into exile from Libya to Syria under the slogan of unity; the reverse of that is also true.

"Libya's funds are being spend on Uganda, Lebanon and Syria while the people have no money to pave the al-Kafrah Road in Benghazi where hundreds of travelers die every day.

"The fact that the people are aware of all this will ultimately lead to a revolution against oppression, terror and insanity."

Do You Have an Explanation?

I asked the two young escapees from Libya, "Do you have an explanation for a personality that combines all these characteristics: insanity, resentment, falsehood, hypocrisy, bloodthristiness, oppression, injustice and a notion that he is the first, the most rational and the most deserving of rulers to lead the Arab nation?

"Do you have an explanation for the conduct of a man who opened his country to the experts, weapons, agents and bases of communists even though his attack on communism was the most violent attack to which a theory was subjected?

"Do you have an explanation for the conduct of a man who claimed that the bases of his regime were the foundation of the Islamic religion, but who had the audacity to infringe upon the prophet who brought the message of this religion?

"Do you have an explanation for the conduct of a man who squanders the funds of his people in hunting down those who oppose him and appeasing those who praise him?

"We do not understand the conduct of a personality with these components, a personality in which all these defects, complexes and contradictions come together. Have you in Libya found a persuasive explanation for the conduct of this al-Qadhdhafi?"

The Libyan university student responded to my question: "No. We too in Libya have not yet found an explanation. Al-Qadhdhafi is a sick man, and he needs psychotherapy. It is certain that all psychologists would find it extremely difficult to remedy such a bestial disposition. The disease has taken so much hold of him, therapy may be very difficult."

Truthful Testimony

The conversation with the two young men who escaped al-Qadhdhafi's purgatory went on and on, but we eventually ran out of time.

There was one statement that the two young men wanted to make: "It is being rumored in Libya that all those who come to Egypt are persecuted and treated in the worst possible fashion. But the truth must be said, and we want everyone in Libya to hear it. We found nothing in Egypt but affection, security and peace. We found life without fear and without terror. We asked for political asylum in Egypt, and the authorities granted us our request. They offered us every possible assistance so we can live like any Egyptian citizen living in his homeland."

MINISTER NOTES GOVERNMENT'S AGRICULTURAL PROGRAMS, POLICIES

Nouakchott CHAAB in French 26, 27-28 Sep 80

[26 Sep 80, p 3]

[Text] At its October 1979 meeting, the Military Committee for National Salvation (CMSN) resolved, within the framework of the priority granted to the rural sector, to set up an agricultural loan fund and establish an organization in charge of putting the institution into operation.

The government, which was in charge of the study and resolution of these questions, has just examined and adopted a communication presented by the Ministry of Rural Development concerning a report on agricultural credit and the organization of the marketing of farm products.

We therefore met with Mohamed Ould Amar, minister of rural development, who defined the meaning and scope of that important decision for us.

[Question] At its latest meeting, the Council of Ministers approved a report on agricultural credit and the organization of the marketing of farm products. Can you tell us the main lines of that report?

[Answer] The Council of Ministers examined and adopted a communication presented by my ministry on 13 September 1980.

That communication dealt with the conclusions and recommendations of the report on agricultural credit drafted by a group of experts organized under the aegis of the Ministry of Rural Development in application of a decision made by the Military Committee for National Salvation at its October 1979 meeting.

Within the framework of the priority granted to the rural sector as proclaimed by the CMSN at that same session, the establishment of an agricultural credit fund and an organization in charge of putting that institution in operation was decided upon.

The government was in charge of the study and resolution of these questions, as elements in a national strategy to promote rural activities whose essential objectives had been defined. In the long run, those objectives are: self-sufficiency in food, the return to and settlement of the people in their native regions, and finally, the rehabilitation and protection of the natural environment.

These objectives are obviously important and ambitious.

It is in fact necessary for our country to be able to meet its needs for food as soon as possible. During the period of the drought and throughout the difficulties we have faced, friendly countries and organizations have lent us their aid in a generous and useful fashion.

But equally urgent needs exist elsewhere in the world and it could happen that in the eyes of the donors, food crises in Asia or other regions of Africa, for example, might be considered to have priority over the Sahel countries. One can easily imagine what the consequences would be under the present circumstances.

This is a possibility that the government wishes to bear in mind.

This gives their full meaning to the basic option (priority to the rural sector) and to accompanying measures taken or being drafted in order to translate this option into fact.

I would point here to an immediate measure being taken by the government: the establishment of a reserve or emergency supply of grain that would ward off the grave, widespread scarcities of food products. These stocks should be backed by others whose role would be to ensure regulation of the market in the case of limited regional scarcities.

Nevertheless, stimulation of national production remains the cornerstone of the government's action in this field.

Naturally, agricultural water projects that are to be launched before the end of the year (Gorgol Noi, Aftout, 30 small village perimeters) will help increase production, as will dams in the interior of the country (some 30 dams a year during the Fourth Plan) and the deep wells drilled (30 a year during the 5 years of the plan).

But it is the expected improvements in yield of the so-called traditional crops (rain crops and flood crops) that will make it possible to limit the grain deficit in the coming years.

One of the factors limiting the development of production has to date been precisely the absence of production inceitives because of the failure to provide access to farm loans for seasonal expenses or the purchase of production equipment, the lack of marketing structures for surpluses and the absence of guaranteed farm prices.

These are the elements that the experts took up. They recommended the following to the government: 1) the establishment of a farm loan institution; 2) the promotion of professional structures; 3) the adaptation of specialized organizations to the task of supplying consumable expenditures and the necessary production factors for the development of rural production; 4) the reorganization of collection and the processing of farm products; and 5) the establishment of mechanisms for the setting and guaranteeing of farm prices and the marketing of production.

The resources of the farm credit fund have been defined, along with terms for their use. In this connection, particular emphasis has been placed on the solvency of loan applicants and on the security they offer, solvency linked to an appropriate environment that must be created and promoted through the reactivation of agricultural cooperation and the dissemination of improved farming techniques.

The farm credit fund must cover seasonal (short-term) credits and medium-term investment operations. Credit for development operations is not planned until a later phase.

The weakness of the current cooperative system requires that a specialized organization play the role of central purchaser in order to ensure supplies to farmers and livestock breeders. The nature and volume of such operations will be determined together with professional structures.

This organization, which could be the OMC [Mauritanian Grain Office] or a structure having the same vocation, must assume the task of collecting debts from recipient cooperatives and act as intermediary between the FND [National Development Fund] and the cooperatives.

Initially, two or three regions with high agricultural development potential will serve as test zones.

The recruiting of farmers and livestock breeders will be more dense there in order to take the projected operations into account. It will be done by a multidisciplinary team at the level of agricultural sectors and livestock inspectorates.

At the central level, it is recommended that a full extension service oriented toward production be set up.

The role of the services in the rural sector is defined in the phase of implementation of agricultural credit, along with accompanying measures such as the supplying of production elements and equipment, the collection and marketing of farm surpluses, control and technical support.

Finally, a schedule for the startup of operations is planned.

[Question] Mr Minister, can you tell us how the farmers will be able to take advantage of the farm credit? Will they do so through the National Development Fund?

[Answer] The farm credit fund's role is to aid farmers and livestock breeders in their production efforts. But their lack of organization, scattering and low technical level constitute a definite handicap that we are forced to take into consideration in the drafting of principles and terms for the farm credit fund. This fund, whose resources are limited, aims to help the largest possible number of our nationals.

For these reasons, the precooperative groupings and the cooperatives will be the privileged beneficiaries of the fund. The reorganized professional farm organizations which the government would like to encourage will be totally different from those that existed before and that mainly enabled their leaders to justify government demands.

From now on, the cooperatives must have statutes and conform to them. They must work with government officials in drafting activity programs whose execution will be supervised, at least with respect to those receiving financial aid from the government.

Private parties who have demonstrated that they are involved in continuing agricultural production activities and that they have made significant personal financial efforts will also be able to receive credit.

The agricultural credit fund is a branch of the National Development Fund which also includes a branch of activity for the development of small and medium-size enterprises and a third branch for exclusively social housing.

[Question] Among the problems facing those who would like to get involved in agriculture is the lack of means and absence of technical assistance. Mr Minister, do you believe that with the establishment of this agricultural credit fund, these problems will be solved?

[Answer] The agricultural credit fund will definitely make it possible to help nationals truly desirous of getting involved in agricultural production or livestock raising. The credit to which they will have access will enable them to meet expenses and purchase the machinery they need for their activities.

However, one must not expect that all Mauritanians will have their finance problems settled immediately.

As I said, the government intends to give certain privileges to cooperatives, along with serious, disciplined, motivated farmers who see government aid as an accompaniment to their personal efforts.

[27-28 Sep 80, p 3]

[Text] In the first part of the exclusive interview which he granted us, Minister of Rural Development Ahmed Ould Amar defined the context within which, at its most recent meeting, the Council of Ministers adopted the report on agricultural credit and the organization of the marketing of farm products.

After citing the main suggestions made by experts within the framework of that report, the minister described the major advantages which farmers may derive from agricultural credit.

The problem of financing projects, which constitutes a serious obstacle to rural development, the dispute involving SONADER [National Rural Development Company] and landowners over the question of land and the launching of projects in Aftout Es-Saheli: These are the main questions taken up by the minister in the last part of the interview.

Problem of Financing: Obstacle to Rural Development

[Question] One of the most serious obstacles facing major agricultural projects is the lack of financing. In your opinion, how is this problem going to be solved?

[Answer] The problem of financing the projects is definitely a major obstacle to rural development. Like many Third World countries, our nation is experiencing difficulties due to the absence or insufficiency of equipment and operating credits. But the financial factor is nevertheless not decisive in the development process.

We know of countries with considerable financial resources and which are not developed. The absorption of financing faces other countries in terms of their human, institutional and administrative deficiencies.

Mauritania is trying to make up for a lack of resources by the quality of its personnel, by its search for the most economical solutions and above all, by the mobilization of national production forces. Finally, it is seeking to improve the effectiveness of its administration.

We can count on the aid of our Arab brothers and friendly countries and organizations for the completion of major projects and for the acquisition of equipment and infrastructure necessary to the development of our economy.

But we can and must make internal efforts, using our own resources. The institution of a regional development fund starting this year and of an agricultural production campaign constitute important steps on this path.

Land Problems

[Question] For some time, SONADER has faced certain difficulties due to the demands of land owners. Mr Minister, have we succeeded in solving the land problem at that level?

[Answer] I would point out that SONADER is having no difficulties due to the situation in the pilot Gorgol perimiter. SONADER ensured recruiting at the request of the government. It is now up to the government to clarify things and to make farm owners and operators aware of its intentions.

It was the right of the people involved to spell out their real desires. Instead of that, both sides have continued to duck the essential problems, which are the appropriation of land, the method of developing the land and mutual obligations. They were trying to gain time. Politics became involved and the search for reasonable solutions was complicated.

The current situation helps no one. The landowners believe they have suffered injury and the government, which invested very large sums in the operation, received neither the anticipated political nor social advantages.

The experience of the Gorgol pilot area revealed the urgent need for a suitable legal framework for government intervention in development operations in which public development funds are to be invested.

A committee of experts is now working under the aegis of the ministry on an overall proposal for the settlement of land problems throughout the national territory.

[Question] What measures have been taken to guarantee the marketing of agricultural products? Will this task be entrusted to an establishment?

[Answer] The marketing of agricultural products will determine the success of the entire policy in the rural sector.

It is marketing that will provide the farmers and livestock breeders with profits, encouraging them to remain on their land and undertake production activities.

It constitutes the guaranteed reimbursement of loans granted by the agricultural credit fund.

In our plan, the OMC and the operator to be set up in the area of livestock raising must buy agricultural and livestock surpluses and ensure their marketing in regions where there are shortages.

Rice will be bought by SONIMEX [expansion unknown]. Purchase prices to the producer will be set by the government for every agricultural season.

Professional organizations of farmers and livestock breeders will also be able to sell their production freely, except for the portion reserved to cover the reimbursement of possible loans to the agricultural credit fund.

Aftout Es-Saheli

[Question] For some time, there has been talk of agricultural projects in the Aftout Es-Saheli region, at Tamourjt Naaj, R'Kiz, and so on. What has happened so far?

[Answer] The situation is as follows:

Aftout Es-Saheli

The plan for the first partion of the project, to wit, the intake, channels, the four closing dikes and the experimental farm, is now ready.

The prefeasibility study has been completed for the development of an area measuring 10,000 to 14,000 hectares and for the Nouakchott-Afout water supply.

Our Iraqi brothers did agree to finance the first portion of the project for an amount of 2 billion UM [Mauritanian ouguiya] at the time of the official visit of the president of the CMSN and chief of state to that country.

My departments are now working with Iraqi experts on terms for implementation of the project, which they hope will begin early in 1981.

Lake R'Kiz

The study for the development has been completed. It presents several options, including one providing for 5,200 hectares of crops irrigated by means of gravity and grazing areas irrigated by floods ranging from 1,650 hectares (for Diama alone) to 2,950 hectares (if both Diama and Manantali are in service).

Financing of this project, whose cost is 1.2 billion UM, is being sought from Saudi Arabia and France.

Tamourt Enaj

This project includes two main phases: the development of 10 irrigated areas by drilling deep wells, totaling 80 hectares. Eight of the 10 wells have already been completed.

Financing for this portion is being obtained from France (CCCE [Central Fund for Economic Cooperation]).

The second phase includes the development of an irrigated area of 1,000 hectares. An additional 800 hectares will be prepared for flood crops. The schedule is ready.

Financing is being sought from the Federal Republic of Germany within the framework of the overall development project for Tagant.

[Question] Mr Minister, have you any appeal to make during this rainy season?

[Answer] Quite simply, I should like to tell my fellow countrymen who are farmers and livestock breeders that the CMSN and the government are making major efforts in their behalf in order to improve their living and working conditions. These efforts are certainly not enough, but they are truly meritorious given the current situation of our economy, our public finances and the other sectors of national activity.

Our livestock breeders and farmers must continue to deserve the attention of the government because of their serious efforts and work.

During the current rainy season, all fields must be cultivated. The pasture land we have this year must be protected from brush fires. Trees must be protected from abusive cutting which has disastrous consequences for our environment and that of our children.

EEC AID FOR DAM RESERVOIR AT FOUM GLEITA

London WEST AFRICA in English 20 Oct 80 pp 2092, 2093

[Text]

The EEC is to provide 9.5m. EUA to help to build and develop a dam reservoir at Foum Gleita in Mauritania. The total cost of the scheme which also includes developing a surrounding area of 3,600 ha, is estimated at 68m. EUA. Aid is also expected from the World Bank, the Islamic Development Bank, the Abu Dhabi Fund and the International Fund for Agricultural Development.

The Foum Gleita dam will be built in the Gorgol Noir Valley, a tributary of the Senegal river. Agriculture in the area suffers from infrequent and irregular rainfall, and the development of irrigation in the country is seen as the only means of reducing its substantial dependence on external aid for national food requirements.

Development of the area should allow for the production of 26,800 tonnes of cereals, and 2,400 tonnes of vegetables. Rice will be the main crop grown in the area, with an output of 21,900 tonnes of paddy, 10,200 tonnes of which will be processed and marketed. This is equal to one-third of the amount of imported rice at the moment. The project will also mean an output of 2,800 tonnes of maize and 2,100 tonnes of sorghum. This will mean that the region, with a population of 162,000, will be self-supporting as regards foodstuffs and any surplus can therefore be marketed in other regions of Mauritania.

Work on the dam is expected to be completed in about thirty months.

BRIEFS

DEFICIENT RAINFALL--Aioun (AMP)--The agricultural situation in Hodh El Gharbi is generally unsatisfactory because of the irregular rainfall and its poor distribution throughout the region. This announcement was made by the head of the agricultural sector in Aioun and picked up by the regional AMP correspondent. Two departments: Kobenni and Tintane, have had satisfactory rainfall, the official said, indicating that the amount received in the two areas is 135.5 and 208.5 millimeters respectively, compared with 300 last year. The Department of Aioun received only 70.07 compared with 250 in 1979 and in Tamchakett, the situation is even worse, as only 28.1 millimeters of rain have fallen. Although rain crops are developing normally in Kobenni and Tintane, the same is not true in the rest of the region, the agricultural official noted. VISIT OF SPANISH FOREIGN MINISTER DISCUSSED

Anticipated Results of Visit

Casablanca MAROC SOIR in French 13 Oct 80 pp 1, 3

[Article by Mohamed Tamri: "To Strengthen the Cooperation Between Rabat and Madrid on Healthy and Solid Foundations"]

[Text] The arrival in Morocco of Perez Llorca, the Spanish Foreign Affairs minister, cannot fail to revive the Spanish-Moroccan cooperation. The visit comes at a time when our country, in the opinion of all neutral observers, is in control of the military situation in the Sahara, at a time when the Spanish government is showing that it is firmly opposed to all pressure and all blackmail aimed at forcing it to recognize the POLISARIO mercenaries or their ghostly republic. It also comes at a time when the growing interest aroused in both governments by the plan to build a permanent link through the Straits of Gibraltar leads us to expect greater rapprochement between Morocco and Spain. Finally, the visit of the head of Spanish diplomacy is directly connected to the prospects for improving bilateral cooperation, especially in the field of fishing.

Until recently there was talk of the psychological barrier that underlay the many misunderstandings between Morocco and Spain, and of the paucity of human contacts between the leaders of the two countries. In fact many mistakes were made on both sides. In our opinion the first mistake stems directly from the refusal of certain Spanish leaders to assume their responsibilities and fulfill their commitments. The first big mistake was recorded shortly after the signing of the tripartite Madrid accord, according to whose terms the Spanish government cedes the Sahara back to Morocco. When the accord was signed we heard three highly-placed Spanish leaders say that "they are washing their hands of us, we have transferred the administration but we have not transferred the sovereignty." A bad-faith, self-satisfied answer, for it is obvious that Spain has given that sovereignty to someone, and also, the tripartite Madrid accord makes no distinction between the two ideas.

Happily for both our countries, we are not guided by bad faith in taking our respective positions. Proof of this is the firm attitude of the Spanish government and its entire political class in the face of the Algerian mercenaries' blackmail. Madrid's reaction to the kidnapping and sequestration of Spanish citizens by the Algerian government's henchmen is exemplary and logical, far removed from any weakness and completely natural in the face of the extortions committed in the name of the people's pseudo-rights.

All of these elements may form the basic framework of a new Maghribian policy on the part of Spain, one more in conformity with its interests and taking into account the historic and legitimate rights of the Moroccan people and the dangers of general explosion brought upon North Africa by the policy of domination and expansion followed by Alteria and Libya.

New Orientation Foreseen

Casablanca MAROC SOIR in French 14 Oct 80 pp 1, 4

[Article by Abdelkrim El Andaloussi: "An 'Open Attitude' That Will Yield Neither to Pressure nor Blackmail"]

[Text] The first official visit of the Spanish Foreign Affairs minister, Jose Pedro Perez-Llorca, to a foreign country was made to Morocco. The head of Spanish diplomacy, since his appointment last 8 September has visited the United Nations headquarters in New York and the Council of Europe in Strasbourgh. His visit to Morocco illustrates the Spanish government's interest in improving Spanish-Moroccan relations and strengthening bilateral cooperation.

In Morocco we published his first official statement on 9 September, when he opened in Madrid the preparatory phase of the conference on security and cooperation in Europe, in which he stressed the necessity of seeking peace in freedom and cooperation. "We do not want," he said, "peace of any kind, peace at any price, we want only peace in freedom and freedom through cooperation."

His statement before the 35th General Assembly of the United Nations also revealed that he has a negotiator's mind with which to find--"with an open attitude"--solutions to the problems threatening peace in the world, and the desire to seek new formulas for cooperation with the Third World countries, the Mediterranean countries and especially the Maghrib countries.

"The Spanish government," Mr Perez-Llorca emphasized, "is attentively following the evolution of the situation in the Maghrib, with which it feels united by virtue of geographic proximity and profound historic, cultural and human ties, and we wish to preserve and develop close relations of friendship with all the Maghribian countries."

This desire, manifested by the new head of Spanish diplomacy does not surprise us, knowing that Mr Perez-Llorca is a career diplomat who is sincere and clever, and that for him only the facts count.

Who better than this young Andalusian diplomat--he was born in Cadiz in November 1940--who carries Spanish-Arab blood in his veins, can understand the justice of the cause defended by Morocco and act upon it?

"The Silver Fox," as his compatriots like to call him, who until now has avoided making statements to the press, has announced his desire to continue the policy followed by his predecessor, Marcelino Oreja, but with "an open attitude," and without yielding to external pressure or blackmail.

With regard to the Northwest African conflict that pits Algeria against Morocco and threatens Spanish interests in the region, Mr Perez-Llorca's position is clear:

"Spain has ended its presence in the territory (formerly the Spanish Sahara) and the minimal administration it exercised there until 26 February 1976.

"Spain," Mr Perez-Llorca continued, "seeks no advantages, either for itself or for anyone else," but it wants "to contribute to peace" on the basis of an "absolute impartiality" and "firm principles."

"Neither flattery nor pressure, whatever form they may take, are going to succeed in turning us away from the unaltered and consistent line we have followed," he said.

Speaking of pressure, the head of Spanish diplomacy added, "However, I must formulate my vigorous protest at the violence which, against every international standard, and regardless of human rights, is being perpetrated at this moment against innocent citizens of my country who are being used as hostages."

It is not difficult to interpret this as a clear condemnation of acts of piracy by the so-called "Polisario," which has abducted several Spanish fishermen and is holding them hostage.

According to several signs Mr Perez-Llorca seems to want to give a new orientation to Spanish policy in the Maghrib. The condemnation of the "barbarous acts" committed by the mercenaries against the Spanish fishermen, expressed by the president of the government, by the minister of Foreign Affairs and by national public opinion is very significant. Spain has suffered too much from its passivity, exploited excessively by mercenary bands armed by an Algeria that calls itself friendly. The time has come to put an end to the attacks against the prestige and interests of Spain. It can depend with every assurance on Morocco's support. We have always said that Spain must be firm in its Maghribian policy.

Commentary on Visit

Casablanca AL BAYANE in French 16 Oct 80 p 1

[Editorial by "Al Bayane:" "Diplomatic Formalism?"]

[Text] "The mountain labored and brought forth a mouse."

This is pretty much what one would be tempted to think after the lightning 28-hour visit to our country by the Spanish minister of Foreign Affairs, Jose Pedro Perez-Llorca.

In fact, save for the signing of a cultural cooperation agreement, which is to replace the 1957 accord, we do not have the impression that the meeting of the Moroccan and Spanish diplomatic staffs produced any concrete progress in the settlement of the important points that arise in bilateral debates.

It will be noted, for example, that on the subject of fishing Mr Perez-Llorca was careful not to be precise, preferring to leave it to the opinions of the experts.

Better yet, everything leads one to believe that the status quo--which is profoundly prejudicial to Morocco's fishing interests--will be renewed as a result of the contracts between the two parties, which are to begin officially next 28 October.

As for the rest, these are just pious vows and vague declarations, as much where the plan for a permanent link between Morocco and Spain is concerned as for the potential axes for a marked strengthening of bilateral cooperation.

It is believable that the touchy pending dossiers were not mentioned, or that their resolution was not advanced an inch. We are thinking particularly of the shipping of citrus fruits for the EEC by way of Spanish territory, and the problem of what legal and social guarantees are to be granted our workers who have emigrated beyond the Straits.

Was this visit, then, simply to make contact? To get acquainted?

That being the case, that would confirm that what separates Spain from Morocco is not just an arm of the sea.

For we have to notice the discretion--more than diplomacy--with which the Spanish minister of Foreign Affairs brought up the burning--for Spain--question of the Polisario's fishermen-hostages, who are prisoners in Algeria.

The head of Madrid diplomacy--at least publicly and for the press--contented himself with a declaration of principle "condemning all violations of and attacks on human rights."

He absolutely did not connect that affair with the artificial tension that prevails in the Maghrib, any more than he seemed to react to the "discreet appeal" by our minister of Foreign Affairs, who said he was "persuaded that Madrid shares our concern for preserving our region from a conflict prejudicial to all."

So there is a Spanish reserve and sense of moderation that will not go unnoticed in East Oujda, where this visit has surely been followed with a great deal of attention.

Of course there is nothing to prevent us from believing that these muffled words and the fact that the visit is being "banalized"--a desire that seems clear on both sides--are being inserted into the framework of delicate diplomatic maneuvers aimed at contributing qualitative and positive changes to the Maghribian political climate.

Nevertheless, in policy one can only count on certainties.

And consequently it is not improper to show a certain disappointment when appraising the results of Mr Llorca's visit to our country. We are not likely to be contradicted by the announcement of the establishing of a precise schedule "for the most important questions."

The general situation of the relations between the two countries and the present political context called for results that would be otherwise more concrete, since it is true that formalism has never accomplished miracles.

INSTALLATION CEREMONY FOR NEW SECURITY HEADS DESCRIBED

Casablanca MAROC SOIR in French 9 Oct 80 p 7

[Article by M. Benhida]

[Text] The general movement toward change that the National Security has been going through recently has affected several leaders and chief of services of the Regional Security in Marrakech. In that connection a glittering ceremony recently took place at the province seat to install Ali Benkacem, the controller general, who was appointed chief of the Marrakech Regional Security, replacing Mohamed Karim Sayagh, who was transferred to Tetuan.

On the same occasion the new chiefs of the regional services of the Regional Security were also installed, among them Yousfi Kaddour, chief of the Regional Service of the Criminal Investigation Department; Mohamed Chawad, the central commissioner; and Mohamed Sebti, chief of the Regional Service of General Information, who replaced, respectively, Abderrahman Tazi, transferred to Meknes; Maati Khattabi, appointed chief of the Regional Security in Ouarzazate; and Moulay Abdellah Alaoui, transferred to Agadir.

In the course of this glittering reception, Mustapha Tarik, His Majesty's governor in the province of Marrakech, gave a speech in which he eulogized Mohamed Karim Sayagh, the former chief of the Regional Security in Marrakech, emphasizing his success in his mission in the capital of the South.

"Although we are all sorry to see him go," said Mustapha Tarik, "we must wish him every success in his new residence where, I am persuaded, his actions will be crowned with success. On behalf of all of you," he added, "permit me to thank him for all he has accomplished in this province, as well as his close associates, Abderrahman Tazi, Moulay Abdellah Alaoui and Maati Khattabi; I wish all of them every success in their new offices."

The governor then welcomed Ali Benkacem, the new chief of the Regional Security in Marrakech, and congratulated him on the confidence placed in him by appointing him to this office. Ali Benkacem's appointment at the head of the Security in Marrakech is evidence of the board's continuing interest in providing peace and tranquillity for the citizens of this province, he said.

After bringing out Ali Benkacem's biography, the governor of the province stated, "I am convinced that the new chief of the Regional Security will have no trouble succeeding in his new mission. This is a delicate task that requires considerable effort and untiring work, which Mr Benkacem is used to; he has the experience to occupy this post and accomplish his administrative cuty under the best conditions, for the new chief of the Regional Security has always occupied very important positions since 1958."

The governor then said he hoped the new leaders of the Regional Security will continue the activities begun by their predecessors--activities whose goal is the peace and security of the inhabitants. Those two points form the basis of prosperity, progress and economic and social development.

Before concluding his speech the governor welcomed Mohamed Sebti, Kaddour Yousfi and Mohamed Chawad.

The glittering reception was attended by Mahjoub El Akkad, the governor's caliph in the city; Hassan Moulihi, acting secretary general; His Majesty Prince Sidi Mohamed El Hafidi; Haj Larbi Majboud, first presiding judge of the Court of Appeals; Haj Ahmed Lakhdar, King's prosecutor; Ahmed Chouhaidi, presiding judge of the District Court; Dr Naim Brini, vice chairman of the Provincial Assembly; M'hamed Khalifa,, chairman of the Municipal Council; Deputies Abdessamad Al Istiqsa; Lhousseine Boulasri; Haj Mohamed Boukdir and Abderrafi Basri; Col Hammou Hajoui, regional commander of the Royal Gendarmerie; Col El Mouch, second in command of the BEFRA [expansion unknown]; Col Cheloli, second in command of the FAR [Royal Armed Forces] Parade Ground the regional directors and provincial delegates and heads of technical and administrative services; the circle heads; the heads of the urban arrondissements; Regional Security staff members; as well as several important persons, notables and members of the elected body.

SUGAR CANE PRODUCTION AT GHARB, SUCRAFOR DISCUSSED

Gharb Refinery

Rabat L'OPINION in French 9 Oct 80 p 2

[Text] Azeddine Guessous, the minister of Commerce, Industry, Merchant Marine and Maritime Fishing, presided in his department headquarters over the third session of the board of directors of the Gharb Cane Sugar Refinery.

This plant, whose anticipated processing capacity is 3,500 tons of cane per day, is the 11th sugar production unit and the second specializing in processing cane into sugar. Currently being assembled, its startup will occur on 1 May 1981 with the processing during the first season of 250,000 tons of cane and a production of 25,000 tons of refined sugar in 2-kilogram packages and 50-kilogram bags. By its third season, in 1983, it will reach its cruising capacity with the processing of 420,000 tons of cane and a production of 43,000 tons of sugar.

However, taking into account the development of sugar cane around Gharb, the production will exceed the capacity of installations in Mechra Bel Ksiri (SUNACAS [expansion unknown])and Dar Gueddari (SURAC [expansion unknown]) and will necessitate the starting up of a third sugar cane plant in Gharb in 1983. There is good reason to note that studies on the subject of launching the third sugar cane refinery in Gharb are at present in the process of being realized.

During the meeting a detailed examination of the company's activities was conducted, as well as of the various assembly projects currently in progress with a view to starting up the sugar refinery for the 1981 season.

SUCRAFOR's Production

Rabat L'OPINION in French 9 Oct 80 p 2

[Text] MAP--The minister of Agriculture and Agrarian Reform, during a tour in Nador Province, last Friday visited the Oriental Sugar Refinery (SUCRAFOR), a unit that became operational in 1972.

This plant, which is located in Zaio in Nador Province, is--as its technical director, Saddiq Ahmed, indicated--unique of its kind in that it provides a dual function. It processes both beets and sugar cane.

After it was built in 1971 and became operational in 1972, SUCRAFOR undertook the processing of beets, before expanding its activities in 1974 to sugar cane.

Beets and sugar cane, cultivation of which is practised in the irrigated outskirts of Moulouya, cover respectively 5,150 and 750 hectares. SUCRAFOR processes 3,000 tons of beets per day and 1,000 tons of sugar cane per day.

However, the plant is only operational during the seasons, which begin in January and May and last about three months. Between seasons the permanent workers are responsible for maintaining and cleaning the machines.

It should be emphasized, on the other hand, that SUCRAFOR fills 60 percent of the sugar needs of the eastern region. Cultivation of beets is practised on both banks of the Moulouya, while cane is cultivated only on the left bank (Nador region). The annual production of granulated sugar, to which SUCRAFOR's mission is limited, is 25,000 tons. Its capacity, however, is 35,000 tons.

The crop program for the Garet outskirts, which is being equipped, anticipates reserving an area of 300 hectares for the cultivation of beets and sugar cane, which will alleviate the shortage of raw materials and will increase the plant's production capacity. The number of farmers who provide the plant with raw material is 3,340 for beets and 701 for cane.

PROCEEDINGS OF COUNCIL OF MINISTERS' MEETING REPORTED

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 17 Oct 80 pp 1, 4

> [Text] President Bourguiba's proposal for aid to El Asnam reconstruction; chief of state concerned with assuring the success of Administrative Reform; to enable the National Labor Union Commission to assume its mission under better conditions; a measure to reintegrate unemployed workers shortly after 26 January.

Yesterday morning, Thursday 16 October 1980, the Council of Ministers held its weekly meeting in the Government Palace in the Casbah, under the chairmanship of Mohamed Mzali, the prime minister.

In the beginning of the session the Council brought up the severe trial which the brother Algerian people have been subjected to following the earthquake that struck the El Asnam region.

The prime minister presented a report on the recent visit to Algeria of Mme Wassila Bourguiba, who was sent by the Supreme Combatant, President Habib Bourguiba, at the head of a Tunisian delegation, to express personally to the Algerian leaders and people the feelings of affliction and solidarity on the part of the president, the government and the people of Tunisia following the tragedy that has struck a portion of the territory of a brother country.

President Chadli Bendjedid hastened to emphasize to the wife of the Supreme Combatant how much he appreciated the prompt and spontaneous solidarity manifested by Tunisia toward Algeria and made concrete by the telephone message that President Habib Bourguiba was the first chief of state to put through.

For his part, the minister of Public Health reported on the visit he has just made to Algeria on this occasion. He recalled that less than 24 hours after the disaster Algeria showed its support for Algeria by putting at its disposal three medical teams, which went into action as soon as they arrived in the disaster-stricken areas. Tunisia also sent sanitary equipment and medications, to help our Algerian brothers cope with the situation.

The prime minister expressed the Council's satisfaction with the burst of solidarity shown by Tunisian organizations at the official and popular levels, thus conferring a national character on our fraternal support of Algeria. In particular he brought out the efforts of medical and paramedical personnel, both civilian and military, of officials of the Public Health Ministry and Civil Defense, the Organization of the National Social Solidarity Committee and the Tunisian Red Cross.

The prime minister announced that the Supreme Combatant has decided to submit to Algeria a proposal to make available to it Tunisian teams of engineers and architects to take part in studies on reconstructing the city of El Asnam.

The Council then examined what steps have been taken in preparation for the next UGTT [Tunisian General Federation of Labor]. It expressed its pleasure at the recent creation of the National Commission in charge of preparing the sessions and expressed the hope that it would result in the congress of the Labor Union Group being held in a free, democratic and healthy climate, which would be likely to enable the UGTT to fully play its role as a social partner contributing to the strengthening of the country's social and economic development.

In that connection the prime minister stressed the need to give the commission all the help it needs, to enable it to assume its mission under better conditions, within the policy of dialog established between the government and the various social partners.

The Council also decided to form an interministerial committee, to be charged with studying the situation of the agents and workers from the public and private sectors, who lost their employment shortly after the events of January 1978, with a view to their re-entering the work force.

The ministerial delegate to the prime minister in charge of civil service and administrative reform presented a report in which he took stock of the actions conducted in the Administrative Reform, especially those having to do with defining assignments before they are permanently delegated to the regional administrations, with the goal of bringing the administration closer to the citizens, and enabling the regional services to accomplish their administrative, financial and technical tasks efficiently and easily. At the end of the report the ministers of Agriculture, Equipment and Housing, of Public Health and of National Education presented a group of regulatory texts on delegation of assignments in their departments, for the benefit of their regional boards.

The prime minister reaffirmed the chief of state's concern for assuring the success of Administrative Reform by decentralization, trimming formalities and simplifying the administrative channels. However, the decentralizing action is to be conducted in rationally studied stages so as not to engender new burdens to strain the state's budget.

The prime minister conveyed to the Council the instructions of the Supreme Combatant concerning the need to appoint competent and enthusiastic staff members, an indispensable condition for the success of the decentralization, and to create effective control structures at the regional level.

The realization of decentralization is to develop eventually from continuing negotiation with the [words ommitted] possible.

Before closing its sessions the Council approved a number of legislative bills to be submitted to the National Assembly. These texts concern:

Ratification of the financial cooperation agreement concluded between the Tunisian government and the FRG.

Ratification of the loan agreement concluded between the World Bank and the National Bank of Tunisia relative to financing agricultural credit.

Ratification of the bill authorizing the state to participate in the Arab Fund for the Activities and Institutions of Youth and Sports.

UGTT'S SUBORDINATION TO NATION'S INTERESTS DISCUSSED

Tunis DIALOGUE in French 13 Oct 80 p 31

[Article by Shlh Sghiri: "The Fatherland Above any Other Consideration"]

[Text] So in spite of everything, finally reason and the nation's higher interests prevail. Progressing in the direction of responsibility, the UGTT's [Tunisian General Federation of Labor] crisis seems today, after regrettable vicissitudes, to be experiencing a devotion which will not fail to strengthen the ranks and cement the general cohesiveness. Emanating from the National Labor Union Commission, which was created on 3 October 1980, the communique published last week set the tone for all the means currently in place for resolving--within the framework of the democratic institutions--the crisis of that organization created by the late Farhat Hached which, having arrived at its true purpose, "is the extension of the genuine union movement launched by Mohamed Ali El Hammi." A purpose that must above any other consideration call for "heroism, militantism and the spirit of sacrifice." A mission and values that today more than ever must prevail at all levels. The state having made all the adequate provisions likely to make confidence reign and do away with misunderstandings. Liberation of all union members and the decision to accept as valuable interlocutors genuine representatives, freely elected, of the laboring classes: two great gestures of appeasement from which every Tunisian now expects the best fallout. It is incumbent upon true militants to translate into deeds any bypassed personal problem, any vague impulse killed off--sectarian or refractory. For the good of a people to whom and for whose cause the best of its children, in the decisive hour, gave the best of themselves.

The makeup of the National Labor Union Commission augurs well. The very fact of its having been put in place is an important step taken, apart from any membership. Provided it serves and acts solely and exclusively in such a way as to "unify the ranks of the workers" and "eliminate all the after-effects of the crisis" and finally--and this is basic--"preserve and strengthen the assets of the laboring masses insofar as those assets constitute a motive of pride for the whole Tunisian people." The Tunisian people: a transcendental idea to be cultivated, protected and defended independently of anything else, of all the remainder, which arises out of economic conditions. Although the basic reason for forming the National Labor Union Commission is still the preparation for the extraordinary congress, it is also incumbent upon it, as the declaration says, "to restore confidence and peace of mind for all workers and take all legal measures to revive the union and social climate." An exhilarating historic role that could not be accommodated to any objectives other than those commanded by objectivity and attachment to collective aspirations. One could not emphasize enough the foundations of this heavy task except by recalling the basic principles of unionism in Tunisia, as they were desired by Bourguiba and Hached.

In this decisive phase in the history of union organization, the principles must prevail today. To justify and inspire all acts, all decisions and choices. In other words, it is important above all to go beyond "marginal conflicts," for "time is precious and it is important to begin to heal the wounds, to envision the future and put the interest of the UGTT and the fatherland above every other consideration." A single interest that rules out any partial calculation or maneuver that might imperil the work of development on which Tunisia, everyone included, has decided to center all its potentialities. In this chorus of harmony the UGTT must, today and tomorrow, see to it that its primary objectives coincide in the best symbiosis, in the combination of efforts, well-considered and sincere timeliness, pragmatism. First and above all for the promotion of the Tunisian, the reign of social peace in equity and equilibrium, such as defined by our institutions. Correctly, Legally. Democratically. For the sole good of Tunisia.

MEASURES TO INCREASE CROP PRODUCTION REPORTED

[Article: "Easy Terms for Acquisition of Agricultural Equipment Directly From the Supplier"]

[Text] Mohamed Ghedira, a member of the Political Bureau and president of the National Farmers Union (UNA), yesterday chaired a meeting which included the members of the National Unskilled Workers Federations and the presidents of the regional factories.

During the meeting Mr Ghedira announced that the government has taken a series of measures to increase large crop production.

He stated that improvement of production depends on better development of the land, indicating that the many measures taken are aimed at helping the farmer observe the deadlines required for judicious exploitation of the land.

The UNA president urged regional and local leaders to explain the new measures to the farmers, to enable them to take advantage of the means available to them. All the measures have been included in a circular which has been sent to all of the regional structures. The measures are aimed at enabling the farmers to acquire their equipment directly by benefiting from easy terms in addition to the possibilities presently offered to them by the availability of banking credits.

They also offer farmers the opportunity to receive credits for maintenance of their equipment.

All of these new provisions are concerned with agricultural and fishing equipment.

SAUDI ARABIA MAKES CONTRIBUTION TO ISLAMIC BROADCASTING SYSTEM

Mecca MUSLIM WORLD NEWS in Arabic 6 Oct 80 p 6

/Article: "Kingdom of Saudi Arabia Contributes $4 Million to Islamic Countries' Broadcasting Organization"/

/Text/ The Islamic Countries' Broadcasting Organization has expressed thanks and gratitude to the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia for the material and moral support it has presented and is presenting to the organization. Its contributions to the organization so far total $4 million; in addition, it has paid the rent on its headquarters for 5 years. This was stated in a resolution adopted by the organization's general assembly at the meeting held a week ago in Tripoli.

Urging Member Countries To Pay Their Shares

The assembly urged member states to take the initiative to pay the shares they owe the organization's budgets and fulfil their commitments in order to enable the organization to perform its mission. It also urged them to supply the secretariat general of the organization with Islamic radio and television programs in Arabic, English, French and some languages used in Islamic countries, as well as urging member countries to communicate the names of these countries' Program Committee representatives to the secretariat general so that it will be feasible periodically to organize these committees' meetings to set forth plans and make coordination in the realm of producing programs which will guarantee attainment of the organization's goals. The society also urged the member states and agencies concerned to buy this product at encouragement prices in order to support the resources and capabilities of the organization.

Zionism Is the Prime Enemy

The organization's general public assembly resolved to consider the racist imperialist Zionist attack the prime, most important danger to the Islamic nation and to give priority to confronting it through the media and exposing and condemning its practices. The society also agreed to give the Palestine cause maximum importance in program production in order to guarantee that the aggression of judaization to which Palestine, in particular the holy cities of Jerusalem and Hebron, are being exposed is confronted.

In addition, more importance will be given to confronting the danger of the Zionist invasion of Arab Moslem Egypt, and member countries will be requested to strive to prepare programs directed to Egypt to repel this invasion and the practices of the ruling Egyptian regime.

Moslem Causes

The general public assembly of the Islamic Countries' Broadcast Organization also resolved that the organization's secretariat general should follow up on its activity of publicizing and presenting the causes of Moslems. It called upon the news agencies of the member countries, and Islamic international news agencies in particular, to offer news service which is consonant with the requirements of these programs when they appear.

Islamic Media Activity

In the realm of Islamic media activity strategy, the society resolved to agree to depict the secretariat general and present the subject after enriching the special committee formed to discuss and prepare the project in its final form with experts chosen for their personal character by the Islamic countries, in cooperation with the ministries and agencies concerned, turning the project in its final form over to the secretariat general of the Islamic Conference Organization so that it may determine its opinion, and the program may be ready for presentation to the council of information ministers in the Islamic countries when it meets. The society also resolved to present the code of media honor which the secretariat general has prepared to the exceptional general assembly session which will meet in Jiddah in the second half of March 1981.

Thanks to the Kingdom's Television

The assembly requested the member states to appreciate the organization's efforts in the field of production of such radio programs as Jerusalem and Muhammad the Prophet of God, and to praise its efforts in producing a series of television programs, especially the series on the Just Imam 'Umar ibn 'Abd-al-'Aziz and the series "Martyrs' Mission." It urged member countries to take care to participate in the exceptional session in order to guarantee that the necessary legal quorum will

ARIANA AIRLINES FLIES PILGRIMS TO JIDDAH

Kabul KABUL NEW TIMES in English 14 Oct 80 p 4

[Text]

KABUL, Oct. 14. (Bakhtar).— The last flight of Ariana Afghan Airlines, carrying the Afghan pilgrims, left Kabul for Jedda yesterday. The airlifting of Afghan pilgrims to Jedda had begun on 23 September and in twenty three DC—10 and Boeing 707 flights a total of 4.123 pligrims have been transfered from Kabul to Jedda for Haj pilgrimage.

Some 8,000 pilgrims were scheduled to go from Afghanistan to Saudi Arabia this year, 6,000 by air and another 2,000 by surface transportation.

But, unfortunately due to unfavourable conditions this year the Afghans could not go to Saudi Arabia by over land transportation.

A source of Islamic Affairs Department of the Prime Ministry said as the DRA government has profound respect to the sacred religion of Islam, this year an allocation was set for 8,000 people to go to Holy Mecca, 6,000 by air and another 2,000 via surface transport.

Those who had applied to go to Holy Mecca by air transport, from Kabul and other provinces have all been tranported to Jedda by Ariana Afghan Airlines flights. Similarly, 750 Afghans who had applied originally to go to Holy Mecca through overland transportation were able to do so by travelling by air after paying the difference of the air and surface transportation rates. Thus, a total of 4,123 pilgrims have gone to Holy Mecca this year for Haj pilgrimige.

Some 200 people who could not go to Holy Mecca via overland transportation were reimbursed.

LARGE-SCALE COOPERATION PLANNED WITH BULGARIA

Kabul KABUL NEW TIMES in English 12 Oct 80 p 3

[Text]

Fazl Rahim Momand the Minister of Agriculture and Land Reforms has recently returned home after attending the session of the joint commission for economic, scientific and technical cooperation held in Sofia the capital of the People's Republic of Bulgaria.

The Anis daily reporter has made an interview with the Minister of Agriculture and Land Reforms on his visit to Sofia which is published below:

For the purpose of further encouragement and strengthening of economic, scientific and technical cooperations between the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan and the People's Republic of Bulgaria an agreement was signed between the respective authorities of DRA and People's Republic of Bulgaria on August 12 this year.

Under this agreement the joint commission for economic, scientific and technical cooperation of the two countries is commissioned to meet every year in one of the capitals of the two countries. The joint commission is composed of representatives of the government of both countries. The head of each of the two sides is supposed to be a minister. Each of the two delegates is composed of a chairman, deputy chairman, secretary and few members.

Pointing out the above Fazl Rahim Momand the Minister of Agriculture and Land Reforms of the Democratic Republic of Afghaghanistan and head of the Afghan delegation to the above session while throwing light on the agenda of the sessions of the joint commission for economic, scientific and technical cooperation held in Sofia said:

The following agenda was approved by the two sides of the joint commission:

Assessment of the procedure to implement the credit agreement signed in Varna, Bulgaria, on August 12, 1980.

—Determining the list of the production units provided by the said credit agreement.

—Discerning and specifying the conditions for designing purposes and the collection of reports by each unit envisaged in the agreement.

—Focusing on subjects pertaining to handling of banking technical affairs of the above mentioned credit agreement.

—Method of control over implementation of the decisions taken about the common projects.

—Evaluation of the commercial relations between the two countries.

—Holding talks on the general terms of the agreement, and sending Bulgarian experts to Afghanistan.

—Other matters and questions which are related to the mutual cooperation between the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan and the People's Republic of Bulgaria.

Elaborating on the credit provided to DRA government by the government of the People's Republic of Bulgaria and supply of Bulgarian grants to Afghanistan the Minister of Agriculture and Land Reforms in answer to a question said:

The government of People's Republic of Bulgaria has provided a total sum of 30 million levs credit, equivalent to 35 million US dollars, to the government of DRA. Likewise it has given one million lives as grant-in-aid to Afghanistan. If the loans provided by the Bulgarian government are spent effective greater possibility would exist to provide further grant-in-aid to our country.

Asked what projects have been agreed upon by the joint commission for economic, scientific and technical cooperation to be financed under the Bulgarian credit the Minister of Agriculture and Land Reforms said that the following projects were going to be financed:

1—The construction project of Herat Tannery Plant.

2—The re-construction and expansion project of the fruit and vegetables processing plant of Kandahar.

3—Construction project of brick-making plant with a capacity of 50 million bricks per year in Kabul.

4—Juice making plant project.

5—Diary and poultry project.

6—Establishment of two fish production farms in Baghlan and Balkh provinces.

The following joint projects, he added, are also agreed upon to be financed by the Bulgarian credit:

1—Leather and posteen processing project.

2—A joint project for establishment of cotton and other plants production factories in Baghlan, Kunduz and Takhar.

Asked whether there were other projects under study the Minister of Agriculture and Land Reforms said:

In the meeting of the joint cooperation commission the establishment of international transport highways between the two countries was discussed. The question has referred to the Ministry of Transport and Tourism and it is up to it to make the final decision.

The establishment of animal food processing plant was also discussed and it is expected that after a feasibility study decision will be taken on it.

The reconstruction and expansion project of Bagrami poultry farm are under study by the experts, he added.

Pointing to the despatch of Bulgarian experts to the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan and the decision taken by the joint cooperation commission the Minister of Agriculture and Land Reforms said: a draft agreement has been prepared in this connection and it is going to be studied by the respective authorities of the two countries.

Under this draft agreement it is envisaged that a good number of Bulgarian experts will come to Afghanistan and start working in different plants and technical establishments of Afghanistan under easy and favourable terms.

Regarding the trade relations between the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan and the People's Republic of Bulgaria Fazl Rahim Momand said:

According to the information available the balance of trade between Afghanistan and Bulgaria is not favourable and there is a defecit on our side. In another words our imports from Bulgaria are much greater than our exports to that country. Therefore it was decided that the Bulgarian side should balance its volume of trade with us and Bulgaria should take action to import from Afghanistan the goods such as skin, carpet, precious stones, handicrafts and the like.

Likewise it was agreed that the two sides should cooperate in introducing the commercial goods of each other in the exhibitions, commercial fairs and other campaigns launched for promotion of trade. Similarly they will be going to hold exhibitions in one another's country and display their commercial goods.

At the end of the talks held between the two sides it was agreed that the two countries should make all efforts to encourage, expand and strengthen their cooperations and make trade promotion between the two countries an inseparable part of their friendly relation and cooperation.

The Minister of Agriculture and Land Reforms of the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan added: the talks were held in an atmosphere of friendship, sincerity and optimism and strong hope for fruitful cooperations in the future between the two friendly countries.

To facilitate the work of the Joint Commission for economic scientific and technical cooperation three working groups were set up by the joint cooperation commission. These groups reached all agreement in their talks on the matters concerned and thus prepared the first protocol of the session to be signed by both sides.

At the end of his interview the Minister of Agriculture and Land Reform while talking of the attitude of the people, party and government of Bulgaria towards the members of the delegation said:

The Afghan delegation during its stay in Bulgaria visited various industrial and agricultural institutions which were concerned with the projects envisaged in the Bulgarian credit agreement.

In its visits various cities and industrial and agricultural institutions the DRA delegation was met with sincerity, and friendship. The DRA delegation clearly felt the warmth and solidarity of the people, party and members of the government of Bulgaria with the new phase of the Saur Revolution and Babrak Karmal General Secretary of the People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan, President of the Revolutionary Council and DRA Prime Minister, party, government and people of the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan. Everywhere the delegation, the people, party and government of Bulgaria expressed warm sincerity and profound solidarity with the revolutionary Afghanistan. Their hospitality and sincerity are highly appreciated, he said.

We have brought along sweet and unforgetable and unprecedented memories from our Bulgarian friends, he added.

AMERICAN WOMAN STILL BEING HELD PRISONER

Kabul KABUL NEW TIMES in English 18 Oct 80 p 2

[Text]

SOMEWHERE behind the walls of Tehran's Evin Prison, a middle-aged American woman sits in a cell "hopeful, patient," a lonely figure forgotten by many during recent developments.

"I am well, clean and eat well," she wrote recently in the first letter to her family in two months. She assured them she remains in strong spirits despite her ordeal.

Cynthai Dwyer, 49, is in detention-and Friday was her 166th day in captivity.

Last April 10, five months after the other Americans were taken hostage in Tehran, the free-lance writer left her New York home to travel to the Iranian capital -- to write about the troubled country, her husband later explained.

On the night of May 5, Revolutionary Guardsmen took her from her Hilton Hotel room. Tehran newspapers said she was accused of being a Central Intelligence Agency agent. She dropped from sight.

In the months since,, the Swiss Embassy, representing U.S. interests in Iran, has appealed repeatedly for information about Mrs. Dwyer and for permission to visit her. The Iranians have confirmed she is being held, but otherwise have made no response and given no indication of any formal charges against her, says the U.S. State Department.

Her Husband, Dr. John Dwyer, chairman of the English Department at the State College in Buffalo, New York, met privately Tuesday with Secretary of State Edmund Muskie during Muskie's trip to Buffalo..

"I'd requested the visit with him," Dwyer told a reporter. But Muskie could report no progress. "He assured me they are doing everything they can. But I knew that."

The professor's voice was strained as he discussed his wife's plight.

Dwyer scoffs at the allegation his wife was a spy. Her sympathies for the Iranian revolutionary cause were well known within the academic community in Buffalo, he said, and she believed the U.S. news media presented a one-dimensional view of Iran -- that of the hostage crisis.

"She was more interested in the other story, away from the embassy, away from the angry crowds," Dwyer said.

Mrs. Dwyer, a former copy editor and occasional writer for the humanist magazine, planned to offer stories to Buffalo newspapers or other publications on her return. The Iranian National Guidance Ministry has acknowledged that she had proper press credentials.

Why then was this idealistic, graying mother of three arrested as a spy?

"Incredibly unfortunate timing," claims her husband. "She was there at the time of the rescue attempt. They wanted to get somebody and they got her."

After the failure of the U.S. commando attempt to rescue the hostages on April 24, Iran's revolutionaries went on a nationwide manhunt for what they believed were American agents linked to the operation. Many foreigners were apprehended, among them Cynthia Dwyer -- apparently the only American caught at that time.

Reports from Tehran said she was questioned for several days at an Army barracks before being moved to Evin.

Dwyer finally heard from her in late August. She said in a letter that she was "hopeful, patient" and in good condition. Swiss Embassy officials also received two letters from her, asking that they intervene on her behalf.

Her latest letter, received by her mother in early October again was just one page. "May be that's a requirement," Dwyer suggested.

He said she gave few specifics of her incarceration -- "a lot of it was personal" -- but did meticulously list her prison diet: "bread and butter, eggs, cheese, rice with chicken, lentils, yogurt, tea and fruit."

Dwyer said he detected no note of despondency, "and I don't think she's just putting on a brave front." But he said she plainly was writing the letters with the knowledge that they would be read by others before being mailed.

IRAQI POWS INTERVIEWED BY NEWSMAN

Kabul KABUL NEW TIMES in English 14 Oct 80 p 1

[Text]

TEHRAN (Pars) – A group of Iraqi prisoners of war answered questions posed by a Pars reporter.

Even though hunted by fear of being betrayed by spies in the event of their eventual return to their homeland. Reports indicate that the Iraqi prisoners of war have been totally takea aback by the modesty and the humanitarian behavior shown to them by the Iranian authorities.

Pars reports commented Sunday that the agents of the Ba'athist regime of Iraq who had been constantly brainwashed by the Ba'athist regime never anticipated such behavior from the Iranians.

The Iraqi prisoners of war who are being kept in a camp in Tehran include soldiers, commissioned as well as non-commissioned officers, and a small number of civilians. The following is the text of the interview which was held with them Sunday.

Q. How were you sent on the war mission against Iran and how did the Ba'athist government justify this aggression for you?

A. (All) The present regime in Iraq had told us that Iran had intended to usurp parts of our lands, and since we are soldiers and employed by the Armed Forces we could not but obey the orders of our superiors. One of the captives: I am married and have four children. If I had not fulfilled their order for a mission here the Ba'athist regime would harass my family.

Q. What do you think about the involvement of the superpowers and the Imperialists in Iraq's war against Iran?

A. (Some captives): Certainly this war was started at the instigation of the Zionists and the Imperialists, for only those people can benefit from this war. They want to set neighbors against one another so that they may thereby reach their own objectives.

Q. Do you recognize the government of the Islamic Republic of Iran as being genuinely 'Islamic' and if you did so how could you bring yourselves to accept being involved in this fratricide?

A. (All): Yes, we consider the Islamic Republic of Iran as having a thoroughly Islamic government but they had told us that Iran intended to transgress our rights along the border lines. But we were Army Personnel and were forced to comply with their orders.

Q. Which do you think is in the right. Iran or the government in Iraq?

A. (Long pause) Then two of them answer: We are unable to say who is in the right in this concern. We do not have the necessary knowledge. The years of repression in Iraq has made it impossible for us to gain any insight into such things.

Q. Once you have gained the necessary insight into the issue and once it is proved to you that Iran is in the right would you then be willing to become active against Saddam Hussein and his agents?

A. (All): We are Moslems and as such once we have determined what is just, we will then support the ones who are just, and in so doing we will fulfill any task which we consider as being expedient.

Q. How have you found the morale of the Iranian soldiers as opposed to that of the forces of Ba'athist regime of Iraq?

A. (Some): What distinguishes your troops from us is that the Iranian Forces proceed to the battle fields with their trust in God and taking power from their off repeated slogan of "Allah-o-Akbar" (God is most Great), while the Iraqi troops have only been dragged to the battle-fields under compulsion.

Q. How much damage has been inflicted on the military installations of Iraq and how long do you think the Iraqi government could afford to continue with the war?

A. (One of the captive): Military and economic damages to the contesting parties are inevitable in war. I do not know exactly how much damages Iraq has incurred as a result of the war but I suspect it would take some five to six years before she can make good the damages.

Q. What do you know about liberation movement in Iraq?

A. The situation in Iraq is such that it makes it impossible for us to obtain any knowledge about existence of activities of such movements. We do not have any significant information about that.

Q. How have you found the behavior of the Iranian prison officials towards you?

A. We feel comfortable here. They give us anything we want. We have been outrightly surprised by such behavior on the part of our captors. For this reason we owe the Iranian Moslems, the Iranian Armed Forces and especially the person of Imam Khomeini our gratitude. . (One of the captives): When they captured us in the Western war fronts the personnel of the Armed Forces of Iran gave us their own food and lodging and received us as they would receive guests. Their behavior here is equally nice and humane.

Q. There are reports about the inhumane conduct of the agents of the Iraqi government towards the Iranian prisoners of war in that country. We also understand that many of the Iranian prisoners have been tortured in Iraq. What do you expect Iran should do to you in the event the agents of the Ba'athist regime in Iraq should continue racking the Iranian prisoners of war, or if they should martyr them?

A. (Some pause and then answered one of the captives): Since we recognize the Iranian regime as being Islamic in that case we will expect our captors to continue their present Islamic behavior towards us.

Q. It is surprising for the Iranian to hear from you in this side of the border that you recognize the Iranian government as being Islamic while as long as you were at the other side of the border you did not seem to be caring about Islam and "Islamic behavior." (No answer).

DEMOLITION OF HISTORIC MONUMENTS, BUILDINGS

Paris NAME-YE RUZ in Persian 15 Sep 80 pp 11, 12

[Text] In an article in LE MONDE about the demolition of historic monuments and buildings in Iran, Frederic Ullman writes, "The Iranian revolution is no exception from the general run of world revolutions in that it, too, indulges in extremisms to the point of stupidity. Executions take place as a daily routine, and like the French revolutionaries who wisely beheaded the statues, or like the Chinese extremists of the Chinese cultural revolution, in Iran historical monuments and buildings are facing a similar fate with the same degree of irrationality."

Beyond the reports heard and stories read in the Iranian press, a preliminary record and situation appraisals can be synthetized. While, reportedly, due to British mediation the tomb of Cyrus whose underground museum had been mistaken for SAVAK's torture chamber, was saved from destruction in February 1979, ironically the Mirza Ja'far and Kheyrat Khan theological schools in Mashhad, both of which are inviolable historic monuments dating back to the 17th century, were razed by bulldozers. The representative of Imam Khomeyni who called them "a heap of ruined plaster and bricks," talked of his plans to have a completely modern Islamic university in their place.

In an archeological seminar held in June the participants learned that over the past year more than 40 classified ancient monuments and relics had been demolished by bulldozers or dynamite. Such was the fate of Khosrow Agha Bathhouse (17th century), the Friday Mosque in the city of Malayer (16th century), Zavareh Mosque (12th century) and the Government Arch in Kashan where Shah Abbas II was crowned in 1642. The Neshat House in Esfahan, a distinctive specimen of the buildings belonging to the 19th century Iranian nobility, and other buildings and monuments have met a similar fate. Thus it seems that the buildings and monuments dating back to the era of the Safavids (1501-1736), who institutionalized Shiism as the official religion of Iran, including the mosques built during this epoch, are seriously threatened. Finally, according to unconfirmed reports, religion has found its way into the Forty-Column Palace again. In actuality, this palace has only 20 columns, while the other 20 are mere reflections in the water. The irreligious murals which had once been obscured and then restored after 10 years of hard work by a team of Italians, has again been obfuscated piously. Of course the destruction of the traces of the dethroned monarchy with all the destruction wrought in the process of the application of this ostensible method is a source of smaller wonder.

Along with such barbaric acts, we receive reports of clandestine excavations for archeological relics across the country and of an increased number of cases of theft. For instance, in October 1979 the illicit sale in the Majles [sic] of two objects d'arts, one of which had been taken from a museum, was prevented in the last minute. Briefly speaking, the gaucheness which is understandable at times of crisis may inexcusably destroy part of the artistic treasures of Iran. For instance, the Friday Mosque which is a monument well-known the world over is threatened with collapse because the grounds around it have been excavated and not filled again.

The deposed Shah, who earlier had not paid so much attention to Iran's artistic wealth (priority was given to the modernization of the country at the time), later on in his reign created certain administrative machinery for protecting and preserving Iran's cultural heritage. It was in this context that Iran signed the UNESCO's National Treasures Agreement. Apparently the new government in Iran has not rescinded this agreement because in 1979 three historical monuments in Iran (Persepolis, Shah Square, Chogha Zanbil) were listed among world treasures. Don't these actions [demolitions] in Iran denote the ineffectiveness of this agreement.

(NAME-YE RUZ: In addition to the reports about the demolition of the historical monuments of Iran, numerous other reports have also been making the rounds in recent months to the effect that Iranian objects d'arts have been sold at preposterously low prices at auctions and private sales. Of course these reports are about historical and artistic objects and relics, not simply about the cheap and gaudy antiques that the nouveaux-riche of the previous regime had bought in the Paris Flea Market and stacked their mansions with them as their idea of decoration and poshness. These items were bought by the upstarts of the new regime when the properties and belongings of their predecessors were confiscated. Among the items categorized as national wealth which were stolen and sold mention can be made of Qajar paintings, antique carpets, and unearthed relics lifted from museums. These have mostly been sold in England and Switzerland.)

HAMMADI VIEWS SUPERPOWER ACTIONS IN GULF WAR

Beirut MONDAY MORNING in English 20-26 Oct 80 pp 44-49

[Interview with Saadoun Hammadi, foreign minister of Iraq by MONDAY MORNING, date and place not given]

[Excerpts]

The foreign minister of Iraq, Saadoun Hammadi, told Monday Morning last week that the possibility of a superpower confrontation developing out of the Iraqi-Iranian war still exists, but it has been reduced since the battles started.

"Theoretically," he said, "that possibility exists at all times, especially when there is conflict in a sensitive region," he said in a long-distance telephone interview. "But I do not believe there is a big possibility of such a confrontation developing in the present situation. International tension was high at the beginning of the war, but I notice that it has decreased since then. The international situation is less tense now than it was at the beginning of the war."

A translation of the full interview, which was conducted in Arabic, follows:

Does Iraq have any cease-fire conditions?

Iraq has made no conditions for a cease-fire. Iraq has demands. Those demands are the return of its full rights to its territory, full sovereignty over the Shatt el-Arab, and total noninterference in the internal affairs of Iraq and the affairs of the other Arab countries. These demands constitute recognition of Iraq's legitimate, internationally accepted rights. These are not conditions; they are rightful and just demands.

Iraq has expressed its readiness to cease fire and enter into negotiations toward a comprehensive solution of all the problems pending between Iran and Iraq and between Iran and the other Arab countries.

What is your reaction to Iran's demand that Iraqi forces withdraw from the undisputed Iranian territory?

Had Iran's intentions been good, we would not have reached this stage.

Iraq had warned Iran and demanded, in a formal memorandum, that it withdraw from the territories which it was illegally occupying. Iran did not respond to that memorandum, which forced Iraq to take back its territory by force, proclaim its total sovereignty over the Shatt el-Arab and unilaterally annul the 1975 treaty — the treaty which Iran had already annulled in word and deed.

After that, Iraq submitted an official memorandum to Iran requesting an understanding on the basis of current realities, to settle all problems by peaceful means. Iran did not respond to that memorandum. Instead, it escalated the war, closing the Shatt el-Arab, closing its air space and shelling the Iraqi borders with heavy artillery from all directions, thus widening the scope of the war.

This compelled the Iraqi forces to enter Iranian territory — to protect Iraqi territory and to gain Iranian recognition of Iraq's right to Iraqi land and waters.

Had Iran wanted to reach an understanding in all good faith, it would have done so before we reached this stage. Making that demand now that the war has reached this stage does not indicate good intentions. The demand is only an attempt on Iran's part to salvage the situation.

Can it be said that the Iranian-Iraqi war has become a war of attrition? How do you visualize this war developing?

Every war entails sacrifices. No war can be waged without sacrifice. Iraq is determined to regain its right to its land and waters, to preserve its independence and to prevent any form of interference in its internal affairs, regardless of the sacrifices that must be made. Defense of land and independence dwarfs any sacrifice.

But I do not share the view of those who believe that this is a war of months or years. I don't expect this war to last that long. We know what Iran has and we know the extent of its ability to resist. This war may take some time, but not as much time as some imagine.

The war appears to have resulted in increased American military presence in the Gulf. Do you think this is a prelude to direct American military intervention in the war? Or do you think it will establish U.S. military presence in the Gulf area, even after the war ends?

We said some time ago that Iran's behavior on the international level was bound to be used by the world's major forces as a pretext for interference in the region's affairs. We warned that the United States would use the affair of the American hostages in Iran as a screen to cover the return of its military and political influence to the region. We have been warning about this since the first Islamic Conference in Islamabad.

The behavior of Iran during this war is a further indication that Iran would not be averse to an increase in American influence in the region. Iran's irresponsible threats to close international waterways, its irresponsible threats to mine the Arabian Gulf and the straits, and the threats it is directing at the other Arab countries in the Arabian Gulf — all these are likely to encourage the U.S. to increase its presence in the region.

At any rate, our position on this matter is known, and it can be summarized as follows: The best thing that the superpowers can do for our region is to stay out of the Gulf war. Both the U.S. and the Soviet Union have committed themselves to staying out of the conflict — on the official level, at least. We will continue to observe the situation. We are against intervention by any superpower, and we are against any superpower increasing its influence or military presence in the region. If there is an increase in U.S. military presence in the region, no one will be to blame but Iran, its behavior and its threats, which are most likely calculated to invite U.S. military presence in the area.

How do you evaluate the Soviet attitude toward the Iraqi-Iranian war? Do you see any connection between this war and the signing of the Syrian-Soviet friendship treaty at this time?

The Soviet Union's position, as I told you, is one of neutrality, as the Soviet Union has repeatedly announced. As far as we know, and judging by the assurances we have received from them, the Soviets are remaining neutral. We have no strong or irrefutable evidence to the contrary.

Where the treaty with Syria is concerned, I see no connection between it and the war. This project was not born in this period; it is a project which has been under discussion by the two sides for a long time, apparently. I see no connection between the two subjects.

What are the implications of the treaty, in your view?

It is not the first treaty of its kind. Several other countries have treaties of friendship and cooperation with the Soviet Union. India had one, Iraq has one and several other countries have such a treaty with the Soviet Union.

Do you expect the Iraqi-Iranian war to spread to other countries in the region — especially in view of the Saudis' public expression of support for Iraq and the reports about Jordanian military involvement in the war?

To begin with, Jordan has not entered the battle. That is absolutely untrue. Jordan supports Iraq's position, but it has not participated and it will not participate in the military operations undertaken by Iraq. This has been stated clearly in a communiqué by the Iraqi government.

As for the possibility of the war spreading, we have no desire to spread it and no intention of spreading it, as we have already announced. However, we cannot guarantee Iran's behavior on this matter. Everything depends on Iran's behavior. Iran may take action which would spread the war over a wider area. If it does so, it will naturally have to bear the consequences.

Do you think there is any possibility of the Gulf war leading to a superpower confrontation?

Theoretically, that possibility exists at all times, especially when there is conflict in a sensitive region. But I do not believe there is a big possibility of such a confrontation developing in the present situation. International tension was high at the beginning of the war, but I notice that it has decreased since then. The international situation is less tense now than it was at the beginning of the war.

There have been a number of attempts at mediation between Iraq and Iran, including the efforts of the Islamic Conference, the Security Council, the non-aligned nations and the Palestine Liberation Organization. Do you think any of those efforts can bear fruit in the future?

Those efforts failed because of Iran's intransigence, not because of Iraq's position.

However, I believe that, after some time, when the Iranian officials abandon their fantasies and realize that their military, economic and political conditions are not at all good, the realities of the situation will impose new attitudes on them. The Iranian officials are bound to return to their senses, unless they want to destroy their country completely. When that happens (when they return to their senses), the (mediation) efforts will have a better chance of success.

Do you think the attacks on the oil installations of the two countries will lead to an international oil crisis? How would you assess Iraq's losses in terms of oil and oil installations so far?

The damage done to the Iraqi and Iranian oil installations is bound to have some effect on the international oil flow, of course. That cannot be avoided, since Iran and Iraq are among the biggest exporters of oil.

This does not mean, however, that the shortage will be enormous or that it cannot be compensated for. Iraq has announced its desire to cushion the impact of this crisis on the world's economy, and it has said that it will do everything in its power to that end, that it will consult with the other Arab countries toward exerting all possible efforts to minimize the shortage.

And in fact, there is no acute crisis in the international oil market now. Other Arab countries have been able to increase production, and we will take all the necessary measures to keep the reduction in our production down to the lowest possible level.

As for an assessment of the damage done to our oil installations, that would be difficult for me to make now. To begin with, I'm not in the country, and secondly, the war isn't over yet. The assessment of losses is a technical matter that I am in no position to go into.

However, the damage done to our installations is definitely less than the damage done to Iranian installations.

It is being said that neither Iraq nor Iran has enough arms and ammunition to keep this war going much longer. Do you agree?

No country in the world has an inexhaustible supply of arms and ammunition. Some countries are in a better position than others, but no country has the ability to keep a war going indefinitely. That goes without saying.

What I can tell you is that, in all respects, we are definitely in a better position than Iran.

If the war continues, do you think the Arab summit conference will be held in Amman on schedule next month?

So far, there has been no change in the date and venue of the conference. At any rate, everyone concerned, including ourselves, is now thinking about this matter. A final decision will be made in the light of developments. We don't know what will happen tomorrow. But until now, there has been no change in the time and the venue, and no one has suggested a postponement. The decision on this matter remains in effect: the conference will open on the previously determined date in the previously determined venue.

Do you consider that Iraq has received adequate support from the Arab world in this war?

On the popular level, I can state with total certainty that the Arab masses, wherever they are, support Iraq. On the official level, all Arab states, with the exception of Libya and Syria, support Iraq, although their expressions of support vary for various reasons.

Is this support adequate or inadequate? That is difficult to say. But Iraq, at any rate, has not asked anyone for material or military support, nor does it need such support. If anyone wishes to express his support in one way or another, he may do so — that depends on his feelings on the subject, his solidarity and his nationalist position. But Iraq has not requested and does not need military or material support.

Do you expect an increase in Arab support?

I believe that in time, the pressure of the Arab peoples will increase on those states whose expressions of support are still not loud enough. As for Arab states like Libya and Syria — I am certain that public opinion in Syria and Libya, which is a nationalist Arab public opinion, will eventually exert pressure on those countries' unnationalist positions...

What I would like to say is that we are all Arabs, and our sense of responsibility is not less than that of any other nation. When an Arab fights for Arab territory, in defense of the independence of Arab states, the issue is a nationalist one and not a political issue pitting one state against the other. These matters must be viewed from a nationalist angle. When an Arab fights a non-Arab in defense of Arab land, it is the duty of every Arab to stand by his brother, because this is a question of Arab territory and Arab sovereignty. That is all I would like to say.

How would you describe Iraq's current relations with the Iranian opposition, especially in the light of this week's reports about clashes between the Iranian forces and the Kurds?

We sympathize with the Iranian opposition and give it our moral support, but it is not true that Iraq's relations with the Iranian opposition go further than that.

As for what is happening in Iran as regards the Kurds or the other minorities, we view it as a natural development. The minorities in Iran had expected to be granted their nationalist rights after the fall of the Shah. But the new regime in Iran is a confessional one. By taking on a confessional nature, it has automatically gained the hostility of the religious minorities. It is also a bigoted racist regime which does not recognize the nationalist rights of the other minorities. These are the factors which have led to the escalation of conflict between the minorities and the new regime in Iran. The conflict was predictable.

We support autonomy for the minorities and have granted autonomy to the minorities in Iraq. Is it conceivable that we should grant autonomy in Iraq and stand against the principle of autonomy elsewhere? ●

VICTORY FOR BA'TH LOYALISTS IN KURDISH ELECTIONS

Paris AN-NAHAR ARAB REPORT & MEMO in English 29 Sep 80 pp 3, 4

[Text]

Last week's elections for the first Legislative Council of the autonomous region of Kurdistan returned a majority of officials considered close to the central government and leading local families. Some 701,000 voters chose 50 deputies out of a total of 194 candidates. The candidates, were not, however, opposing each other, according to the director of the information committee set up for the elections. The Iraqi authorities undertook all of the electoral expenses of the candidates and provided transport for voters.

Observers find it difficult to analyse the results of the election, as traditional yardsticks such as political platforms and ideological positions were completely absent from the candidates' campaigns. The newly-elected deputies are either officials of popular organisations affiliated to the Baath Party or members of prominent Kurdish families like the Barazanis. It was Mustafa Barazani who had led the Kurdish Democratic Party, the Kurds' political and military umbrella during the two decades that finally led to the granting of Kurdish autonomy by the Iraqi authorities in 1974.

Neither of two women nor the religious dignitaries, both Muslim and Christian, who contested seats were elected. Most of the winners came from well-to-do occupational backgrounds such as engineering, law, teaching and farming.

The newly elected Council which will sit in the regional Kurdish capital of Irbil, will hold its first session in November under the chairmanship of the oldest member-elect. The 50 deputies, representing some 1.8 million inhabitants of autonomous Kurdistan, will launch their official three-year term with an oath "before God to protect the Republican system, serve the interest of the people, safeguard the independence, security and unity of the Iraqi Republic and be loyal to the principles of the July 17 and 30 revolution of 1980."

The decision to endow Iraq with a national parliament, which was elected last June (An-Nahar Arab Report & MEMO, June 30), and to grant Kurdistan its own local assembly was taken last March by the Baath Party leadership. It said the move was intended to "build up democratic institutions and develop democratic participation."

ANNUAL DEVELOPMENT INVESTMENTS AVERAGE $3.3 BILLION

[Text] Development plan investments in Kuwait reached $16.609 billion during the period 1976 thru 1980, an average annual rate of $3.322 billion.

This is brought out in a study by the Arab Fund for Economic and Social Development concerning the development of human resources and manpower in the Arab region. A table of total development plan investments in the Arab countries shows that Kuwait is in third place. The Kingdom of Saudi Arabia is in first place, with average annual development investments of $23.391 billion. Total development plan investments in Saudi Arabia from 1975 thru 1980 amounted to $140.346 billion [an average of 28.069, not 23.391]. In second place is Iraq, whose average annual investments is $9 billion. However, if the level of investments is related to the population, Kuwait takes first place among all Arab nations.

The study states that a number of Arab countries, such as Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, Jordan, the two Yemens, Oman, Libya, Somalia, Tunisia, Morocco and Algeria, designated portions of their development budgets to the study of manpower problems, some of them anticipating a surplus, others a shortage in their labor force. However, there are signs that some of the basic decisions related to development plans are taken without regard to all objectives and programs of these plans.

The study states that all development plans of the Arab states give clear priority to technical and professional training. Many of them set aside large appropriations for this purpose.

All this points to the need to launch training operations. At present, interest centers on individual country programs. However, there are common regional problems which require regional solutions. It has become necessary to organize large-scale regional training programs, to supplement the training activities of the individual countries.

The study calls for giving priority to the sectors of manufacturing, construction, agriculture, communications and government administration.

VARIOUS LEBANESE FRONT MEMBERS TRY TO EFFECT RECONCILIATION

Beirut AL-ANWAR in Arabic 11 Sep 80 p 3

/Article: "The Lebanese Front Will Soon Sign a Historic Document on the Situation"/

/Text/ The Lebanese Front has decided to hold a meeting which will be attended by the deputies of the Phalange and Liberal Parties, to be preceded by meetings held by representatives of the front, in order to set forth a "historic document" on the situation in Lebanon and the Lebanese Front's notions on the dangers the current stage is passing through.

The Lebanese Front held its periodic weekly meeting at the Mar Jirjis 'Ukar Monastery at 9300 hours in the morning yesterday. In it, current political and security developments were discussed in the light of the new occurrences which have taken place on the Lebanese stage.

Attending the meeting, which continued right up to 1100 hours, were President Camille Chamoun, Shaykh Pierre al-Jumayyil, Dr Fu'ad Afram al-Bustani, Deputy Edouard Hanin, and Rev Tuma Muhanna, representative of the Lebanese Maronite monastic order.

Chamoun's Statement

After the meeting President Chamoun said, "The fact is that there is nothing important we can convey to you except that it was resolved to prepare and arrange for a meeting to be attended firstly by representatives of the groups composing the Lebanese Front, with Mr Hanin and Mr Bustani, to study the local and international conditions which Lebanon is passing through, provided that this meeting be followed by an expanded meeting to be attended by the deputies of the two parties, the Lebanese Phalange Party and the Liberal Nationalists' Party."

Full Reconciliation Is the Offspring of Union

Chamoun added, "This is on the one hand. On the other, I say to those persons who want to cast doubt on the permanent lasting relations between the two parties that we are not just in a state of total reconciliation on all subjects which concern Lebanese politics, we are also working hand in hand on behalf of the national interest and will continue to work on behalf of this interest."

Unification of the Lebanese Forces

Chamoun said, "There is also a plan to unify the Lebanese Forces; this plan is under serious study in every sense of the word. We ask God for success in every field of our activity."

The Libyan-Syrian Union

Chamoun was asked "There is a difference of opinion on the merger union between Libya and Syria regarding its negative or positive effect on Lebanese conditions. What is your view?" He answered,

"My opinion is that I will not have faith in that union before I think of its positive and negative effect as regards Lebanon. I do not believe that it will occur; if it does, it will just be theoretical and logical but not a plan which is foreordained to have life. This plan has been preceded by four unity or union plans and in their time we did not arrive at mergers; all these plans just remained ink on paper or died as soon as they were put in practice."

Chamoun went on, "Therefore let us wait a little while to ascertain what the destiny of this plan is and what its terms are, at which point it will be possible for us to answer your question on its effect on the situation in Lebanon."

/Question/ There is news to the effect that efforts will be made after the attainment of the merger union to consolidate friendly relations between the perseverance and steadfastness states and the Soviet Union, which will influence the situation in the region and expanded Soviet influence there.

/Answer/ First, who are the perseverance and steadfastness states? Since they arose, that is, since this notion arose, no planning or constitution occurred to determine these countries' relations with one another and this group has been notorious on some occasions for bloody disputes or bad relations among one another. Iraq is a perseverance and steadfastness state, and relations between the two countries are not as they should be. They Iraq and Syria are also perseverance and steadfastness states and we all remember the conspiracy Iraq asserted took place, which had as its target Saddam Husayn's regime, and the number of people who were executed after being accused of performing this conspiracy. The question now is, where are the perseverance and steadfastness states?

/Question/ What is your opinion on the information which says that Imam al-Sadr is still alive?

/Answer/ God willing al-Sadr is alive and God willing he will appear and return to his country.

al-Jumayyil's Statement

As for Shaykh Pierre al-Jumayyil, he began his statement by saying, "As you know, the circumstances the country is passing through and the situation the whole world is living through, including Lebanon, demand that efforts and forces be concentrated on really confronting the gravity of these circumstances."

The chief of the Phalange said, "The Lebanese Front, out of its awareness of this delicate stage, discussed the dimensions of these grave conditions today and decided to call upon its forces to cooperate with experts and specialists in various areas to set out a document specifying the front's view on this stage and the future of Lebanon."

al-Jumayyil added, "This front, represents most of the Lebanese who are concerned only to save Lebanon and restore its security, stability and unity, and what is needed is a realistic definition of the crisis and planning in order to set forth solutions. There are responsibilities which must be borne in the near and distant futures."

The head of the Phalange said, "After the document is set forth by the experts, it will be approved because it will be a document for history."

The Merger Union

al-Jumayyil was asked about his comments on the merger union and its effect on the situation in Lebanon. He said, "First no union can take place between one country and another by compulsion. During our good relations with Syria in 1976 this issue was already discussed with President Hafiz al-Asad, when we told him that the entry of 35,000 Syrian soldiers into Lebanon was supported by Lebanese, Arab and international approval, out of faith on the part of us Lebanese that these two moral and material forces would help restore security, stability and tranquility to Lebanon. After subsequent meetings we pointed out that the situation remained the same, if it was not getting worse."

He went on, "I remember that day, without broadcasting a secret, that the Syrian president told me, 'You are still afraid of union between Syria and Lebanon, and I tell you that unity is our goal and we will work to achieve it, but that this union will not be through compulsion. We believe in a union which the people demand; our problems are many, and we will not add to them. We believe in Lebanon as a sovereign free independent country in every meaning of the word, and when the last Lebanese is persuaded to unite with Syria then we will think of it. Nor will we forget the history of Lebanon's struggle against the Ottoman Empire for 400 years, until you were able to achieve your independence.'" al-Jumayyil went on, "I am stating President al-Asad's words, from the standpoint of Syria's interests before those of Lebanon, which are that one must protect the independence, sovereignty and style of life of Lebanon."

al-Jumayyil said, "Most Arab countries are subject to individual rule; the ruler can make decisions without referring to the chamber of deputies or a popular referendum. However, Lebanon is a democratic country dependent on democracy, freedom and its formula, which combines 18 factions, and it cannot make decisions without setting forth from these principles, which it believes in. Union will not occur through compulsion or through slogans. That happened in the past but we have seen what the result was."

The Gravity of the Current Situation

Regarding the gravity of the current situation in Lebanon and the south, al-Jumayyil said, "Before all else, we must start from within. We, as Lebanese, must agree among ourselves to determine what we want. The armistice which exists between the Arabs and Israel after many wars is respected by all parties today because every party realizes his interests, while Lebanon, whose condition has been badly affected, its authority weakened and its people fragmented, is dominated by the chaotic armed Palestinian presence, and we ourselves bear the actions and reactions without having the power to put a stop to the dangers surrounding us. By the way, I say that if we are all Arabs and members of the Arab League, and there are Palestinians among us why isn't a united strategy put forth? Either a war strategy for which all Arabs will bear the responsibility or an armistice strategy which all Arabs will welcome?"

al-Jumayyil said, "For us alone to continue to bear the sufferings of war against the Arabs is not condoned by international law, custom, or relations of brotherhood and friendship. For what sake is the war in the south? Haven't its only results been the destruction of the south and the exiling of its people? What have the Arabs benefited from it?"

On the events which are taking place between the Palestinians and Amal in Ba'labakk and the southern suburbs, the chief of the Phalange said, "That is part of a war of destruction and terror which the major countries are directly or indirectly aiming at by means of the smaller countries."

NATION SETS UP NEW BASES FOR TRADE WITH EASTERN BLOC

Nicosia AL-'ASR in Arabic 19 Sep 80 p 20

/Article: "After Eastern European Countries Requested Abrogation of the Clearing Agreement, Lebanon Set forth a Draft Concerning Commercial Agreements"/

/Text/ The trade and payments ("clearing") agreements concluded between Lebanon and five socialist countries are in the process of disappearing.

Of the five countries only two, Poland and Rumania, still adhere to the clearing agreements; after the Soviet Union and East Germany, Czechoslovakia recently "liberated itself" and a free trade exchange agreement was signed with it at the end of last August.

The turn of Poland and Rumania is coming soon.

The clearing agreements were the greatest commercial fraud with respect to Lebanon, which did not once benefit from the subsections of the agreements, that explicitly stipulate the principle of equality in trade.

The trade balance with the five European socialist countries did not register a surplus on Lebanon's behalf one year, because it was clear that dealing with countries with guided economies, such as the Eastern European ones, cannot guarantee even relative equality. While a Lebanese merchant is free to import what he wants from these countries, he is not free to export what he wants to them, since exports to these countries are subject to a general plan drawn up by their governments or specialized institutions operating under guidance from the governments.

Nonetheless, instead of Lebanon requesting the abrogation of these agreements, the five countries have determined to demand the conclusion of new agreements on the basis of free trade and abrogation of the clearing agreements.

Sources in the Ministry of Economy and Trade attribute the reasons for the Eastern European countries' disinclination to continue with these agreements to the following causes and considerations:

1. Lebanese customs tariffs are applied without condition or restriction to all countries in the world, including the Socialist countries.

2. The doors to importing into Lebanon are open to products of all countries without special restrictions regarding any of these countries.

3. Freedom of financial transaction is also guaranteed for all.

How can we, in this framework of freedoms, expect any foreign country to come to us and commit itself to buy specific amounts of our agricultural or industrial production?

The Eastern European countries did at a time when they needed to develop their relations with Lebanon, in view of what Lebanon's commerce represents in the Middle East.

Now, however, this goal has been realized and these countries are no longer in need of this kind of link.

Sources in the Ministry of Economy and Trade have wondered if it was in Lebanon's interests to keep its gates legally open to all without restriction or condition or to try to create new principles for commercial transactions with Lebanon.

Theoretically, there are a number of solutions to which one can resort to protect Lebanon's interests, including:

1. Imposing restrictions on imports.

The system of prior permission might allow the desired objective to be attained with relative ease. Import permission would be imposed on all cargoes imported into Lebanon; the countries with a free economy would be given this automatically but countries with a guided economy would be given it only on a basis of equality.

However, the system of permits which was applied in Lebanon is not devoid of complications and violations which we have previously tested out and therefore it is not possible to recommend that it be endorsed.

2. Modifying the customs tariff system.

Modification would occur by approving a new plan for a customs tariff system which would have the effect of making every country with economic interests with Lebanon enter into negotiations with it to obtain most favored nation treatment.

The customs law currently stipulates that there are three tariffs: a maximum tariff, an ordinary tariff and an agreed-upon tariff; this law requires that these tariffs be imposed in accordance with the following:

Maximum tariffs: these are applied to goods which originate in countries which do not benefit from ordinary tariffs.

Ordinary tariffs: these are applied to goods which originate from countries specified by Higher Customs Council decrees.

Agreed-upon tariffs: these are applied to goods which originate in countries with which special customs agreements have been concluded.

In this regard it is worth pointing out that ordinary tariffs, which are amended tariffs that are generally applied, are automatically given to all countries in the world; likewise, the most favored nation treatment which countries try to obtain in economic negotiations is a fact of life in Lebanon.

Therefore we consider that the customs tariff system should be amended in the following manner:

A. In the legal provisions:

The customs law should be modified in such a way that the tariff system stipulated in it should be replaced by a new system including:

A general tariff.

A preferential tariff.

A special tariff.

General tariffs will apply to all countries which do not benefit from either the preferential or the special tariffs.

Preferential tariffs are applied wholly or in part to countries which sign special customs or commercial agreements with Lebanon or to whom the authorities see fit to give this treatment, in view of the overall economic relations linking them to Lebanon. Here in particular financial, cultural, economic or technical aid presented to Lebanon is taken into consideration.

The special tariff is applied, as is the situation now, to the countries belonging to the League of Arab States which have signed an agreement to facilitate trade with the countries in this league or have concluded bilaterial agreements with Lebanon in accordance with the provisions of these agreements.

B. In determining the rates of the various tariffs:

The goal of the proposed method is to set forth a "preferential tariff" in a manner which will be as close as possible to the current "ordinary tariff," wherein:

The change will not influence the receipts of customs duties.

Nor will it affect the degree of customs protection given to local industries.

Nor will it affect the level of domestic prices, as far as possible.

In Setting forth General Tariffs

Use will be made of the occasion of creating this tariff to conduct a comprehensive review of the general duty levels which the ordinary tariff now stipulates; these levels will be coordinated where they need to be coordinated, will operate where they can operate, and so forth.

These levels will increase by varying percentages, in accordance with the types of goods, in a manner which does not affect the level of prices, at least as far as materials related to the daily lives of citizens are concerned.

In general the increase will not exceed a maximum of 25 percent, although it is possible to keep below that rate or exceed it in specific cases.

In Setting forth Preferential Tariffs

The levels of this tariff will be set with respect to the general tariff by an average percentage rate reduction to be endorsed when general tariff rates are set out--that is, 25 percent, if the limit recommended in the previous paragraph is endorsed.

In Setting forth Special Tariffs

Special tariffs are the result of the application to preferential tariff rates of the deductions stipulated in the agreement to facilitate trade reached in the context of the Arab League, or in bilateral agreements with Arab countries.

The Benefits of This Solution

Among the benefits of this solution are the fact that:

1. It opens room for fruitful economic negotiations not just with Eastern European countries but also with other countries which benefit from ordinary tariffs free of charge.

2. The principle of freedom of trade authorized in Lebanon will be preserved.

3. The level of customs protection granted to Lebanese industry will be protected.

4. In the customs context, we will be assured of a practical, flexible customs system; instead of the maximum tariff which cannot be applied and constitutes a punishment which is not inflicted on anyone, there is a just "general tariff" which can be applied to countries which do not want to establish trade or economic cooperation relations with Lebanon. It also creates a "preferential tariff" suitable for encouraging countries to desire to make contracts with Lebanon.

5. No financial sacrifice will result from its application; rather, to the contrary, it may provide the treasury with additional revenues.

6. It will not affect domestic prices:

By keeping essential materials from receiving substantial tariff increases.

By continuing the exemptions stipulated in the current ordinary tariffs and the agreements concluded with Arab countries.

By issuing special measures requiring that "preferential tariffs" be granted as an exemption to countries whose overall economic relations with Lebanon the authorities consider permit that.

By paving the way for rivalry between goods subject to general tariffs and goods benefiting from preferential tariffs.

While waiting for this modification to be realized, we consider that we should avoid granting most favored nation treatment in the transitional period except with the utmost caution in order to change our current tariff system.

Czechoslovakia Prepares To Buy Lebanese Products Worth $5 Million Annually

AL-'ASR has learned that the Lebanese delegation which traveled to Czechoslovakia toward the end of August to sign a new trade agreement between the two countries was surprised to receive a request from the Czech party for information on the reconstruction of Lebanon. Czechoslovakia's desire to participate in projects the Lebanese government will carry out in this field was expressed to the Lebanese delegation.

The Czech party wondered if Arab aid stipulated that bids for projects or the purchase of equipment not be awarded to socialist countries.

The Lebanese delegation refrained from getting into that issue on grounds that its task was basically restricted to discussing commercial aspects alone and consequently that it was not empowered to discuss the subject of reconstruction, the participation of Czech organizations in it, or the sale of equipment for its projects.

In addition, the Lebanese delegation, which traveled to Prague on 25 August 1980, signed a new commercial agreement which had previously been prepared for in Beirut with the Czech commercial mission.

The new agreement abrogated the previously concluded clearing agreement and its annexes and gave most favored nation treatment to the two contracting groups. Payments between the two countries have been freed and vessels of both countries are given equal opportunities to transport goods traded between themselves.

The most prominent point in the agreement is that Czechoslovakia has promised to buy Lebanese products valued at $5 million a year.

FRANJIYYAH SETS CONDITIONS FOR SUPPORTING NEW GOVERNMENT

Beirut AL-NAHAR in Arabic 9 Sep 80 p 3

[Report on press conference given by former President Sulayman Franjiyyah, in Ihdin; date not given]

[Text] President Sulayman Franjiyyah has affirmed that he "does not object to the participation of any faction in the new government, provided that the army, supported by the Arab deterrent force, moves into all Lebanese territory. The new government must commit itself in its inaugural statement to set a time and date for these forces to fan out towards the south, the north and the west, one kilometer per day from the presidential palace." He accused President Sarkis of failing to implement Arab summit conference resolutions "despite the fact that the Arabs gave him everything."

President Franjiyyah spoke yesterday at a press conference he held in Ihdin about various current issues.

Earnestness and Diversion

Correspondents began the press conference with a question about the seriousness of President Elias Sarkis's effort to get out of the crisis. Franjiyyah was asked if he believed that Sarkis's action was a mere diversionary tactic, as former Prime Minister Karami was saying.

Franjiyyah replied, "I agree with former Prime Minister Karami that everything being proposed on the Lebanese scene is diversionary. The most recent proposal was that of a government of activists to implement reconciliation. Fine. The government that they proposed was rejected by former Prime Minister Karami. I also rejected it completely. But for your information, I am announcing for the first time that this rejection was not to apply if a condition was met. This is that the proposed government pledge to the Chamber of Deputies in its inaugural statement that it would set a time and date for the Lebanese forces, supported by the deterrent forces, to fan out from the presidential palace towards the north, the south and the west, so as to extend the state's control. These forces would move one kilometer per day in all directions. We thank God who made our country large in significance and small in size. Thus, within 100 days, these forces will have spread across all Lebanese territory, and the situation will have returned to normal. But we have not heard anything about the state accepting this condition. We are repeating, and we are saying that the regime is trying to distract the Lebanese people until the 2 remaining years [of the term of Sarkis] go by without any action, resolution or implementation of a plan."

Franjiyyah was asked if he would ask President Sarkis to use the military solution in case one of the parties objected to implementation of the suggestion. He replied, "If he does not want to use the military solution, why have an army? Why is he spending 1 billion Lebanese pounds on the defense budget?"

Franjiyyah was asked about the two types of government presented to him. He said, "Only one type was presented to former Prime Minister Karami and to me. This was before Prime Minister Taqiy al-Din al-Sulh was appointed premier-designate. Other than this proposal, which Brig Gen al-Khuli was charged to relay to us, we did not receive any proposal."

Regarding the current Lebanese experience of a homeland that is united on paper, but whose land is divided, he said: "There is a state, but it does not really exist; [some act as if] the Arabs do not exist. Let me refer you to a statement made by Kuwait's minister of foreign affairs, in which he said, 'I do not know what they want!' If those who are the closest friends of the Lebanese people make such statements, what about those who are not their friends? This is not the Arabs' fault; this is our fault. The Arabs gave us everything we asked for at the summit conferences, but we did not carry out any resolutions, and wasted all the golden opportunities we had. It is the president of the republic who is responsible for this."

Who Is Working for Partition?

Franjiyyah was asked about his opinion of Shaykh Pierre al-Jumayyil's statement that we would have partition if the situation were to remain as it is.

He replied, "This person is himself working for partition. It is unfortunate that he calls for a legitimate government and for strengthening it, but does the opposite of what he calls for. Does this man refer to himself and to his party when he talks about the legitimate government? Does he believe that all the Lebanese people are stupid and he is intelligent? Maybe the opposite is the truth. A statement is made every day, but actions contradict the statements. Does he think that people are stupid? Anyone who thinks people are stupid is the biggest fool."

Crisis To Be Resolved with His Departure

Franjiyyah was asked about the means of getting out of the maelstrom. He replied, "There is no getting out of the maelstrom as long as President Elias Sarkis is president. We will get out of it when he departs."

About President Sarkis's objective of injecting the Syrians as mediators, Franjiyyah said, "His objective is to convey to the Lebanese people and to the world the impression that Syria is blocking agreement.

"Is this true? This is fiction. Lies! Lies! Lies! As far as I know--and I am not supposed to know everything--the Syrians did everything they could do that was asked of them."

Why aren't some leaders taking action to reveal the dimensions of the game and the regime's position, he was asked?

He replied, "The Lebanese question consists of two parts: a Lebanese-Lebanese part and an Arab-Lebanese part. Since the Palestinians are on our land, we cannot come up with a solution with our own capabilities by ourselves. We can only do so with our Arab brothers. But the Arabs have nothing to do with the existing internal condition on Lebanese territory. If we need help, we can ask them for it, but we are the ones who must solve this ourselves. No one but the state can solve this, and the state is, unfortunately, non-existent!"

About his opinion of the statement made by the Maronite Patriarch Antonios Butrus Kharish that "We, the Lebanese people cannot design a state; we do not have the ability to design a state," Franjiyyah said, "Most certainly we cannot design the state that His Eminence the Patriarch is hoping for, but we can design a state like any one of the existing states."

The Resistance and Implementation

About former Prime Minister Karami's statement that the security plan cannot be implemented unless the agreements with the resistance are carried out, Franjiyyah said, "The state has tried many times to work with the Palestinians to implement agreements, but, unfortunately, it did not achieve any results. I join former Prime Minister Karami in hoping that the agreements will be carried out, but not carrying them out does not prevent the state from establishing its control over the largest possible section of Lebanese territory, if not all of it."

Franjiyyah was asked about his position on the proposal made by Deputy Amin al-Jumayyil regarding political security as an alternative to the security plan. He replied, "Any person can propose what he wishes. Amin al-Jumayyil and other members of al-Jumayyil family make new proposals every day. Which one do they really believe in? I don't think they believe in any proposal. They believe in a state, an emirate, a kingdom or at the very least a republic whose president would be one of them."

Franjiyyah responded to a question by saying that he did not feel that the government had looked into the statement that was issued after the National Movement's visit to the north.

About what he and his allies would do if the government maintains its passive position, he said, "They will guarantee a comfortable life in their own environment. Sulayman Franjiyyah can do no more."

But how can this be done when security is being broken continuously? He replied, "These outbreaks have ended, thank God! If you were to look some day into investigations made, you would find that these outbreaks were concocted by the government so that this province would not remain as it is today. They went so far as to disrupt Tripoli with outbreaks which the authorized agencies paid for, according to the investigation."

The Possible and the Impossible

Regarding the possibility of implementing the security plan which the government is trying to work out with Syria, he said, "We want first to know the plan so that we can say whether it can be implemented or not. It would not be enough to implement the plan in the marketplace or in some sensitive areas. The government must be in control of all the Lebanese territories it can control. The territories that it cannot control are the border areas which are controlled by the Israelis. The army can do what it wishes with the assistance of the deterrent forces in the other areas."

[He was asked if he thought the army could implement the security plan] even if that plan included the north. He replied, "I hope they would begin in the north. We have an army and a deterrent force. Let them coordinate their actions and set out for all the areas of the north."

Can the security plan be implemented before an agreement over the Army Law is reached? He said, "If we do not agree about a law, what could we agree about? What is hindering the implementation of the Army Law? The powers given to the Mr Johnny 'Abidu? They want to incorporate into the law all the irregular things that are being done by what is called the Deuxieme Bureau [Intelligence Agency]. They want to make the chief of the Deuxieme Bureau a dictator of the Lebanese republic in political, economic, social and even in educational matters."

Does he believe that the difference over reorganizing the army takes us back to square one and exposes the state to hazards, he was asked?

He replied, "Are you saying take us back to square one? Why? Where is the state now? It is in square one."

Is not the security plan the program of the next government, he was asked?

He replied, "Regardless of who is in the government, the purpose of the security plan is to spread the government's control over all Lebanese territory. We are with the government in this without reservations."

About his opinion of Lebanon's official rejection of the PLO's invitation to hold a meeting of the Arab Defense Council to discuss the situation in the south, Franjiyyah said, "The rejection was justified 100 percent. But if the Lebanese state knew its duties, it would have made the request itself. I wish the Palestinian brothers had not asked for the meeting directly, but had approached the state about it. If the state refused, the refusal would be known, and any Arab state would have the right to make the request."

The Experiment of Unity

About the anticipated union between Syria and Libya he said, "As far back as we can remember, we have always heard the leaders of Arab countries, especially the eastern ones, talk about unity of the Arab nation. Every Arab country has adopted the slogan of Arab unity from the Gulf to the [Atlantic] Ocean. Syria's slogan is unity, freedom, socialism. Thus, Arab unity according to Arab officials is the objective of every political action. Today unity may or may not be a fact, comprehensive or partial, but it is necessary for our happiness. The first step of what has been called for by the masses and in official circles is being implemented. We hope from the bottom of our hearts that this experiment will be successful, and that it will include all the Arabs."

Regarding how this step towards unity would affect the situation in Lebanon, he said, "It will most certainly be good, because we have sensed from our contact with fraternal Syria that Syria has no ambitions in Lebanon. How then could our distant sister have any ambitions in Lebanon? I doubt, [in fact] I swear that they have no designs on Lebanon. They are experimenting. If the experiment succeeds, we will grab it. If, God forbid, it should fail, it will be another one of the experiments."

Did he see the need for Lebanon's participation in any possible confrontation with Israel, he was asked?

He replied, "Would Lebanon be far away from a confrontation that may take place one day or the other under unity or without it? This is not possible. Although Lebanon did not bear arms in the 1948 war, it did carry out its duties towards the fighters. Lebanon would not remain a spectator in case of any confrontation that may occur even in Jordan, away from Lebanon. Lebanon has its duties within its capabilities."

President Franjiyyah was told, "You are an Arab nationalist in one sense of the word." He said, "It is not necessary to make that claim, but I do not allow anyone to claim that he is more of an Arab nationalist than I am."

Regarding the European initiative and what Franjiyyah had previously said about the fact that Europe was not speaking (its own mind), he said, "Europe is sacrificing everything it holds dear today to keep the jews in Israel. This is because if Israel were to cease to exist--and God willing it will cease to exist--the jews would return to Europe and would inflict upon Europe the same suffering it had experienced for centuries. It is in the interests of any European initiative to keep the jews in Israel."

Would he accept a part in a government which would adopt a clear action program to which Damascus would have contributed, and which would include third rank Phalangists who are not members of the al-Jumayyil family? He said, "Despite all efforts [claimed to have been] made by the state, can you mention to me one? There was one proposal which Brig Gen al-Khuli relayed to us. We turned it down, unless one condition was met. We turned it down, because the Phalangists would be part of it. But if the government carried out our condition, we do not care who would be part of it.

In response to a question, he explained: "We said that the army was to fan out one kilometer per day over all Lebanese territory. Are we to exclude Upper al-Matn or Lower al-Matn?"

Would he join the Phalangists if the army were to go into al-Ashrafiyah, he was asked? He replied, "Let whoever wants to go there do so, provided that the army, supported by the deterrent forces, go into all Lebanese territory. It is welcome to come to Zgharta."

Do you then support the inclusion of the Phalangists in the government, he was asked? He answered: "There is a condition. Politically speaking, one, two or three ministers in 20 would not make a difference, but there is one reservation.

We are forgetting that Israel's policy could become part of the government. We have reached the point of wanting to perish."

Regarding the Vatican's position vis a vis the Lebanese faction that opposes its position on the subject of Jerusalem as well as Israel's decisions in that regard, he said, "With regard to Jerusalem, the Vatican did not know the position of the Lebanese faction. But with regard to the al-Safra incidents the Vatican took the same position that was taken by the Maronite patriarch. It is quite unlikely for the Vatican to entertain the position of a Lebanese faction or to oppose it internationally."

Regarding a report about a role he played for unity he replied, "If I knew its source, I would answer, but it may be something that was made up by AL-NAHAR, for example."

He denied interfering in any way to bring Libya and Syria closer together for the purpose of uniting them. He said, "There was no need for mediation between Syria and Libya. It became evident that there was nothing to tarnish their relationship."

He said that his visit to Libya was "likely, but not under the present circumstances. It if had been very urgent, I would have gone. The visit will be made in response to Col al-Qadhdhafi's invitation. We will go after the crisis is over."

Responding to a question regarding Cpt Muhammad 'Uthman, a gendarme who was kidnapped some time ago, he said, "Two young men, one from the district of Zgharta and the other from the district of Jubayl drove in one car to Beirut. There was no news of them for over three and a half months. I would not wish for anyone to be in their parents' shoes. In the present situation, anyone who leaves his house is subject to being kidnapped. Then one of the two men, a gendarme, returned and reported what had happened. The father of the missing young man asked the Deuxieme Bureau to return his son or to turn him over to a military court if he were guilty. Then he went to Tripoli, and talked to the first officer he met from the Deuxieme Bureau. He then talked to the father of one of the officers of the Deuxieme Bureau. We are waiting for the son to be released, but the officials are not paying any attention to the matter."

Campaign Against Harb

Then Franjiyyah discussed the decision of the minister of public works, Mr Butrus Harb, regarding joining the district of al-Batrun with the province of Jabal Lubnan with regard to his ministry's activity. Franjiyyah said, "There are several explanations for this.

"This may be the beginning of implementing a decentralized administration. This is possible. However, a decentralized administration would not take from a small heap to give to a large heap. If Harb had tried to annex the district of Jubayl to North Lebanon, we would have said that he relieved Jabal Lubnan of a burden and turned it over to the north. We would have been grateful to him, if he had the right to do so. But there is no explanation for the administrative divisions of Lebanon being modified by a mere edict issued by a minister. The real reasons for the minister's action can be found in the fact that the official of the ministry of public works in North Lebanon is from Zgharta, and does not yield to the minister on decisions that violate the law. He has rejected all the decisions, and has transferred everything that pertains to the ministry of public works in the district of al-Batrun to the province of Jabal Lubnan.

"The minister is now a member of a government whose resignation has been accepted. Does he have the right to make decisions of this kind? A self-respecting minister in such a situation would carry out routine business such as employees pensions. I am talking about a man who respects himself, not one who takes advantage of his position, as does the minister of public works. I would not be surprised by anything he would do. But let him know that his decision will not be implemented, nor will any action originating from his department in the province of Jabal Lubnan to the district of al-Batrun be implemented."

POLITICAL SITUATION FOLLOWING AL-HADATH CLASHES REVIEWED

Kuwait AL-WATAN in Arabic 16 Sep 80 p 13

[Article: "Vast Majority Siding with Sarkis after al-Hadath Clashes and Army Intervention; Government of Activists Without Phalangists and Franjiyyah; Visits of Rizq Reveal Internal Phalangist Conflict"]

[Text] The recent clashes between the army and the Phalangist militia in the area of al-Hadath raised several questions about the future of relations between the legitimate government and the Phalangists, and between the government and the other Lebanese forces in the country. It soon became evident that a vast majority of Lebanese activists supported President Sarkis in his position on the intervention of the army. These activist forces can be said to represent a considerable majority on the scene. Its most important elements are the National Movement in Beirut; the Amal Movement; the parliamentary forces, excluding deputies of the separatist front; and other independent forces and political organizations. It is the judgment of persons close to President Sarkis that these elements are capable at any moment of supporting the formation of a new government capable of governing and assuming responsibility for preserving conditions in the country regardless of the difficulties and obstacles it may face.

The problem as the president sees it in the new situation is that the news from the north is not encouraging, especially following former Prime Minister Rashid Karami's intensification of his opposition and criticism. Karami has joined former President Sulayman Franjiyyah in calling upon the president to resign if he fails to consolidate the underpinnings of government in Lebanon.

A Government of the Majority of Activist

The administration is assuming a new position with regard to the government crisis. This position would call for the formation of a government that would represent a majority but not all of the activists. It seems that the regime will do so by keeping the Phalangists and the northern bloc out of the government. In case negotiations in this connection are successful, the government crisis will be solved without challenges, and a new government will be formed as soon as possible, if the parties concerned agree to take part in such a government with the approval and support of "the allies."

Based on these new considerations in the political situation in Lebanon, it is expected that the president of the republic will send Deputy Rene Mu'awwad to Biqa'

Safrin to meet with former Prime Minister Rashid Karami. Naturally, Mu'awwad would also communicate the position of the president of the republic to former President Sulayman Franjiyyah, especially since Mu'awwad was and still is an active liaison between President Sarkis and former President Franjiyyah. This is because he has strong relations with both. The new proposal which the president of the republic will announce amounts to the formation of a government which excludes any partisans of the Phalangists or of former President Franjiyyah. But will these two parties accept this?

Al-Jumayyil's Statements

The daily statements published in the name of Phalangist Chief Pierre al-Jumayyil indicate clearly that the Phalangists will not accept any government in which they do not participate. These statements also indicate that the party's old demand is still being made, that a member of the al-Jumayyil family represent the party. Al-Jumayyil had notified the president during the recent visit he made to B'abda that the party's candidate would be Amin al-Jumayyil and no one else. He also said that the party did not object to or have any preconditions regarding any candidates of the other factions.

The visits made to B'abda by Phalangist Deputy Edmond Rizq, who is considered an opponent of Bashir al-Jumayyil's course of action, had revealed a behind the scenes conflict within the party. However, these visits did not confirm the ability of Amin al-Jumayyil's faction to oppose Bashir's extremist faction. Therefore, Pierre al-Jumayyil's insistence that Amin be in the cabinet signifies the immediate agreement of Amin's faction to deploy the army from Upper al-Matn to Antilyas on the sea coast near Juniyah.

Al-Huss and the Secrets of the Game

The private meetings held by a group of deputies with candidates for the new government reveal that former Prime Minister Salim al-Huss is aware of most of what is going on behind the scenes, and is supporting the president. Al-Huss regards himself as out of contention for the premiership, but constantly emphasizes that President Sarkis has to form a government quickly, because the process of disposing of business without a government in office is not effective under present conditions in the country. But persons close to Prime Minister Taqiy al-Din al-Sulh, especially the deputies who visit him almost daily, emphasize that the current situation requires boldness in forming a government of activists that would include all factions without exception. Al-Sulh rejects the notion of a provisional government without Franjiyyah and the Phalangists. He considers that such a government would be incomplete and inadequate.

Karami's Demand

Former Prime Minister Rashid Karami is calling for the formation of a permanent government, but he is defining conditions for such a government that would keep obstacles out of its way. Such a government would be homogeneous and would try to implement the principles of reconciliation before proclaiming its agreement with its details. Karami still adheres to his refusal to form a government, because existing differences in points of view between him and President Sarkis and a large group of Lebanese remain unresolved, and there are no indications that these differences will soon to be overcome. But Karami is objective on the subject of forming a government: he would not oppose any candidate who succeeds in resolving the problem of north Lebanon, and adopts a clear and candid position regarding those who deal with Israel.

Important Possibilities

According to information being discussed by some ministers of al-Huss's government, it seems that the administration is expecting significant developments to occur before it takes new steps to solve the government crisis, or while efforts that are being made to form a government. These developments may be summarized as follows:

1. Special information received by President Sarkis from some countries in Western Europe indicates that the crisis of south Lebanon is not over yet; that the Zionist state intends to launch a broad-based offensive against the south; and that it is awaiting a suitable opportunity to achieve this. The president feels that such a possibility calls for the formation of a government of activists, rather than a caretaker government. However, if every faction maintains its present position, despite its awareness of the current situation in the country, the formation of a provisional government becomes essential to confront all anticipated developments in the south and elsewhere. Sarkis insists on this, and wants the new government--in case a government of activists cannot be formed--to exclude the Phalangists and Franjiyyah and to be headed by Malik Salam.

Not Burning the Bridges

2. The Lebanese government believes that the widening of the opposition which calls for President Sarkis's resignation may lead to the renewal of the armed clashes, and may restore the climate of war in the country. According to the president, this encourages him to refrain from "burning his bridges" with the Phalangists and to maintain cooperation with them until further notice. Ongoing communications at the present stage are addressing the necessity of coming to an understanding with the president of the republic before matters get worse.

The Position of the National Movement

3. The National Movement is trying to contain every attempt to sow discord and generate clashes on the Lebanese scene, so as not to weaken the joint forces operating in the south, especially since a large number of the movement's fighters did move to the south to support and defend the area. In view of these considerations, the position of the National Movement regarding the formation of a new government is a very positive one. This is the crucial issue with regard to the policy and plans of the National Movement. The movement's basic demand at this stage is the formation of a new government that satisfies or achieves the greatest possible measure of progress.

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE BREAKS DOWN DATA ON NATION'S EXPORTS

Beirut AL-SAFIR in Arabic 10 Sep 80 p 6

/Article: "Chamber of Commerce Report on Industrial Exports"/

/Text/ The Study and Documentation Center of the Chamber of Commerce and Industry in Beirut has set out a report on the development of Lebanese export activities during the first half of 1980.

The report stated that total exports came to 1,767,000,000 pounds as compared with 1,193,000,000 pounds in the same period of 1979, that is, an increase of 48 percent.

The report pointed out that the bulk of Lebanese exports still flows toward the markets of Arab oil states and that Saudi Arabia still occupies first place with respect to these exports, while Iraq has come to assume second place in terms of imports from Lebanon, having occupied fourth place last year.

Here are the most important contents of the report:

First, development of Lebanese exports in the first half of 1980:

Table One: Development of Monthly Exports in First Half of 1977, 1978, 1979 and 1980 (in millions of pounds)

In spite of the high costs of production and continuing security crises, Lebanese exports continued to rise during the first 6 months of 1980, moving from 209 million pounds in January to 406 million in June, based on the values of exports whose origins were confirmed by the Chamber of Commerce and Industry in Beirut, which account for about 65 percent of total exports of Lebanese origin.

Total exports in the first half of this year came to 1,767,000,000 pounds, as compared with 1,193,000,000 pounds in the corresponding period of 1979, or an increase of 48 percent.

However, in order to make a useful evaluation of the status of exports at present, one must include the rate of increase in prices in computing the value of these exports, that is estimated at about 15 percent in the period June 1979-June 1980. The increase comes to about 29 percent in comparison with the corresponding period of 1979 in June 1979 prices.

It is necessary to point out here that this improvement in the development of exports in the first half of the current year does not mean that Lebanese installations, especially industrial ones, have been able to make up the massive losses they suffered as a consequence of the destruction in the summer of 1978 or have been able to absorb the great increase in production costs. It had been expected that Lebanese exports, which account for about 40 percent of local output, would surge to much higher rates as a result of capital spending, which did not occur at the anticipated rates because of security setbacks of continuous escalating severity.

Table Four: Geographic Distribution of Imports of Lebanese Origin Confirmed by Beirut Chamber of Commerce and Industry in the First Half of 1978, 1979 and 1980 (thousands of Lebanese pounds)

Second, Most important categories exported.

It is clear from the chamber's statistics on Beirut and Mount Lebanon (Table Three) that the most important exports are:

Manufactured items involved in building materials: 331.5 million pounds, accounting for 28.9 percent of total exports whose origin was confirmed by the Chamber of Commerce, as compared with 267.5 million pounds in the corresponding period of 1979.

Among the most important of these manufactured items are:

Ordinary metals, iron, aluminum, diverse ordinary metals, 143.8 million pounds.

Mining materials (cement), 135.5 million pounds.

Products of chemical manufactures: 146.1 million pounds, accounting for 12.7 percent of total exports, as compared with 124 million pounds in the corresponding period of 1979.

Textiles: 154.5 million pounds, as compared with 83.7 million pounds in the corresponding period of 1979.

Machinery, equipment and electrical equipment: 129.9 million pounds, accounting for 11.3 percent of total exports, as compared with 50.3 million pounds in the corresponding period of 1979.

Beverage and foodstuffs industry: 84.3 percent /sic/ as compared with 60.6 million pounds.

Paper and paper products: 58 million pounds as compared with 48 million pounds in the corresponding period of 1978 /sic/.

Third: Markets for Lebanese exports whose origin is confirmed by the Chamber of Commerce and Industry in Beirut.

From Table Four it is clear that the bulk of Lebanese exports flow toward the markets of Arab oil states.

In comparison with corresponding exports in previous years, we observe, on the one hand, that:

No structural change in the geographic concentration of Lebanese exports has occurred in 5 years. Arab markets still absorb 93 to 95 percent of total exports from the area of Beirut and Mount Lebanon, while they accounted for approximately two-thirds before the war.

Saudi Arabia still constitutes the basic market for Lebanese products, 38 percent in 1978 and 42 percent in 1980.

On the other hand, it also appears that there is a change in the standing of the markets of certain Arab countries as far as Lebanese exports go:

Lebanese exports to Iraq increased from 83 million pounds in the first half of 1978 to 271 million pounds in the corresponding period of 1980; Iraq has come to occupy second place with respect to Lebanese exports, whereas it had been in fourth place.

The value of exports to Jordan declined by half, from 119 million pounds in 1978 to 54 million pounds in 1980, placing Jordan's markets, with 4.7 percent, in fourth place in importance relative to Lebanese exports, instead of second place.

RIGHT-WING NATIONALISTS DRAW UP COMMUNITY SUPPORT PLANS

Beirut AL-ANWAR in Arabic 12 Sep 80 p 4

/Article: "Lebanese Forces Establish Service Agency To Provide Requirements of Daily Life for Citizens"/

/Text/ The Lebanese forces declared at a press conference they held yesterday that they have established an agency for public services, one of whose tasks will be to provide the climate for a dignified life for citizens and provide various types of public services related to their daily life. They stated that they will pursue two avenues to provide these services: the first is based on stimulating the official agencies and the second is based on having the Lebanese Forces bear the responsibility for carrying these services out.

During the conference, Mr Nadim al-Shuwayri, head of the Public Services Agency of the Lebanese Forces, read out a statement in which he said,

"The Lebanese Forces know that the government's files are full of projects and studies which might be sound for the most part but that none of them have been carried out, because of the sick psychological state dominating government departments and the complicated administrative statutes in effect, which prevent the wheels of administration from moving naturally and soundly.

"Here today I am setting before you a list of the projects the Lebanese Forces have carried out so far, or intend to carry out:

Transportation

"After the Lebanese Forces had succeeded in the domestic transport project, which provided transport for citizens at low prices, and once these routes had been restricted to the coastal area from Beirut to Jubayl and some summer villages in al-Matn, we today intend to provide other routes to Kasrawan, as well as al-Ashrafiyah when work finishes on the two freeways which pass through this region.

"There now is a project under study related to operating small buses to provide transport among inner sections within the liberated sections of Beirut, on grounds that the narrow streets do not permit large buses to pass.

"Here one should bear in mind that we have ventured to establish stations to shield citizens from the sun and rain and also to contribute to easing traffic since the buses will stop only in front of these stations.

Streets and Branches

"Now that the streets and sidewalks have become pits in which filth and refuse are gathered, we have decided to confront this situation in the following manner:

"1. Repave and resurface the roads and plant them with flowers and trees; work has been undertaken on the corniche of the river, starting at the Palace of Justice.

"2. Cleaning real property and neglected lands of filth and neglected cars and establishing small gardens alongside the roads in cooperation with the municipalities and owners of private organizations.

"3. Cleaning the water channels along roads to drain off rainwater before the winter season falls.

"4. Cleaning and sweeping the streets by the municipalities or with the assistance of shop owners.

"5. Lighting the streets after solving the issues unresolved by the Lebanon Electric Organization, the Major Projects Council and some municipalities.

"6. Regulating the establishment of shops in the form of sheds, especially along the international highways and in the outskirts of the capital, before they get out of hand, now that they have started constituting a danger to traffic safety.

"7. Reorganizing the condition of the signs, especially signs with street names and property numbers.

"8. Placing electric and neon signs at the intersections of roads to ensure traffic safety at night.

Traffic Problems

"As regards traffic problems, we have decided to confront the chaotic state with the aid of the traffic police in order to remedy the following matters:

"1. Honoring the signs placed on roads and one-way streets, bearing in mind that most of these signs do not exist or are broken; we are now working to restore and reinstall them.

"2. Overseeing forged license plates and detaining all stolen cars, although such incidents have rarely occurred in our areas.

"3. Demand that citizens not use horns and music, out of sensitivity to people's nerves.

"4. Regulating traffic in rush hours and on congested intersections.

"5. Prohibiting the driving of vehicles which do not adhere to safety features such as lights, covering of trucks whose loads come loose, and so forth.

"6. Imposing mandatory inspection on all vehicles upon payment of registration fees, to ascertain that they are fit for driving.

"7. Reviewing the flow of traffic in some streets now that some new streets have been opened.

"8. Confirming that drivers possess official drivers' licenses, now that we have observed a large number of drivers below legal age.

"In brief, compelling drivers to commit themselves to all traffic statutes in effect.

"It also appears to the Lebanese Forces that the performance of work on the freeways connecting the Palace of Justice to al-Hikmah and the Foreign Ministry on the river corniche will require a period of 2 months at most, in the event the government makes a serious decision on the matter. Therefore we are trying with all our effort, through the bodies concerned to carry out this vital project, which will guarantee that the traffic problem is solved in al-Ashrafiyah in particular as we are on the verge of the school year.

Consumer Protection"Now that there has been much talk about the emergence of a wave of fraud in some gas stations, regarding the quality or quantity provided, causing great damage to citizens, we have made a careful examination in a number of stations and have sent samples from them to the laboratory for analysis. The result appears in the published table /not translated/.

"To prevent tampering with station meters, we have called for the holding of a meeting with distribution company officials in order to inspect these meters, seal them, and confirm that they are working properly.

"Fuel oil and butane: We are now carrying out a similar campaign to ascertain the quality and quantity of materials delivered to the industrial sector, the transportation sector and also to homes. We will follow up on this campaign periodically and will adopt severe penalties for tamperers and violators.

Consumer Goods

"Treatment of the issue of consumer good prices requires deep study. Therefore we have considered that we have an obligation to the citizen, at least at this stage, to let him know the type and price of the goods he buys. Therefore, the merchants must declare the prices of the commodities they sell, especially foodstuffs.

"As regards the type of commodity, the Lebanese Forces have held preliminary investigations which reveal the conclusion that some merchants are adulterating specific foodstuffs in a regular fashion, and they are awaiting the conduct of further analyses to arrive at complete data. We will content ourselves with presenting the following examples:

"1. Some types of corned beef are now being imported from Rumania and Africa at low prices,forged labels are being fixed to them bearing the name of major well known international trademarks, and they are sold at the same prices /as the latter/. This method is also followed as regards some brands of tuna and oil prepared for food.

"2. Citric acid is mixed with alum, which has the same flavor but is cheaper and unhealthy.

Movies

"We recognize that the official ticket price is no longer reasonable, but ask on this occasion whether the management of some movie houses provide their customers with comfort in exchange for special prices. We have noted that air conditioners do not function as desired, sanitary facilities are not always available, and some houses do not commit themselves to public health statutes in the event fire or disaster occurs.

"Therefore we request the owners of houses to commit themselves to the statutes, in order to preserve the health and comfort of movie-goers.

Bakeries

"It seems to us that many bakery owners lack proper vocational conscience and that many bakeries are suffering from two problems: cleanliness and the presence of raw materials.

"A group of specialists is now analyzing the materials which go into the manufacture of loaves to ascertain their quality.

"Patrols belonging to the Lebanese Forces will examine bakeries to confirm that the necessary sanitary conditions exist in them.

"The necessary penalties will be exacted against all violators and these penalties may reach the point of media publicity or final shutdowns.

Pharmacies

"During the years of the war, pharmacies spread out over numerous locations and districts, in violation of every law and all vocational conscience or technical consideration; this exposed, and still is exposing, citizens to the most calamitous dangers. We have made a list of the names of pharmacies operating in the free areas. We have decided to prohibit the opening of any new pharmacies which do not possess legal permits, review the conditions of the existing ones, and close all pharmacies which do not meet technical and moral conditions, in cooperation and coordination with the official bodies concerned and the Pharmacists' Union.

Electricity

"Electric plants in Lebanon are now yielding their full productive capacity, without any reserve, which means that in the case a machine breaks down or is shut down for maintenance the general balance will be disturbed, electricity will be cut off, current will be reduced and voltage will drop.

"While waiting for an improvement in output, as has been promised, we consider that it is our duty to adopt rapid measures before falling prey to a serious crisis.

"1. Stopping the theft of electricity by compelling citizens who use electricity in illegitimate ways to settle their circumstances with the Lebanon Electric Organization and requesting special meters for them, especially since this organization, in accordance with our demand, intends to streamline the red tape in transactions and not to insist strongly on requesting legal documents, in view of the exceptional conditions of persons who have fled. It has delegated a team of employees to settle these conditions and accelerate transactions.

"2. Improving distribution cables, especially in the 'Ayn al-Rummanah section, and replacing cables which are unfit or burned because of electricity thefts and reduced voltage.

"3. After taking into consideration the conditions of some sections which have been heavily hit, the technical committees of the Lebanon Electric Organization, with the aid of patrols of the Lebanese Forces, will proceed to record all electricity violations and thefts that occur, draw up ledgers of penalties on the violators and impose the appropriate penalties on them.

"4. Dealing strictly with contractors in order to keep the underground cables intact when excavations take place.

"5. Protecting the equipment of the Lebanon Electric Organization and all other official organizations and preventing their theft, expropriation, or damage by anyone, under threat of very strict penalties.

Water

"Work has taken place in organized fashion to confirm that the requisite water inspection analyses have been carried out and that sources of water pollution have been discovered and eliminated at the proper time in order to provide the citizens with suitable sanitary water.

"We are also helping the Lebanon Water Organization offer every assistance when major breakdowns occur, in order to guarantee repairs in the shortest possible time, while awaiting studies to provide additional amounts of water to areas where constant cutoffs occur.

Telephones

"The Lebanese Forces have established a special technical agency in the liberated areas to investigate the following matters:

"1. Reasons for delayed current signals in lines (dial tones).

"2. The conditions of cables linking centers, since some are used from center to center for the benefit of some customers at the expense of others. For example:

"Communications with Jubayl, Beirut, are provided by means of one line.

"3. Investigation into the presence of generators and batteries to provide continued connections in case any breakdowns or electric shutoffs occur.

"4. Confirmation of the proper operation of air conditioners, since breakdowns in the summer season lead to disruptions in equipment.

"5. Assertion of attention to continuous operation on the part of employees and their response to the complaints of customers.

Garbage

"The garbage which is thrown into the streets every day without any concern for principles of cleanliness, beauty and public health constitutes a public danger and a vehicle for the proliferation of bugs, rats and rodents. Barrels distributed here and there in turn constitute a large part of this danger, because when they are incompletely emptied the filth is left over which rots and poses an element in the spread of foul odors and insects which communicate diseases. In addition, one should mention the garbage which overflows from these barrels, falls on the ground and stays where it is, in addition to the refuse from restaurants, plants, offices and construction workshops.

"Moreover, one should bear in mind that citizens have also contributed to exacerbating these conditions by continuing to throw garbage about without using plastic bags or sealing them well. Therefore we have decided to confront this perverse situation and remedy it in stages, in view of its difficult nature, beginning with cooperation between citizens and sanitation workers and proceeding through the installation of new barrels and the spraying of barrels with insecticides to prevent the spread of diseases and proliferation of bugs, and ending with reliance on new methods used in advanced countries.

Sewers

"The method for disposing of sewage water in Lebanon relies on extremely poor, serious principles, considering that this water flows either into a sanitary pit and leaks out into wells or into the sea, which causes citizens to drink polluted water and swim in filthy water. All countries in the world, even backward ones, have found a solution to this grave problem, while to this day Lebanon remains deficient in solving it.

"Therefore one must create sound solutions beginning by excavating in accordance with technical principles, then proceeding with small purification plants in limited population accumulations, schools and hospitals, and ending with sewer systems which must flow into suitable purification plants.

Pollution

"A study is now underway, in cooperation with the competent agencies, on ways and means which must be followed to limit the spread of pollution, which is caused by factories, cars running on diesel and so forth.

"A periodic mechanical checkup of cars operating on diesel and the placement of filters on the smokestacks of factories, as is observed in advanced countries.

Posters

"Posters on walls have become filthy and ugly. Therefore we consider it necessary to regulate the attachment of posters, taking into consideration the maintenance of cleanliness and beauty of the streets, buildings and installations. Some specialists have determined to prepare a study putting a limit to the current chaos, designating special boards which will be hung in specific places, and prohibiting the affixing of announcements except on these boards.

"It is also necessary to regulate announcements on light poles and highways which can constitute a danger to traffic safety.

"What applies to posters applies also to signs and all similar forms.

Civil Defense

"In view of the weakness of the public sector in this field, because it is deficient in the necessary agencies and equipment, the Lebanese Forces have resolved to face this situation by establishing fixed emergency units in all areas and support units composed of:

1. Military first aid vehicles.

2. Fire trucks equipped with ladders.

"3. Tanks.

"4. Teams trained in lifesaving and first aid.

"In the event any fires occur or road or other accidents take place in the al-Ashrafiyah section, citizens may contact the following centers:

"Fire station, telephone 216216.

"Lebanese Forces police station /text ends at this point./ "

PHALANGE PARAMILITARY FORCES--The Phalange Party's operational and media preparations reached their climax yesterday, beginning with a step to replace the official police by autonomous police in areas where the Phalange militia, or what are known as "the Lebanese Forces," dominate, in the context of a comprehensive plan to take over the Phalangist statelet and eliminate the government's role there. The Phalange Party prepared to deployment its "police" in its "areas" today with two statements issued by the "public service agency of the Lebanese Forces," in one of which concentration was placed on a meeting held by the general manager of the domestic security forces, Maj Gen Ahmad al-Hajj, and the chief of the "public service agency of the Lebanese Forces," Nadim Shuwayri. The first statement called upon truck and heavy equipment owners and drivers to paint the rears of their trucks and equipment with special phosphorescent paint to reflect light and guarantee traffic safety at night. It expressed the readiness of the day shift work teams of the public service agency to perform this work starting today. The second statement announced "a meeting held between Maj Gen al-Haff and Shuwayri, followed by an expanded meeting with the traffic group officers, during which methods which will help to control matters and violations were studied. It was decided to bring in concentrated traffic police patrols starting Tuesday the 16th (today)." The statement did not say whether the patrols which would be deployed in the streets belonged to the security forces or the Phalange police system. However, Phalange sources have mentioned that "One hundred Phalange motorcycles painted white and driven by 100 Phalange personnel dressed in uniforms similar to those of American police will take charge of regulating traffic and preserving security in the eastern districts." /Text/ /Beirut AL-SAFIR in Arabic 16 Sep 80 p 4/ 11887

PARTY CONGRESS DISCUSSES NEW REVISED 5-YEAR PLAN

Aden 14 OCTOBER in Arabic 14 Oct 80 p 2

/Article: "Main Directions and Indicators of the Second Amended 5-Year Economic and Social Development Plan for 1981-85"/

/Text/ The exceptional general conference of the Yemeni Socialist Party discussed the main directions and indicators of the second amended 5-year economic and social development plan for the years 1981-85.

The discussion included 14 interventions which comprised an analysis of the current situation, the overall development indicators of the national economy, industrial and agricultural development, fishing, productive capabilities, transport and communications, foreign and domestic trade, social development, investment allocations and financial resources, labor and staffs, and regional development.

The conference stressed that promulgation of the 5-year plan will take place as a reflection of the social and economic policy that was presented to the first conference of our party, which it ratified, and affirmed the directives of the Central Committee at its various sessions. The conference also emphasized that promulgation of the plan will take place in order to resolve the most important issues facing us in the current stage, which are:

1. Creating suitable conditions for establishing the material and technical base of the domestic economy, in particular completing construction of the basic structures and guaranteeing balanced development of the branches of the economy. 2. Raising the standard of living of the people as a major developmental goal.

3. Strengthening the state and cooperative sector effecting fundamental changes in the composition of the domestic economy and the social structure for the benefit of the productive sectors and the qualitative development of the workforce. 4. Raising the cultural level of the people, uplifting spiritual life and /illegible/ social consciousness.

5. Constantly building leadership and intermediate staffs for the sake of the sound operation and optimum use of the means of production.

What Did the First 5-Year Plan Achieve?

The conference paused before an analysis of the current state of the domestic economy, as expressed by the basic achievements of the years 1974-78 as well as the two years 1979-80 of the first economic and social development plan. The conference's analysis of the results of the implementation of the first 5-year plan pointed to noticeable successes, in spite of material and financial difficulties and some social problems. The volume of social output in 1978 increased by about 50 percent above the 1973 level; national income increased by 72.6 million dinars in the years 1974-78. Per capita income in fixed prices increased from 35.5 dinars in 1973 to 55 dinars in 1978, an increase of 25 percent, resulting in an increase in consumption and an improvement in the citizens' standard of living over the 1973 level.

The conference also observed successes in the first 5-year plan in the mission of radical changing the structure of the national economy. During the years 1974-78, social production in industry in current prices, rose 167 percent, fish production 137 percent, agricultural production 30 percent, building and construction 318 percent, transport and communications 234 percent, and commerce, restaurants and hotels 114 percent.

However, the conference noted that it was not possible to make radical changes in the structure of social production in the years of the first 5-year plan. Nonproductive branches continued to account for 39 percent of the value of gross social production. Conversely, the conference noted that great changes occurred in the contributions of various forms of ownership, giving proof of deep transformations in production relationships. An example of that is the increase in the relative weight of the state sector from 25 percent in 1973 to 52 percent in 1978.

The conference paused with great interest before an analysis of domestic economic development in 1979. It was observed that little use was made of productive capacity in a number of productive branches, production costs increased, and production accessories were misused. These and other causes affected the realization of the goals of the 1979 plan, and only a minor growth rate was achieved in comparison with the planned growth rates, especially in the material production sectors.

What Are the Overall Indicators of the Plan?

The conference discussions stated that preparation of the modified second 5-year plan constitutes a more advanced stage in planning activity, since it has given care to eliminating errors and negative elements which appeared in previous activity.

This was prepared in accordance with realistic reports, and the level of employment of capabilities poses obvious tasks for the future development of all branches of the domestic economy. In the light of the implementation of plan tasks, the conference considers that an increase of about 61 percent will be achieved in social output and about 62 percent in productive national output--percentage increases which are in agreement with the basic indicators of the plan, which the Central Committee of the Yemeni Socialist Party ratified at its session held in April 1980.

The conference's interventions showed that at the same time the next plan will be striving to increase gross social output, it will aim at increasing the activities of social and cultural services, improving the quality of these services, and developing the general forces. The conference considers that implementation of the plan will lead to an increase in the role of the state sector and the cooperative sector, so that it will be possible for them both to continue the leading role in implementing the plan.

Those attending the conference affirmed that implementation of the revised second 5-year plan will require:

Mobilization of all the material, financial and productive powers and resources available to the agencies of the party and the state.

Concentration on such basic essential methods as raising work productivity, creating sound relations between production and wages, creating staffs, and using the best means for holding people to account economically.

A positive, effective position on work, which is the cornerstone of the implementation of the plan and attainment of its goals.

Industry: Difficulties and Scope for Solving Them

In the light of the amended second 5-year plan, the value of industrial output will increase by 81 percent as compared with its expected 1980 level.

As regards electric power generating projects, the conference, in the light of its discussions of the plan, stressed the utmost importance of fulfilling the citizens' needs in order to develop all branches of the domestic economy. Technical conditions, alongside a delay in the establishment of new plants, has led to the creation of the difficult circumstances the country has gone through lately.

An increase in the volume of electric power production of about 90 percent in 1985 over 1980 will result from the implementation of the plan, and water supply projects will occupy an important place in the plan. The plan will give greater attention to industries which use local raw materials, such as textiles, clothes, cigarettes, and salt. During the plan a start will be made on construction of the cement plant, which will have a capacity of 250,000 to 300,000 tons per year.

In the field of oil refining, the plan aims at refining about 12 million tons during the years of the plan and at striving to reduce losses and cut unnecessary expenses in the Aden refineries. The plan will devote major importance to geological exploration activities. The conference observed that the results of these activities will have a basic role in defining the future development of the domestic economy.

Agriculture: Reality and Ambitions

In spite of the increase in state farms and cooperatives and improvement in their production, the conference considers that these results are different from the planned goals and are not in accordance with the volume of investments directed toward this sector. Shortages are still prominent and are reflected in the drop of productivity per feddan, the failure economically to exploit new reclaimed lands, the confinement of a large area of reform lands, the survey of errors in pricing and marketing policy, and so forth.

In the context of the 1981-85 5-year plan, the basic mission of the agricultural sector will be the firm, constant increase in the volumes of agricultural output and the consolidation of the role of the state and cooperative sector in production. The agricultural plan indicators specify the attainment of a gross output valued at 47.2 million dinars in 1985 as compared with 31 million dinars in 1980, or a production increase ranging around 52.2 percent. This increase will result from the improved use of land and increased productivity of crops and livestock production. In addition, irrigation activities will be given an important status since the completion of irrigation activities over an area of 41,300 feddans is envisioned for the years 1981-85.

Fish and New Projects

During the first 5-year plan years, numerous projects were established in the realm of fishing. However, their productive capacities are being operated in an extremely low manner which leads to fluctuations in the volume of fish output and a deficiency in implementation of plan objectives. The reason for this may be attributed to negative features in the way of the organization of work in the fishing fleet, maintenance and operating problems, and so forth.

The 1981-85 plan aims at increasing fishing capacity to fulfil citizens' needs and increase the volume of fish exported. It will seek to develop the state sector in a greater form, so that its share may rise from 15 to 57 percent of total output, which is expected to reach more than 225,000 tons by the end of the plan. The conference considers that implementation of the goals in this field will basically depend on the adoption of a number of measures, such as the regulation of work, promulgation of schedules and monthly and daily plans, the granting of incentives for the activity of fishermen in the cooperatives, and other measures.

Housing and Construction

The conference noted a perceptible growth in the high volume of building and construction activities during the first 5-year plan, which in the last year of the first 5-year plan increased by 318 percent over its 1973 level.The state sector contributed the equivalent of 84 percent to total production, although the results attained in construction capacity, as the conference sees it, remained below the tasks set out, which are constantly increasing, and did not keep abreast of progress in the technical material base of the domestic economy, and the social and cultural construction of the society.

The reasons for this are many. Among them is the newness and backward state of the construction organizations, the low level of use of construction machinery and equipment, the low level of work organization, deficiencies in the activity of local construction organizations, and so forth.

In the light of these conclusions, in order to eliminate negative features, the coming plan aims at concentrating on the most important projects, adopting measures to develop the construction management system, providing the necessary machinery and equipment, and introducing different forms into construction. The volume of construction and installations will total about 210 million dinars, or double their level in the first 5-year plan. An effort will also be made to develop the role of the state sector, and more than 8 million dinars will be allotted to developing the productive base of the public construction organizations, which will lead to a doubling of their productive capacity.

Transport and Communications: Great Development

The conference interventions in the discussion of the coming plan described the great development which occurred in all branches of land, sea and air transport, postal service and telecommunications during the years of the first 5-year plan and the first 2 years of the second 5-year plan, 1979 and 1980. The interventions also showed an increase of 300 percent in the length of paved roads and a rise in the number of passengers and cargoes shipped by land, sea and air, although steamship transport still is deficient; the same could be said of development in the realm of domestic and foreign communications.

The coming plan will witness rapid development in all branches of transport and communications. An increase of approximately 3.8 percent in the volume of transport and communications output will be created through implementation of the plan during the plan period, as compared with the level anticipated in 1980.

Domestic and Foreign Trade

The conference discussions on foreign trade development stated that there has been a development in trade with the outer world in past years, although this development, as people at the conference view it, increased the country's economic development's reliance on sources of foreign financing, and not the contrary, since the measures adopted to develop the volume of exports did not yield the expected results. The volume of imports continued to increase at high rates while exports accounted for just 9.8 percent of total trade in 1980, as compared with 10.9 percent in 1975. This resulted in bringing the volume of the balance of payments deficit to 134.7 million dinars in 1979.

The coming plan is aimed at meeting the greatest possible amount of the country's import requirements. It is expected that the volume of trade will increase 45 percent in 1985.

In the light of the plan, rapid measures will be taken to improve work in the port of Aden and increase the port's efficiency and activity in coming years so that it can keep abreast of increasing foreign trade activity.

In the context of domestic trade, in the context of the goal of meeting citizens' needs, the conference noted an increase of 90.5 percent in the volume of commodity dealings in retail trade in the 1975-80 period. This totalled 193.6 million dinars, for a per capita share of 101.17 dinars, in 1980.

The anticipated increase in the material production sectors during the plan will respond to an important part of the citizens' needs.

The future plan is aimed at increasing the volume of retail trade commodity transactions by 51 percent and it is anticipated that local goods' share /will increase/ by 38 percent. According to the plan, per capita consumption of fish, meat, dairy, poultry and other products will rise and the marketing of shirts, shoes, detergents and so forth will increase.

Social Development and Radical Transformations

The exceptional conference's discussions of the first 5-year plan underlined the occurrence of radical transformations and positive changes in the field of education, health, culture, radio, broadcasting and the press as well as in the fields of tourism, housing construction and municipalities. In the field of general education, the number of students totalled 250,000 in 1980 and they were enrolled in 929 unified schools.

The coming 5-year plan is aimed at expanding the base of democracy in education and at working to propagate education. The number of students in the schools will rise by 56 percent.

During the coming period the anti-illiteracy and adult education program will continue and attention will be given to raising the level of the productive forces.

In the field of public health, health institutions developed during the previous plan, since the number of beds in hospitals and health centers came to about 3,000 in 1980; the share of every 10,000 citizens totalled 15.5 beds as compared with 12.8 beds in 1975.

The coming plan will strive to continue developing health services and raising the health level in the country. Construction of new hospitals with a total capacity of 1,100 beds will take place, along with nine health centers whose total capacity will come to 320 beds and the construction of 51 primary health care centers and other services related to health guidance and indoctrination and so forth. The culture and tourism sector also experienced a perceptible development, in an increase in the number of cultural centers, exhibit halls, movie houses and hotels; in this sphere the 5-year plan will seek to develop and complete five centers in the various governorates of the republic. The plan also aims at building and constructing two hotels in Hadramawt, Aden, and so forth.

In the field of radio, television and publishing, the coming plan aims at building a new radio transmission station with a capacity of 750 kilowatts. In the field of television it also aims at starting color television transmission and boosting television transmission. In the area of publishing and printing, the central press project will be carried out. The coming plan will continue the efforts the first plan began in the construction of residential apartments for citizens. In accordance with this plan, 5,580 residential apartments will be built to respond to increasing housing requirements and special attention will be given to consolidating the role of the municipalities and public utilities in the main towns, striving to develop athletic fields, and making the necessary preparations for constructing a central sports stadium in the Governorate of Aden.

Have Investment Allocations Realized Their Goals?

The conference noted the faltering and fragmentary nature of investment allocations in the first 5-year plan. This resulted in an increase in plan costs, delayed implementation in the schedules of other projects, the appearance of concomitant negative features such as the lack or deficiency of detailed operating schedules, low competence in organizing work and administration, and so forth. Through a comprehensive evaluation of the previous plan and the plan of the past 2 years, indicators were set forth with respect to investment allocations for the modified second 5-year plan, proceeding from the performance of all necessary calculations to guarantee effective investment.

Total estimated volume of investment allocations in the plan years 1981-85 will come to about 425.6 million dinars, an increase of 118 percent in comparison with the previous 5-year plan.

The conference considers that implementation of the investment plan will require administrative development, improvement in the performance of units, an increase in the level of concern, implantation of health rules, pursuit of orderly methods in work organization, continuous provision of incentives for productive persons, and other means to guarantee development of production.

Investment allocations for the 1981-85 plan:

Industry, 32 percent.

Agriculture, 14 percent.

Fish, 8 percent.

Building and construction, 13 percent.

Transport and communications, 17 percent.

Services, 17 percent.

Financial Resource Development

In its discussion of the coming plan, the conference considers that the issue of expanding local financial resources occupies a high degree of importance in the current stage of development in responding to increasing investment allocation requirements, especially in the sphere of material production.

In the first plan years, 231 million dinars were allotted to the development budget. Of that, actual spending by the end of the plan came to 196 million dinars, and the bulk of this amount, or 78.4 percent, was from foreign sources. In 1979, 62.7 million dinars were allocated to the development budget, of which 47.3 million were from foreign sources.

The coming plan aims at bringing local financial resources up to 30 percent of the total, which will come to about 425.6 million dinars; local resources' share will come to about 128 million dinars, and the remainder will be covered by foreign resources. Estimates of development resources are as follows:

Local resources	128 million dinars	30 percent
Bank loans	26	6
Foreign sources (labor and staffs)	297.6	70
Government sources	84	19.6
Self-financing	18	4.4
Total	425.6	100

During the first 5-year plan, as the conference vouched, important steps were taken to employ workers, who came to 79,000 persons. However, this figure is to be considered minor in comparison with the workforce which does not contribute to the productive process, since the volume of human resources came to about 856,000 people in 1980.

The conference also noted the obvious disruptions in the system of payment of wages, the lack of connection between production and wages and the failure to make optimum use of manpower. Therefore the coming 5-year plan is considered to possess a great degree of importance since its major task is considered to be the optimum employment of manpower and a constant rise in output. The plan aims at increasing the number of people employed in the domestic economy by about 88,000 persons, of whom 86,000 will be in productive fields; thus the ratio of employed people to the population will reach about 60 percent. In this context, the coming plan aims at raising the productive level of labor in industry by about 25 percent, in agriculture by 25 percent, in fishing by at least 47 percent, in building and construction by 43 percent, and in transport and communications by 33 percent. The ingredients for achieving these results, as the conference views them, are numerous, including:

Raising the efficiency and quality of work.

Strengthening a positive attitude toward work.

Developing training.

Regional Development

The main tendencies in the years 1981-85 embrace the development of organizations and facilities in accordance with the circumstances and particular conditions of each governorate, along with the effort to increase the integration among productive branches in the framework of the governorates and the domestic economy.

The indicators of regional economic development rely on the general bases and principles which guide the domestic economy. On this basis, it is necessary seriously to strive to strengthen economic relations among governorates in order to increase the effectiveness of the regional division of labor and increase each governorate's share in resolving the important tasks of the state and assuming part of its duties.

Achieving these tasks will require increasing the role of party and economic agencies and local administration agencies and determining officials and tasks which will have productive activity and plan tasks carried out by productive organizations and facilities.

Our party's exceptional conference, which discusses the main tendencies and indicators of the amended second 5-year economic and social development plan for the years 1981-85, considers:

That the main task before it is represented by serious unremitting activity to turn this plan into an important progressive step in the economic and social development of the country.

That conscious discipline and a deep understanding of the importance of the plan and dealing with it as a fixed program of the party and a law which must be carried out and applied creatively by all ministries, authorities and organizations are important, and that holding people to account in implementing this noble goal to guarantee the necessary conditions for subsequent development is important.

That one should strive for an increased leadership role for the party in economic life on all levels.

That the growing role which the working class and its allies the peasants, fishermen and other working people play in our country is important in the course of the daily persistent struggle to build a national economy on firm foundations.

That improving material and spiritual life depends not only on resources which can be provided by the state but also on the level of people's performance of the jobs and duties assigned to them.

'KYODO' FEATURE ON SOUTH YEMEN CITES SOVIET ENVOY ON USSR PRESENCE

OW010141 Tokyo KYODO in English 0030 GMT 1 Nov 80

["Akira Tani, KYODO correspondent based in Cairo, visited the Yemen People's Democratic Republic (South Yemen). It is extremely rare for journalists from free world nations to be allowed to enter the country, which has been in very friendly relations with the Soviet Union. Following is what he reported from Aden.--Ed."--KYODO introduction]

[Text] Aden Nov 1 KYODO--The Port of Aden is situated at the southern-most tip of the Arabian Peninsula, near the point where the Red Sea meets the Indian Ocean. It watches over a waterway which is used extensively for east-west trade, and is therefore a strategically important spot.

As the airplane from Kuwait decreased its speed in preparation for the landing, the Port of Aden was clearly visible before a backdrop of rocky mountains. A dozen cargo vessels were in the docks, as well as a grey Soviet warship, with a dark black submarine alongside.

There is just one political party in control of the country, the Yemen Socialist Party, which opened a major congress in mid-September. At this, the second five-year economic development plan was formulated, and the cabinet was reshuffled.

Also at this congress the government of President 'Ali Nasir Muhammad [al-Hasani], who replaced Abdul Fatah Ismail in April, was considerably strengthened.

A diplomat commented that in the past six months the people appear to have become happier, this would seem to be because they have been freed from the tight ideological constraints of the Ismail administration, and now are full of hope for the economic policies of the current rulers.

The Muhammad government is attaching great importance to restoration of friendly relations with neighboring Arab countries.

Also, as one of the poorer Arab countries, with no oil resources, it is promoting an economic development plan which pledges friendship with the Soviet Union and other socialist nations, but which also calls for economic cooperation from Western countries. South Yemen is now taking a modern, flexible approach.

In October last year South Yemen and the Soviet Union signed a 20-year friendship treaty, strengthening relations between the two countries. South Yemen has thus now become the most important strategic base in the Indian Ocean for the Soviets.

But if we look around Aden, the Soviet presence seems to be rather minor. It is rare to see uniformed Soviet military personnel in the city.

Apart from the Soviet warship--a maintenance vessel--and the submarine, there are no signs in the city of onshore or offshore military facilities.

At Aden airport only a dozen or so Soviet aeroflot and cargo airplanes were lined up.

Soviet military authorities emphasize that they do not have a military base in the country, and that they use only South Yemen's own facilities.

According to a Japanese man engaged in the fishing industry in South Yemen, Soviet nuclear-powered submarines can sometimes be seen in the harbor, while warships of the 6,000-ton class are also occasionally repaired at a floating dock outside the port.

In addition, around the island of Socotra, in the Gulf of Aden, Soviet warships issue strong warnings to Japanese squid fishermen not to approach the island. It seems that Socotra has become a Soviet base.

According to travelers in the country, Cuba and other eastern bloc countries have sent soldiers to South Yemen, and they have established camps around the mountains in the north. And an extensive air force base is said to exist in the desert in the west of the country. But it was impossible to confirm these reports.

Advisors from the USSR and from East Europe occupy important posts in various government ministries and agencies, and there is no doubt that South Yemen is a member of the Soviet bloc.

On the other hand, many ordinary citizens expressed strong anti-Soviet sentiments. A taxi-drive commented: "I hate the Soviets. Things were much better when we were a British colony."

The main problem facing the country now is how to escape from poverty.

South Yemen became independent in 1967. In the same year the Middle East war led to the closing of the Suez Canal, and a flight of foreign capital and technology from the region. This caused severe and unique economic problems to the country, from which she has still not fully recovered.

In the main streets of Aden, half the shops are closed, with their shutters down. There is no sign of the city's previous prosperity.

British petroleum used to operate oil refining facilities here capable of handling 8,600,000 tons of crude oil per year. But these were nationalized in 1977, and now only about one-quarter of that amount is refined here each year.

The average annual income is dollar 320. It is less than half that of Egypt, which is also a poor country. South Yemen is 100 times poorer than some of the rich oil-producing states.

The second five-year plan calls for total investments of dollar 1,270 million, but surely it is going to be a problem to find such an amount of money.

So far Japan has contributed economic aid worth yen 985 million (dollar 4.7 million), mainly for the fishing industry and for the purchase of foodstuffs. This is more than what has been offered by any other free world country.

About 75 percent of the country's exports are made up of fish, largely squid and shrimps, worth dollar 12 million per year. Most of it comes to Japan, which developed the seas around South Yemen. And for a number of years Japan has been the country's main trading partner.

At the end of an interview with this correspondent, President Muhammad emphasized that South Yemen attached great importance to its economic cooperation with Japan.

However, the Soviet ambassador in Aden expressed the view that the USSR was not capable of providing sufficient resources to ensure the economic expansion of the country, and thus the Soviet Union would not try to block Japan or Western countries which wished to become involved.

The ambassador also said that Western countries criticized the USSR for establishing a military base in South Yemen, but America has 400 bases around the world.

INDUSTRIAL PROJECTS TO RELY ON LOCAL RAW MATERIALS

Aden 14 OCTOBER in Arabic 14 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] Comrade 'Abd al-Ghani 'Abd al-Qadir, member of the central committee and minister of industry, announced that the revised industrial 5-year plan, which will begin in 1981, will concentrate on new industrial projects which will depend on local raw materials. These projects include [new] plants for the production of building materials, such as cement and marble, and the modernization of the weaving and textile industries.

In a radio interview yesterday, 'Abd al-Qadir said that it is intended to develop consumer industries, such as mechanized bakeries and tricot mills, and produce new products at existing plants such as the al-Jundi Plastic Factory.

'Abd al-Qadir announced that projects provided for in the revised 5-year plan include: Expanding industry outside the governorate of Aden and establishing industries in rural governorates; and providing the essential requirements of industry, such as electricity, water, roads and other services. Regarding electricity projects included in the plan, 'Abd al-Qadir said that several of these projects will be implemented during the second 5-year plan, including: Completion of the Hadramaut Valley electric station; installation of an electric station in Abin, where work will begin within the next few weeks; implementation of the Mansurah station project; and construction of the thermo-electric station in al-Haswah. 'Abd al-Qadir pointed out that the plan includes conducting intensive surveys and preparing geological and hydrological maps of all regions of the republic to identify the possible availability of minerals.

In relation to petroleum, 'Abd al-Qadir said that a survey of two-thirds of the area covered by the plan will be (initiated soon?). This will be followed by the drilling stage.

As for the Aden petroleum refinery, 'Abd al-Qadir pointed out that the plan provides for its development to keep pace with modern refining operations.

The two sides decided to continue, through active Soviet technical assistance, the development of industry, energy, agriculture, fish farming and the exploitation of natural resources in the PDRY. USSR-PDRY protocols were signed in this regard. In a statement to the Tass agency correspondent, brother Faraj Ghanim, minister of planning and chairman of the joint committee, said that "our people rate highly PDRY cooperation with the USSR, which is based on socialist economic guidelines directed in the first degree, at raising the workers' standard of living. Faraj Ghanim emphasized that the main emphasis in the working relations between the two countries is on agriculture and fish resources, on which Soviet and Yemeni experts are concentrating their efforts. ACHIEVEMENTS IN NATION'S INDEPENDENCE PERIOD CITED

Doha /sic/ AL-MAWAQIF in Arabic 1 Sep 80 pp 8-12

/Article: "On the Anniversary of Qatar's Independence: 9 Years of Achievements--Firm Bases for Cultural Takeoff"/

/Text/ A person visiting Doha now will feel that everything there has changed. Since 3 September 1971, Independence Day, Doha has been experiencing a comprehensive resurgence, proceeding firmly, forcefully and with determination toward vast horizons of progress and great hopes of building a modern state. Its struggle is not ceasing and its combat is not flagging, because its aspirations do not end and its dreams have no boundaries.

Therefore a person visiting Doha this year will find a different Doha from the one he saw last year or the year before. Life in Doha is changing rapidly. It is without a doubt changing for the better. These have not been my observations alone, after every visit to Doha, but it is the observation of everyone who visits Doha.

The Movement of Life Progresses forward

Over the period of 9 years which started on 3 September 1971--the life span of this young country--the movement of life has been progressing forward under the leadership of His Highness Shaykh Khalifah ibn Hamad al-Thani, the lofty emir of the state of Qatar, who has provided the state of Qatar with all the wherewithal for welfare and strength and has caused it, in a few years, to take its distinguished place as the beacon of comprehensive progress, development and resurgence in all political, economic, industrial, cultural and other vital spheres which have made the whole world look toward the country's steps and achievements with further appreciation and interest.

It was natural that the state of Qatar, following its independence, should set forth on a difficult road in a race with time, with a great goal and dreams that do not recognize the impossible, modernizing life in all sections of the country while preserving the values and legacy of its forefathers, which requires redoubled efforts and a firm conscious grounding.

Therefore, the flow of life has begun to surge on every spot of land in Qatar. The country has begun to make its way on carefully studied foundations in all spheres in order to prepare the Qatari people and give them every opportunity for knowledge, life and success. National industries have arisen, investment and trade have been encouraged, and all powers have been exerted to expand its farmed area and develop its fish resources. It set its eyes on the need to place all the potential of its oil resources at the service of optimum development in the country, out of awareness that attainment of the higher goals and achievement of the requisite development must rely on an ambitious plan based on diversification of income sources and the best use of the materials in our good land, so that the great, genuine culture of these people may endure.

The Ambitious Plan and the Course of Development

The leader of the move forward has on more than one occasion expressed the state of Qatar's ambitious plan and the blessed course of development which hopes for the people's welfare, giving people everything that will cause their innovative and productive powers to grow, stating:

"We in Qatar are in a race with time, to develop the resurgence of the country on the various industrial, economic, developmental and cultural levels. We want to build a strong industrial base which will gradually reduce our dependence on oil revenues. Our ambition is to build an industrial society in Qatar so that alternative resources to income from oil may be realized. We also consider the coming generations to be our bond and we will spare no effort to achieve this, although we insist that our economy be firm, in order that we may develop our country on solid foundations. From this premise, in this context, we are moving and our confidence is great that almighty God will crown our efforts with success in the service of this Arab country. I consider that what is being achieved, although great, is the accomplishment of one stage in a country like Qatar which does not believe that reforms and accomplishments have an end."

While economic power is an important pillar of the strength of the state, human power is the basic support on whose shoulders all the development and progress we dream of rise up.

Therefore all the accomplishments and reforms we see today in Qatar are aimed first and last at creating Qatari man, who will participate in forging the civilization of a bright tomorrow with all the movement, consciousness, bounties and lofty principles he has achieved.

Firm Bases for a Cultural Takeoff

For the sake of cultural takeoff in various areas of life in the near and distant future, the state of Qatar has been anxious, in building its youth--the material of its future and its real resource--to realize firm bases, among the most important of which are:

Absolutely free education in all stages, domestically and abroad, up to the highest educational degrees, in accordance with the abilities and powers of each student.

Equal opportunities for all the people of Qatar.

Continuous expansion in education, horizontally and vertically, to embrace all stages of it.

Permanent and constant raising of teachers' levels in terms of accreditation and preparation, with the cooperation of the University of Qatar.

Qatarization of leadership positions in the field of education and preparation and accreditation of young people for this role.

Constant development of books, curricula, and educational materials.

Developing school buildings to meet educational demands.

Preparation of female Qatari teachers to teach small children because of their knowledge of the nature of the environment and traditions and ease in talking to children.

Constant development of anti-illiteracy and adult education programs.

Formation of committees to set forth the educational policy of the state of Qatar and promulgate an educational development strategy.

This year the state of Qatar has allocated a most massive budget to education, totalling 769,424,000 Qatari riyals. Therein lies the best proof of the real nature of the continuing support for education in this young state, which is concerned with educating its people and their dependents.

The number of students in the primary, preparatory and secondary stages in 1979-80 came to 38,010, an increase of 2,350 over the previous year. The number of persons enrolled in anti-illiteracy schools came to 6,055, including 1,580 females. Private schools have been regulated by law.

The number of people sent abroad for university studies came to 2,422 male and female students in the same academic year, and their financial allotments were increased by 20 percent. The increase came to the same percentage for students coming to study in Qatar. At the same time, an amendment was issued on allowances for books, schools, references, and holidays for higher studies in keeping with the requirements of the constant increase in the worldwide cost of living.

This year the University of Qatar accommodated 1,210 male and female students, while 1,212 male and female studies enrolled in Arab, European and American universities, studying the various fields of specialization the country needs.

The number of people sent on scholarship for higher studies to receive a master's or doctor's degree came to 102 male and female students.

Six hundred thirteen male and female students have graduated on foreign scholarship, including 112 Qatari girls, among whom 23 have received master's or doctor's degrees.

Since its birth in 1973, the University of Qatar has been performing its constructive role of achieving an advanced educational level.

In addition, the University of Qatar has graduated numerous classes of Qataris who have assumed responsibilities in the country of performing constructive roles in the service of their nation.

This year, specifically, it supplied the greatest number of graduates; the number of graduates in the fourth class came to 328 male and female students in various fields of specialization, an increase of 30 percent over the previous year.

In 1982 the university will move to its new location after completion of its buildings, which have been designed in accordance with the most modern systems and educational and social resources.

The Role of the Young and Youth Care in All Fields

Emphasizing the role of the young, and care for them in all fields, including the sporting field, His Highness the Emir of Qatar has issued a decree establishing the Higher Youth Care Council and has assigned the chairmanship of the council to his crown prince, His Highness Shaykh Hamad ibn Khalifah al-Thani. He has assumed the responsibilities of caring for the young, the hope of the present and the treasure of the future.

Before the council assumed its tasks, his highness the emir of the state ordered the construction of a sports city considered the first of its kind in the region; that is al-Khalifah Sports City, which contains a sporting stadium which can accommodate about 40,000 spectators. Its playing field witnessed the Fourth Gulf Soccer Championship Series in 1976. In addition, there is an enclosed auditorium and a model swimming pool and work is now underway to construct modern buildings for clubs which will be built in accordance with the most modern international specifications.

In order to organize and guide youth activities and aspirations, the olympic committee and sporting federations for various sports have been formed.

The Most Important Pillar for Diversifying Sources of Income

It was natural that the state should realize that industrialization is the most important pillar for diversifying sources of income. Therefore it was necessary to use oil revenues and natural gas resources to build light and heavy industries.

Since oil has constituted a basic buttress of this country's income, this vital sector has enjoyed the utmost attention. Among the most prominent features of this attention was the historic decree which His Highness the Emir of the State of Qatar announced, calling for total national dominance over the country's two natural resources, oil and gas. This attention also manifested itself in the establishment of the Qatar General Petroleum Organization and its subsidiary companies, which performs all activities related to the production, processing, marketing and storage of oil.

Now that the state of Qatar has attained complete dominance over its natural resources and complete ownership of revenues from these resources, it has begun earnestly to act to develop and expand industries based on oil and gas. At the present time oil policy in the country has been aimed at preserving its rate of production, which comes to about half a million barrels a day aside from gas production, out of concern to preserve the production level and guide consumption. The state of Qatar has also joined the vanguard of countries which are playing a prominent part in the area of oil industries within the Organization of Petroleum

Exporting Countries (OPEC) and the Organization of Arab Petroleum Exporting Countries (OAPEC), for the sake of a better life for their peoples and the peoples of the developing countries, and also in order to bear responsibility toward the stability of the economies of all the peoples of the world.

A glance at the industries now existing in the state of Qatar will cause us to realize the extent of the efforts which were made in past years.

Iron and Steel

The iron and steel factory which was opened in 1978 achieved record production figures last year. The plant's output, at startup, was 133,000 tons of iron rods; that rose to 379,780 tons in 1979, an increase of 42,780 tons /sic/.

Fertilizer Industry

The first fertilizer plant began production in 1974 and cost 360 million Qatari riyals. As a result of the increasing demand for its output in world markets, which totalled 900 tons of ammonia and 1,000 tons of urea per day, it was decided to construct a new plant of two units, and that was opened in June 1979, raising production to 497,158 tons of urea fertilizer and 371,000 tons of ammonia.

The Oil Refinery

In 1982 work will end on the project of the third oil refinery, whose productive capacity will come to 50,000 barrels per day, covering local consumption requirements up to 1995. Its costs total about 800 million Qatari riyals. Entering into the scope of these costs is the asphalt plant which will be attached to this refinery.

One should bear in mind that the second refinery, which was constructed in 1974, began with a productive capacity of 6,200 barrels per day and its production rose to about 10,000 barrels per day in 1977.

The first refinery, which was built in Umm Sa'id in 1953, operates at a capacity of 600 barrels of kerosene, gasoline and diesel fuel a day.

Cement Plant Production

Production increased noticeably in the three current furnaces of the cement plant, and the production of the Qatar National Cement Manufacturing Company last year totalled 237,000 tons of ordinary and reinforced cement, an increase of 20,000 tons over the preceding year.

Petrochemicals and World Markets

The petrochemical industry is considered one of the fruits of joint cooperation between the state of Qatar and France. Steps to carry out this cooperation began in the wake of the visit by His Highness Shaykh Khalifah ibn Hamad al-Thani, the Emir of Qatar, to France in 1975. This mutual cooperation resulted in the inauguration of the first stage of the petrochemical plant in the city of Dunkirk, France in May 1979. Costs of the first stage of this plant came to 1.45 billion francs; the plant's output in this stage came to 225,000 tons of ethylene and 140,000 tons of polyethylene per year. In the second stage its production came to 450,000 tons of ethylene and 280,000 tons of polyethylene.

At the end of this year, the petrochemical complex will be inaugurated in the industrial zone of the town of Umm Sa'id, producing 280,000 metric tons of ethylene and 140,000 tons of polyethylene per year. The complex will also produce 50,000 metric tons of sulphur per year. Its costs came to 2.5 billion Qatari riyals and it lay within the scope of heavy industries.

Natural Gas Liquefaction

The liquefied natural gas project, considered the biggest industrial project in Qatar, will be inaugurated this year. It consists of two integrated units, one to liquefy gas from the onshore fields, the other to liquefy offshore gas, the Qatar General Petroleum Organization has supervised the construction of this project, work on which took 5 years at costs of 1.7 billion Qatari riyals.

Medium and Light Industries

Among the medium and light industries whose birth we have witnessed in the state of Qatar in recent years are the organic fertilizer plant, which began production in 1977 under the supervision of the Ministry of Municipal Affairs, grain mills, the plastic sheet plant, and other industries which the government supports--indeed whose establishment it plans, so that the public sector may benefit from the economic studies carried out by the Technical Center for Industrial Development on the establishment of 18 medium and light industries in the country in addition to the major facilities it offers to anyone who assumes the onus of establishing any of these projects.

Stimulating Commercial Activity Domestically and Abroad

In the sphere of stimulating commercial activity domestically and abroad, the state of Qatar is preparing suitable conditions by establishing such vital facilities as the Qatar Monetary Authority, which carries out the monetary policy of the state and conducts oversight on banks, as well as devoting attention to the application of organized measures for the commercial activity of all commercial organizations and firms through the Commercial Registry Department of the Ministry of Economy and Trade, with the objective of bringing this economic activity to a level which is in keeping with the country's economic and social development.

Agriculture and the Hopes Founded on Its Development

While industry and trade are the nominal goal of development, agriculture, and the hopes founded on its development, have caused the state of Qatar to devote great attention to increasing the area farmed, especially since the area farmed in the country totals about 7,000 hectares, while the land suitable for farming totals 28,000 hectares.

Therefore, efforts are being directed to establishing experimental farms to study and improve agricultural production, increase sources of fresh water and lay irrigation systems. More than 1,600 wells have been drilled in numerous areas of the country and water research has been carried out on more than 466 farms to estimate the volumes of water used by 700 wells each year.

In the fields of scientific research, we see substantial efforts; necessary experiments are going on under the supervision of specialized experts to confirm seed types before delivering them to farmers.

The state of Qatar is interested in productive farming in the two government test farms in the north, which produce vegetables. It is also interested in planting forest trees, adding new types of vegetables, employing modern mechanization to overcome the manpower problem and studying the best ways to establish agricultural projects in greenhouses which are resistant to circumstances of the environment and climatic factors.

In the area of livestock production, a start has been made through livestock growers by providing them with the necessary fodder and animals with abundant productive capacity. There are a number of projects, including the use of pastoral shrubs and little trees suitable to the environment and climate in Qatar and the establishment of a farm for milk cows accommodating 300 cows yielding production of about 1,000 tons of fresh milk per year, with a dairy plant attached to it.

Preliminary tests which were made in the test farm at Wadi al-'Arin in the southwest of the country confirm that this area is fit for the potential production of livestock fodder such as Berseem, fine corn, pastoral grasses, and so forth.

Qatar is developing and expanding the sheep farm in Abu Samra, increasing the number of the sheep by about 1,000 head, increasing the area planted with green fodder and drilling three new wells. The number of sheep provided for rearing in the farm has risen to 3,500 head; in the future this will come to 13,000 head, which is the farm's maximum output. The farm's output was offered for sale for the first time in 1979. This year lambs from the farm's production were offered for sale.

The Qatar General Poultry Organization is preparing a study to raise its productive capacity to 25 million eggs and 2.5 million chicks a year. It now produces 10 million eggs and 1 million chicks per year and will cover local market requirements for eggs and chicken in full in the future.

In the field of animal health, the plan of the Ministry of Industry and Agriculture of the state of Qatar is based on establishing three veterinary hospitals, in the north, center and south, each of which will be equipped with a treatment and surgery unit to provide all necessary services to protect livestock.

The state of Qatar devotes exceptional attention to the development of fish resources, providing them with all the means of modern science which will enable them to increase production and raise the capability of fishing equipment.

It has decided to establish a new joint-stock fishing company which will provide resources for fishing by the most modern methods. The Qatar National Fishing Company property will be included in this company.

The Fisheries and Fish Department is also carrying out some repairs on two fish and shrimp catching vessels in the framework of plans aimed at increasing production and providing local market requirements. These two vessels, in addition to the existing ones, will be the nucleus of the joint stock company we mentioned, which will operate in the fishing field to achieve the desired objective.

Construction Activity Accompanies the Economic Upsurge

This economic upsurge in the state of Qatar has been accompanied by a construction activity which has enveloped the entire country. All Qatar has been transformed into an arena of incessant activity, buildings have risen, and roads have been built inside and outside the town. It has been only a few years since areas in the state of Qatar were linked by a road system, tourist hotels in the most modern architectural style were erected, the town of Doha came to resemble a capital where major businessmen, economists and visitors meet, and the most important conferences and symposiums began to be held there.

Social Services and a Better Life for the Citizen

For the sake of a better life for the Qatari citizen, social services are playing a prominent role in realizing all guarantees for the citizen.

Social care, improvements in the standard of living, and providing security for the citizen--all these goals and others are being achieved in a clear fashion in the society today.

For example, the state of Qatar is very concerned with providing sanitary housing for people with limited incomes. As a result of that concern, the country has started to include a number of expansive sections of ordinary housing which has been distributed to citizens in accordance with a well-drawn plan. Work is now underway on completion of construction on 1,000 ordinary dwellings in the ordinary housing project in the al-Dafnah area, and this year work is to be completed on the housing complex project in Umm Sa'id which comprises 220 apartments. It is also expected that construction will soon be completed on 60 ordinary houses in al-Jumayliyah.

These and other ordinary construction works are being completed at the same time as the state is distributing land to its senior officials and offering them all construction facilities such as loans and other services.

For the sake of the comfort of citizens, to provide all foodstuffs and consumer goods and to reduce the intensity of inflation, the state has been concerned with and has encouraged the cooperative system.

Health Care for Every Citizen in Qatar

The state of Qatar strives to provide health care for every citizen and resident in the country free of charge.

The health services project will be carried out in three stages by 1985. Health centers are being established in Doha and other towns. As we are aware, the Ministry of Health is now working to spread the health registration system among all citizens and is resolutely applying the law on pharmacy profession practices.

The Media in Qatar and Their Role in Keeping up with the Resurgence

The media in Qatar are playing their prominent part in keeping up with the comprehensive resurgence, proceeding from Islamic values and principles, by inspiration of the cultural mission which guides Qatar's future aspirations.

Radio Services

In the field of radio broadcasting, the new radio station's studio building will be furnished with the most modern equipment and accessories at a cost of 16,684,000 riyals. This project will be one of the most prominent landmarks of the plan to develop broadcasting services for listeners inside and outside Qatar.

The second stage of the al-Khisah transmission equipment will be inaugurated; this will cover the Gulf region, North Africa, the countries of the Levant and Europe.

Television Transmission

Qatar Television, which opened 6 years ago, managed to win the first prize for documentary films and the third prize for miscellaneous programs in the first festival of television programs in the Arab Gulf states held in Kuwait this year.

Qatar Television in the coming year will witness large expansions. Two new studios will be inaugurated, one for dramatic production, the other to serve programs on Channel Two, which will be devoted to educational, cultural and foreign programs.

Publications and Publishing

These play a vital role, with a responsibility for presenting the achievements of the state in all fields locally, internationally and in the Arab context. They are in charge of preparing studies and research, issuing books and publications, providing pictures and data, and strengthening relations with the press domestically and abroad.

A strong foundation has been laid for the press in the country through the issuance of the new publications and publishing law which, in its provisions, concentrates on giving a strong push in support of the local press, giving it every opportunity for freedom to perform its great responsibilities toward society, and regulating all subjects related to publications and publishing.

Qatar News Agency

This now has correspondents in most Arab countries and important European and Asian capitals and has centers in the major world capitals, and as a result of all this has become a reliable news source. Everyone who has dealt with the news in all media and press organizations in Arab and foreign countries has witnessed this.

Culture and the Arts

The Department of Culture and the Arts has contributed to developing cultural and artistic activity in the state of Qatar, encouraging Qatari talent and dramatic activity and inviting numerous men of ideas and letters during its cultural season. In addition it holds local popular festivals and prints books on cultural heritage and children's books on the occasion of the International Year of the Child.

Elevation of the Level of Tourism

In tourism and antiquities, the Department of Tourism and Antiquities of the state of Qatar is assuming the task of organizing and developing the cultural and historical heritage. It is making studies on tourism to raise the level of tourism and antiquities in the country and is exerting efforts to discover archaeological works which resulted recently in the discovery of works which go back to the fifth milennium BC and the discovery of the al-Huwaylah fortress.

The Department of Tourism and Antiquities has started implementing a project for a tourist club on the water, a project to erect sun shelters on the coast and a project to repair historic and archaeological buildings. It has published colored tourist brochure in the Arabic and English languages.

The Qatar National Museum has become a true picture of the deep-rooted past of Qatar and its prosperous present. It is the first center of its kind for the study of the history of Qatar and the Arab Gulf region.

Thus we see that the state of Qatar, as it celebrates its ninth year of independence, is celebrating great achievements in all fields and continuous aspirations toward a better future for the people of Qatar on their precious land.

COUNTRY EXPECTED TO EXPORT CEMENT BY 1982

Paris AN-NAHAR ARAB REPORT & MEMO in English 6 Oct 80 pp 8, 9

[Text]

A "cement crisis" in Syria lasting more than a decade will end next year and Syria will become an exporter of cement by the end of 1982, according to Aziz Khalifa, Director of the Syrian State Establishment for Cement Production. Mr Khalifa told the Damascus daily Tishrin recently that the turnaround from being a substantial importer of cement will take place when a new cement factory at Tartous comes on stream. The Tartous plant, with four production lines capable of producing more than 1 million tonnes a year, will be the largest cement factory in the Middle East, Mr Khalifa declared. "Despite unforeseen delays, the first and second production lines will become operative in the 6th and 10th months of 1981, while the other two lines will start production by the end of 1982 or the beginning of 1983," he told Tishrin.

In Aleppo, meanwhile, the new Sheikh Said cement plant is in the experimental run phase. It will start production this year with an annual capacity of about 1 million tonnes.

Thereafter, Mr Khalifa said, Syria's Five-Year Development Plan does not envisage building additional cement factories. When self-sufficiency in cement is reached, Mr Khalifa said, Syria will shift its emphasis to a complementary industry – brickmaking.

Syria's first cement plant was set up in 1930. The National Company for Cement Production in Dummar, Damascus started with a daily capacity of 880 tonnes and annual production level of 275,000 tonnes.

The National Company for Cement Production remained the only local supplier of cement until 1951 when the Old Sheikh Said cement plant in Aleppo started producing an annual average of 212,000 tonnes. In 1960 the old Muslmiya Plant started production of 117,000 tonnes per year, and in 1961 the Rustin Cement Plant in Homs became operative, supplying 115,000 tonnes annually.

In 1965-66 Syria's cement industry saw the coming on stream of two new plants: the Burg Islem plant in Latakiya with an annual capacity of 86,000 tonnes and the Hama Cement Plant with a capacity of 122,000 tonnes a year. Between 1966 and 1976 no cement plants were set up in Syria. Existing plants had to meet local requirements until 1968 when imports became inevitable. In all, Syria's six cement plants produced between 925,000 and 1 million tonnes per year.

Until the end of 1968 Syria's cement plants covered all local demand and achieved a surplus of between 22,000 and 60,000 tonnes a year. But consumption rose sharply when the Euphrates Dam Project was launched early in 1969 and as a result of the ambitious projects under the Third and Fourth Syrian Development Plants and a boom in domestic construction. In 1969 Syria started importing cement at an average rate of roughly 200,000 tonnes a year. Imports of cement rose to 350,000 tonnes in 1972 and 1 million tonnes in 1975. In 1979 Syria imported 1.5 million tonnes of cement. The phenomenal growth in cement imports created bottlenecks in its distribution. Delays in delivery owing to the inadequacy of cement unloading facilities at Syrian ports gave rise to black marketeering and chronic shortages.

Between 1958 and 1968 consumption of cement in Syria more than doubled from 375,000 tonnes in 1958 to 500,000 tonnes in 1960, 630,000 tonnes in 1965 and 900,000 tonnes in 1968. But this rapid growth in consumption could still be met with the gradual increase in capacities. In fact, surplus output continued to be exported until 1968 as production rose from 400,000 tonnes in 1958 to 600,000 tonnes in 1960; output was 650,000 tonnes in 1965 and reached 930,000 tonnes in 1968.

But Syria's cement consumption has been rising steadily since 1969. Growing from 900,000 tonnes in 1968 to 1 million tonnes in 1969, Syria's cement requirements increased three-fold between 1969 and 1979. Local production meanwhile was almost stationery between 900,000 tonnes and 1 million tonnes, until 1976-77, when factories at Aleppo and Muslimiya went on stream. These plants added 600,000 tonnes to Syria's annual output of cement, which reached 1.5 million tonnes by 1978. Between 1979 and 1980 a second cement plant at Muslimiya started production and the Adra Plant in Damascus became operative, thus raising Syria's cement output to 2.350 million tonnes this year (production was at 1.850 million in 1979). During the Fourth Economic Development Plan covering the period 1976-1980 Syria saw an increase in the production of cement that exceeded 900,000 tonnes.

Prospects for renewed self-sufficiency in cement production in Syria are therefore promising. Capacities will be supplemented by new plants covered by the Fourth Development Plan, but which for unknown reasons were delayed and are expected to come on stream as of 1983.

The growth in consumption of cement, however, rose by a larger increment during the Plan period. The shortage in supply amounted to 50 percent of consumption in 1976, when 1.1 million tonnes were imported. The gap fell to 39 percent of local consumption in 1977, and to 38 percent in 1979. This year imports are expected to reach 17 percent of local consumption as only 500,000 tonnes will be needed, although consumption this year is three times what it was in the early 1970s.

MZALI ADDRESSES COORDINATION COMMITTEES CONGRESS

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 20 Sep 80 pp 1, 4

[Address by Mohamed Mzali, prime minister and secretary general of the Destourien Socialist Party, and the Coordination Committees Congress: "We Must Consider Targets and Programs Rather Than Individuals"]

[Text] Yesterday Mohamed Mzali, prime minister and secretary general of the Destourien Socialist Party, closed the Coordination Committees Congress.

The meeting on this occasion was held at the Party House in the Kasbah. It was attended by the members of the government and the Political Bureau, by a large number of Destourien cadres, and by candidates for elections to the Coordination Committees bureaus.

In a speech delivered on this occasion, Mzali noted, first of all, that this meeting was within the framework of the renovation of the bureaus of the of the Coordination Committees. This meeting, held at the Party House itself, is the sendoff of these committees, the prime minister added, also noting that this was not the first time that this was being done, for renovation is a party tradition. Actually, it constitutes proof of its democracy.

Democracy is confirmed through such occasions which offer the Destouriens the possibility to engage in self-criticism, review their accomplishments and obstacles encountered, and communicate with one another frankly and, eventually, give their trust to a certain number of candidates.

Mohamed Mzali added the following: "Ever since it was founded in 1934, the party has supported the democracy which it has never considered exclusively as a target to be reached at the expense of the people. On the contrary, it has always been a method for action. That is why I am proud to be presiding over this meeting in the course of which I would like to share with you some remarks which, I hope, will benefit us in the project we will be undertaking in the immediate future.

First of all, I would like to emphasize that the Coordination Committees congresses are taking place at a time when a decision has been made to summon an extraordinary party congress. The purpose of the congress will be to examine the prospects for the next decade and the options, predictions, and orientations of the next plan. It will sum up past accomplishments and earmark the way for the next decade, the third decade since Tunisia gained its independence.

In order to accomplish this, we must bear this meeting in mind. In other words, we must be prepared for it since it will be very important in terms of the formulation of the next development plan.

In this context it would be preferable to think of targets and programs rather than of individuals, for the plans and programs determine the future of the people, whereas the individuals are in the service of the people.

Mohamed Mzali added the following:

We must formulate criteria governing the choice of the candidates. First of all, the candidate must be a true Destourien in the full authentic meaning of the term. By authenticity we mean loyalty to the party, its chairman, and its orientations. Starting with 1934 it is this authenticity that has made the Destourien a person dedicated to serving the general interest, placing the fatherland above all other considerations, inspired by the sacrifices of our martyrs and following the example of the many Tunisians who are continuing to make sacrifices for the sake of the freedom and invulnerability of Tunisia.

Therefore, the candidates to be chosen must be those who are the most willing to make greater sacrifices and display the greatest altruism and dedication, and look at questions and problems from the national rather than regional, local, sectarian, or individual viewpoint, or from the viewpoint of "simple allegiance." We must also choose those who are the closest to us, i.e., those whose hands and conscience are clean, for those who are candidates for leading others would lack the required competence and efficiency should their statement lack credibility and, therefore, would become the laughing stock of those around them.

Actually, individuals vary greatly. Some of them are selfish, concerned with their own interests only. They do not worry us excessively as long as they obey the law. There also are those who would like to serve others. We demand of them model behavior and to be more concerned with others than with themselves.

Furthermore, the party's secretary general went on to say, we must see to it that our choices meet two requirements: The first is to choose candidates who know how to exercise national responsibility and who are true Destouriens. The second is not to neglect the young people and the new energy. Every member and every participant in the Coordination Committees Congress must ask his conscience in making his choice between the old party members and the many new energetic people who aspire with a healthy spirit to the assumption of such responsibilities, the more so since 50 percent of the Tunisian population is under 20 years of age and that about 60 percent of all Tunisians were born after independence. Therefore, we must balance the generation of the fathers and mothers and that of the children.

Every congressman must decide according to his conscience. This is the only attitude which will enable him to make his choice without any pressure and to avoid any violation of his dignity.

In addition to such considerations, we must take into consideration national unity. President Bourguiba has always pointed out that the party is not a party of social category but the party of all Tunisians. It is thus that since 1934 the party has always been a front rallying within itself all social categories, all generations, and the representatives of all areas.

Mzali added: The voters must realize that the party belongs to all Tunisians, i.e., the intellectuals and the nonintellectuals, the workers, the unemployed, the industrialists, the people in the liberal professions, the men, and the women. That is why the bureau of the Coordination Committee had not included representatives of a single social category such as the employees, for example, while excluding all others.

It would be desirable that all socioprofessional categories be represented.

For many years we have asked the members to include all social categories and fight any monopoly. We should not fear in the least to open wide the party's doors so that every citizen may find his proper place, thus bringing fresh air into the party. As to those who fear the entry of new elements within the party, they are showing through such behavior a lack of trust and displaying their inability to project their beliefs, for the more they are trusted by the Destourien members the stronger and united the party becomes.

Therefore, we must involve the greatest possible number of citizens, and of people with competence and goodwill within the party.

The party's secretary general pointed out, within this context, that the list of candidates for bureaus of the Coordination Committees, numbering about 1,300, includes only a small percentage of those representing liberal professions, workers, small farmers, and women. The first duty of the Destourien is to draw the citizens toward the party which offers the ideal framework for action, dedication and sacrifice. Mzali invited the officials within the various party units to pay particular attention to workers employed in people's plants. They must volunteer to educate and guide them. They will thus block the path to anarchy so that it may not reach the people's enterprises and would protect the national economy from all obstructions. They must also dedicate their efforts and energy to draw such people into the party which offers broad areas of action in which the workers can apply their energy. The party also offers favorable grounds for the triumph of right, freedom and dignity and for concretizing the noble objectives which are the targets of all patriots who are sincere and loyal to the fatherland. Therefore, the young people could find within the party the ideal framework for achieving their ambitions and for contributing to the elimination of injustice and insuring greater justice, democracy and dignity.

In addition to the interest in the workers and their guidance and affiliation with the party, greater concern must be displayed for secondary and university students and for the development of an involved Tunisian student, i.e., open to the party, with faith in the greatness of the party's message, believing that the path he is following is the proper one for reaching the targets.

The party's secretary general went on to say the following: All of us must dedicate ourselves to these basic questions, ignoring rumors spread by troublemakers, rumors which could affect our wishes....

As Destouriens, we must also have faith in ourselves and be aware of the fact that the activities we are engaged in are political and that the political battle could be won or lost not through physical force but rather through moral strength and faith in ourselves....

The reason that Bourguiba was able to win the battle against the colonizer was that he believed in the legitimacy of his struggle. His victory was on the psychological rather than the material level....

Pursuing this train of ideas, Mzali added the following: We are aware of the challenges and difficulties we are facing. How to proceed in order to win the battle and strengthen the party so that it may be able to carry out its obligations? Through faith in ourselves and in the legitimacy of our fight, acquiring the capacity to convince our opponents, to resist and to work with dedication in our service to the fatherland and the people.

The prime minister then discussed the mission of the Coordination Committees. This mission rests on two basic functions. The first is the role which such committees must play in order to be the mirror reflecting the concerns and aspirations of the citizens. This requires that the Coordination Committees members be in permanent contact with the people in order to be better aware of their complaints, i.e., to be able to express most sincerely their concerns and ambitions.

Following this line of ideas, Mzali cautioned the leaders of the different party structures against the "bourgeoisification" which has affected a number of political parties throughout the world and whose repercussions create a distance between the party and the people and broaden the gap separating them.

On this subject, he called upon the Destourien leaders not to reject their popular roots but to maintain them, following the example of President Bourguiba, which is the best example of such an attachment.

The party's secretary general indicated that the dialogue we are demanding would be effective only if it is based on trust among partners, even though the latter might share different opinions. This should not prevent them from being loyal to the same fatherland and the same party through their membership.

Actually, the Supreme Fighter has always called upon the leaders to intensify their ties with the people and to be always in the service of the fatherland and of all citizens, whether Destouriens or not. The difference between these two categories of citizens is that the Destouriens have mobilized themselves to serve the fatherland and the people more than the others.

The purpose of the tie which must exist between the coordination committees and the people is to strengthen their links and to avoid anything which could alienate them and, on a collorary basis, weaken the party.

Therefore, what is essential is not the number of officials but their competence and their influence. This is the object of the controversy in the matter of quantity versus quality.

As far as we are concerned, we prefer a smaller number of members who would listen more to the people rather than a plethora of members cut off from the people. This means that, henceforth, we must focus our attention on this aspect of the problem.

The second function, therefore, is the fact that the party is responsible and that the Coordination Committees are, consequently, responsible and must work to strengthen a development awareness. This is a contribution to the success of our overall development programs.

The party has renovated its mission. Having achieved independence and dignity on the political level, it joined the struggle against underdevelopment and poverty. In this respect the Coordination Committees must act as effective instruments for overall development in all its aspects--spiritual, cultural, educational, social and economic. We must equally depict the type of Tunisian society we would like to build.

Considered from this viewpoint, development does not mean only the building of roads, bridges or schools, or toiling the soil. It becomes an activity aimed at promoting man on the psychological, moral and spiritual levels, for the aspirations of the Tunisian individual go beyond concerns for food, clothing and housing, encompassing other ambitions which he may be tempted to find in imported motion pictures, periodicals, or ideologies, should he fail to find them within the party. The type of overall development we desire is one which covers all aspects of the daily life and future of the individual. Therefore, satisfying material needs is not enough. We must also meet moral requirements.

Freedom, dignity and democracy are ways of life rather than simple aspects of daily living. They mean that one must know how to live, why to live, and what are the objectives of life? Even though the adults may be concerned by the material aspects of life, our children and our young people always remind us of such principles which must be always renovated and become our main concern. The party must attract rather than be attracted. It must lead rather than be led. The party must be in the vanguard and able to master the situation thanks to its moral force, providing that the Destourien member, whatever his level, can project his ideas, analyses and creative imagination. The party must be able to attract the young people and the workers, and to animate national life. Thus, thanks to the way the members project their convictions, it will be possible to eliminate the party's enemies and detractors without resorting to force. Indeed, when the Destourien member has the ability to project and persuade he can impose and promote his ideas and viewpoints. Such was the case with the Supreme Fighter when he took the floor at the party's constituent congress which was attended by the supporters of the old Destour. At that time the Supreme Fighter was merely an attorney with a frail constitution and of very modest means. Yet, he had won over the participants through his eloquence, the strength of his convictions and the clarity and timeliness of his ideas, thus gaining their support.

Those in charge of Coordination Committees must be deeply imbued with the national options and their targets. They must be sufficiently aware of the country's policy and the governmental programs in order to be able to argue in their favor and win over the trust of the others. This is a difficult task which requires a great deal of work, for belief must be tirelessly renovated. Like a teacher who cannot teach the same curriculum for many years using the same methods, the member must recycle himself. He must readapt his training through seminars and courses. We must take this into consideration in our programs and actions.

The second role of the Coordination Committees is to create "a development awareness" and be a link between the summit and the base, expressing to the summit the complaints of the base and informing the base of the facts, programs, and possibilities related to development, thus contributing to the political orientation of the base. The purpose of all this is for the committee to be trusted by all.

Mzali added that if the members of the Coordination Committee are chosen on the basis of such criteria and if the purpose of the committee, the essence of political action and the method used in the dialogue are taken into consideration, and if we work among all categories and all generations we will achieve democracy, i.e, the exercise of sovereignty by the people.

This means, on the level of the individuals, that they must have the feeling of being citizens exercising all their rights and implementing all their duties, choosing their own destinies and being fully aware of superior interests and existing possibilities. Should we reach this stage we would begin to exercise democracy without even being aware of it. Actually, this is democracy while anything else is merely a slogan. In the light of all this we have defined our attitudes toward university students, workers, and adverse foreign currents. Such currents existed long before independence and were represented by parties. Our party has always ignored them. It has not been subjected to their influence without, for this, losing the trust of the people's masses.

The prime minister added: I had told those who had asked my opinion on party pluralism that I must, first of all, focus my attention on my own party, strengthen its foundations and its credibility. Two conditions must be met for our party to remain strong, and to be renovated and regenerated. President Bourguiba himself defined them by stating that the party could be young and renovated only if it remains open to the growing generations and rallies within it the new energies, so that no one is left aside with a feeling of bitterness that the party is for the privileged only.

The second condition is that the party must be in the vanguard of ideas.

By this token the party will have combined the new ideas and new people dictated or even imposed by reality and by the specific circumstances of the end of the 20th century. In fact, the geographic environment, our choices, our plans, and the times in which we live, characterized by multiple contradictions, call for new ideas in politics as in economics, in the social and the cultural sector, and even in our ways of action.

Personally, I am convinced that our party is strong by virtue of its historical legitimacy and great popularity.

While addressing you today, I am thinking of the immediate and more disitant future since we must adopt an approach to it.

The reality of the youth, of the working people around us, the difficulties we are facing, the results obtained through the improvement of the cultural standard of our children and the thoughts coming from the outside lead me to state that, more than ever, we must adapt ourselves to our reality, examine our consciences, and formulate new consistent and flexible ideas. This does not mean ideas contrary to those we have had so far. We must also avoid hardening and rejection of everything new.

Those in charge must display sufficient flexibility in their thinking and openness of spirit to remain open to new ideas.

One day someone came to me to explain to me the reasons for which he had censored a play. He claimed that the text included a replica which stated, "Long live freedom." I was unable to conceal my astonishment to this reaction and I told my interlocutor: "Our entire lives have been an endless appeal for 'Long live freedom.' This applies to the party's life as well. Have you reached a point where you are fearing the slogan of 'Long live freedom' while our party is that of freedom? Let us all say, 'Long live freedom' without fearing anyone."

The statement of the Supreme Fighter, presented yesterday in the "presidential directives" broadcast on democracy should be engraved and displayed in the schools and Destourien cells. I am convinced that had such statements been made by anyone other than Bourguiba they would have been qualified as subversive. Such is Bourguiba's true democracy, for he states that democracy allows every individual to express his view without fanaticism or presumption and without refusing to hear the views of others.

Fanaticism and presumption trigger resentment and hatred. Therefore, we must remove the roots of this resentment and this hatred before irreparable consequences have taken place and before matters have worsened, establishing what President Bourguiba has described as serenity of heart and mind.

The prime minister went on to say the following:

Force must not be used in matters of persuasion. Arguments and ideas can be fought only with stronger and more profound ideas and arguments. Thus, Islam spread because it conquered the hearts. This was not achieved through the force of arms. In the same manner, the Bourguiba message was disseminated and conquered the hearts of the Tunisian people only through good words and persuasion. We must support the Bourguibian authenticity, aiming at convincing others through arguments. Actually, this is the essence of democracy. Politics is only a means for action and a set of methods for the implementation of ideas and the concretizing of objectives and lofty values. It is a means and not an end. We are not professional politicians. Bourguiba has taught us always to be in the service of the people, for in serving his country he was not seeking the power. Bearing in mind the logic according to which politics is a means for achieving objectives, we are using politics and the power to serve the people.

"We shall not sit on the shoulders of the people to assume a comfortable position in the seat of power," he has said.

The loyal and dedicated members must be in the service of the people. They must not use the people to earn their trust.

We remain firmly attached to an open policy. In our view, this implies a concensus concerning a method of action requiring that the interest of the nation prevail and a consideration of other opinions even though they may differ from ours. Furthermore, it implies respect for the law and morality.

We are giving our actions humanitarian dimensions. It is thus that we shall work to secure a job to all those who were laid off as a result of the 26 January events and, particularly, the young people in the interior of the country, particularly those with families to support. We are banishing hatred and resentment. Openness means tolerance and the softening of calloused hearts. Every individual must feel charitable toward his neighbor. Such is the ethic of our party.

I have great hopes that the proceedings of the congresses will develop normally and that this feverish rush to positions of responsibility will calm down. In our view, responsibility is an obligation rather than a distinction. I hope that the "spirit of sportsmanship" will prevail in the course of the elections and that even those who lose the elections will be good losers and not consider this failure a defeat. Therefore, there should be no envy toward those who will have been elected, for these elections are a competition in which there necessarily is a winner and a loser.

"This new mentality must prevail in the balloting," Mohamed Mzali concluded.

NEW SYSTEM DEVISED FOR CLEARING PAYMENTS AMONG ARAB STATES

Dubai AL-BAYAN in Arabic 11 Oct 80 p 2

/Article: "A New System for Settling Payments among Arab States"/

/Text/ Dr Labib Shuqayr, counsellor to the Arab Monetary Fund, announced that during the coming period the fund will prepare a working paper, with proposals and alternatives, on promulgating a system for settling payments among Arab countries.

He said that the working paper would be presented to representatives of Arab central banks for study prior to preparation of a final formula for the payments settlement system, which would be presented to the board of governors of the Arab Monetary Fund for approval.

Dr Labib Shuqayr pointed out that four international experts would come to the emirates in this context to set forth the draft of the proposed system for settling payments among Arab countries, by invitation of the fund.

He said that proceeding from the agreement on its establishment, whose fourth article stipulates that one of its basic tasks will be to settle current payments among member states in a manner strengthening the movement of trade among them, the fund has sent an invitation to these experts.

International Experts

These experts are Mr Triffin, who is one of the greatest modern economics scholars, backed the notion of a European monetary system, and is one of the most important people to participate in creating the European Payments Union.

He is also member of the International Economic Commission, which contains 30 of the most famous economics scholars in the world, and is a non-resident counsellor to the Arab Monetary Fund, the Saudi Arabian Monetary Authority and the Monetary Council of the Emirates.

The second expert represents the Bank of International Settlements, the bank in charge of the European Payments Union, which is considered tantamount to a central bank for central banks in the Western industrial countries.

The third expert is Dr Mukerjee, one of the most senior technicians in the International Monetary Fund and one of the biggest experts on the international monetary system.

The fourth expert is Dr Khayr-al-Din Hasibi of the Center of Arab Unity Studies, the independent organization which is provided with the most precise and thorough expertise on economic and political circumstances in the Arab countries and the special circumstances in each Arab country in isolation.

Strengthening of Trade

On the importance of preparing a system to settle payments among Arab countries, Dr Labib Shuqayr stated that the agreement establishing the fund calls for the allocation of adequate fund resources, paid in the currencies of member states, to furnish the necessary credit facilities for settling current payments among states in accordance with rules and statutes which the board of governors will approve, within the framework of a special account opened by the fund to this end, with the goal of strengthening the movement of trade among the Arab countries.

Restrictions on Current Payments

He stated that in 1979 the fund devoted special attention to studying the possibility of establishing a system to settle current payments among Arab countries, evaluating its probable effects on trade among Arab countries and reducing restrictions on current payments among member states.

In this sphere, the fund has made a study of efforts made in the framework of the Council of Economic Unity in the early seventies to establish an Arab payments union and evaluate the causes which led to the failure of the efforts exerted in this regard.

Studies of International Experiences

Dr Shuqayr added that the fund has also made a study of the historic and modern experiences of payments settlement systems, especially the system of payments settlement among developing countries. It was also concerned with studying the European payments Union, which had a major effect in freeing trade and current payments among European countries in the wake of World War Two.

He said that it is recognized that the effect of payments settlement systems on freeing trade and reducing restrictions on current payments is basically linked to the extent of opportunities they offer to countries participating in them to guide the use of their international reserves and lower the cost of the necessary financial transfers for paying commitments resulting from transactions among them.

Reducing Commercial Restrictions

It is also probable that multilateral payment arrangements within a group of countries will constitute an incentive to participating countries to reduce commercial restrictions among themselves, in view of the credit facilities they may contain, giving those countries an opportunity to finance the resulting imbalance in their regional payments without resorting to the imposition of restrictions on their commercial transactions with participating countries.

Dr Shuqayr concluded his statement by saying that it was also agreed that the clearing arrangements and payment settlement systems would not in themselves suffice to develop trade and commercial transactions among the participating countries, but are considered an auxiliary element in this field, if other conditions are present, especially the productive base for the goods and services the countries involved need.

'LE MONDE' CITES ALGIERS' 'IRRITATION' AT RUMOR OF MOROCCAN OVERTURES

LD301635 Paris LE MONDE in French 30 Oct 80 p 42

[Dispatch by D.J.: "Algiers Surprised at Rumors of Political Contacts With Rabat"]

[Text] Algiers--The rumors from Rabat reporting political contacts between Algeria and Morocco are being received with surprise and also some annoyance here. A Moroccan officer did visit Algiers 19 October, a reliable source confirmed, but he did not bring any message from President Chadli Bendjedid. His only mission was to convey the consignment of blankets and provisions sent by aircraft from Rabat for the Al-Asnam victims. According to informed circles Algeria had no reasons to refuse such a gift since it could be considered to be a disinterested one.

The rather loud political exploitation of this solidarity by Rabat is causing some irritation here. The fuss being made about "Moroccan initiatives" comes, it is stressed at a time when the West Sahara debate is opening in the UN Decolonization Committee. However, this is no coincidence. It is thought that King Hassan II wishes to appear to be a man of conciliation and dialogue. He also wants to make another attempt to win support for the idea that the Saharan affair amounts to a bilateral conflict between Algiers and Rabat. This idea has always been denied here, and there is no indication that this position has changed.

Algeria is still supporting the Saharans' struggle for self-determination as strongly as ever. If it is doing so with more discretion it is only because of the international recognition obtained by the POLISARIO. The Saharan Republic is now recognized by several dozen states, it has an absolute majority in its favor at the OAU and Algeria, whose arguments have thus won the day, has less need to "be seen in the front line." Algeria is still prepared, as it has always said it is, to help establish direct contacts and negotiations between the POLISARIO and Morocco and does not intend to take the Saharans' place. Furthermore the Saharans would not allow them to do so and they enjoy powerful backing from other quarters, as shown by the visit which a Saharan Democratic Arab Republic delegation is now making to Tripoli.

200 AFGHANS KILLED IN SOVIET BOMBING

Lahore THE PAKISTAN TIMES in English 23 Oct 80 p 8

[Text]

NEW DELHI, Oct. 22: About 200 Afghans were killed when Soviet MIG fighter jets and helicopter gunships blasted Farza a town north of Kabul earlier this month, according to a report in the Indian Express' newspaper.

The Express said bombing was "to punish the people for sheltering Afghan guerillas".

It quoted a witness to the attack as saying that half the dwellings in Farza, a town of about 25,000 people, were destroyed in the attack. Most of the residents fled to the safety of nearby mountains.

The witness told the newspaper in New Delhi that he saw a Russian MIG-21 exploding in flames near Farza. Some helicopter gunships were also hit by gunfire, he added.

He said that fruit orchards and standing crops in the area were destroyed by the raid.

According to a report from Kunar province, Russians launched heavy attacks on Dara Noor and Dara Paich in the first week of October, says a Press release by Islamic Alliance for Liberation of Afghanistan.

In Dara Noor, the fighting lasted two days. Mujahideen forced the invaders back and killed more than 200 Russians and Karmal soldiers.

Twenty Mujahideen were martyred. Villages and forests were destroyed by the heavy bombardments by Russians and about 300 sheep were killed. Russian troops and their partners were defeated in Dara Paich and Chapa Dara also.

Mujahideen launched an attack on Khurd Kabul prison about 10 kilometres from Kabul city. They released 42 prisoners, including some women, who were put in jail because of their anti-Government activities.

According to another report, Russian troops and pro-Government militia launched a strong attack on Logas area. Details of the fighting were not known. In one incident in Azraw Musj, Mujahideen destroyed five tanks and killed 30 Russians and 35 Karmal soldiers. Three Russian military officers were also killed. One of Mujahideen was killed and two were wounded. — PPI | APA.

HEAVY TOLL IN BATTLE AT GHORBAND VALLEY: SCHOOL GIRLS STONE RUSSIANS

Lahore THE PAKISTAN TIMES in English 19 Oct 80 p 8

[Text]

NEW DELHI, Oct. 18: Kabul school girls this week stoned Russian doctors and nurses arriving to vaccinate them and forced the Russians to leave their school, according to a report from Afghanistan.

One doctor and one nurse were slightly injured and four teachers and several students were arrested during the flare-up on last Tuesday at the Zarghana High School, said the report from a Kabul source who in the last has been accurate.

Refusing to be vaccinated by the Russians because of Soviet military occupation of their country, the girls chanted 'Russians go home,' 'Death to Brezhnev' and 'Death to Babrak, servant of Moscow,' the report said.

Their school, Zarghana, was prominent in the 'children's revolt' last April and May when school girls marched into the streets of Kabul and taunted Afghan and Russian soldiers. More than 100 young people were unofficially reported shot dead and thousands arrested.

The Kabul source earlier reported Muslim rebels repelled an attempt by Soviet and Afghan Government troops to capture a strategic valley during a four-day battle with heavy casualties on both sides.

The insurgents killed or wounded 400 Russian soldiers and hundreds of Afghan Communist Party 'volunteers' and tribal mercenaries during the fight to stop the Government from opening the route to central Afghanistan through Ghorband Valley, 80 to 180 kilometres (5 to 62 miles) north-west of Kabul the report said.—APA.

MAJOR SOVIET OFFENSIVE IN PAKTIA PROVINCE

Lahore THE PAKISTAN TIMES in English 25 Oct 80 pp 1, 5

[Text]

NEW DELHI, Oct. 24: Hundreds of Soviet tanks and armoured vehicles have launched a major offensive near Afghanistan's eastern border in the Paktia province.

The Russians opened the attack last week from Gardez, 62 miles south-east of Kabul across rugged Paktia province with the help of hundreds of Communist Party, "volunteers" and tribal mercenaries, said the report from a Kabul source that in the past has been accurate.

The report also described stepped-up Soviet bombardment of insurgent-controlled Logar province, south of Kabul in recent days. Many Afghans gathered for prayers on the Eid festival last Sunday were killed or injured during Soviet shelling of a mosque at Nearkh, south of Kabul, the report said.

Rocket-firing guerilla squads in Kabul in the past week, meanwhile, have attacked several party offices and at least four jeeps carrying party volunteer patrols, with casualties on both sides, the report added.

Two Soviet military officers and a senior official of the Afghan Finance Ministry were killed by Mujahideen in Kabul last week, Western diplomatic sources said in Delhi today.

They said reports of attacks on Russian soldiers and Afghan officials in the Afghan capital continued to reach the diplomatic corps there daily, despite Government and Soviet contentions that the country was turning to normal.

In the latest attacks, on the night of October 15-16 two Soviet officers and the Afghan official were shot dead in separate incidents in a Kabul suburb.

The Soviets confirmed reports that on the same day the car of the Afghan Information Minister was fired on in the southern Afghan town of Kandahar. A bodyguard was killed but the Minister escaped unscathed.

Other reports add:

Insurgents in Afghanistan have destroyed more than half the Soviet-backed Government's medical and educational facilities, diplomatic sources said in New Delhi today.

The guerillas hardly allowed provincial governments to function. As such, Government officials rarely travelled to the provinces from Kabul, the sources said.

The sources said there was no evidence to support the contention of the Russians and the Afghan Government that the country was returning to normal.

The sources said the Governors of Kandahar in southern Afghanistan and Jalalabad in the east had recently been replaced. Guerilla activity has been intense in both towns and the surrounding areas, and the sources said that heavy firing continued at night in Jalalabad.

Shooting was also heard at night and sometimes in the day at Ghazni, south of Kabul. Soviet troops stayed in their camps several miles outside Ghazni and only went into the town for shopping.

Guerilla forces in the mountains around Ghazni appeared to have some anti-aircraft and anti-tank weapons.

Soviet leaders might have told Mr. Karmal during his recent visit that political infighting in Kabul was causing damage, the sources said.

There had been a continuing power struggle in Afghanistan between Mr. Karmal's Parcham (flag) wing of the ruling People's, Democratic Party (DP) and the mainly-rural Khalq Faction.

Meanwhile, night letters have reappeared in Kabul after an interval of several weeks calling on Afghan army officers either to openly declare their loyalty to the Soviet-backed regime or join the rebels, Western diplomatic sources said in Delhi today

Quoting reports from the Afghan capital, the sources said that last Wednesday several Afghan army officers received the night letters asking them to stay in their barracks or residences on Oct. 27 to signify that they do not support the Babrak Karmal regime.

Last Sunday, students and teachers of Kabul University issued night letters calling for a Friday strike beginning yesterday to protest forced conscription and to demand the release of arrested students and others who have completed their terms in the army, the sources said.

Forced conscription was continuing in down town Kabul and residential areas, according to the sources. Last Thursday, a team of Afghan army soldiers shot dead a young man at Artechar, when he refused to accompany them to the army office for possible conscription. The sources said there was widespread speculation in Kabul of an impending change in the Government.

ARMED FORCES CHIEF OF STAFF RESPONDS TO CRUCIAL QUESTIONS

Cairo AL-MUSAWWAR in Arabic 26 Sep 80 pp 25-28

[Interview with Lt Gen Abu Ghazalah by Hamdi Lutfi: "Chief of Staff of Our Armed Forces Gives Most Serious Interview to AL-MUSAWWAR; Lt Gen Abu Ghazalah Responds to These Questions: Have Our Armed Forces Strayed from Their Chief Responsibilities as Was the Case Before 1967? Can the United States Control the Weapons of Our Troops Just as the Soviet Union Did in the Sixties? Did We Give the United States a Naval Base and Then Call That Base Military Facilities? If We Were To Set Israel Aside, What Are the Dangers That Are Threatening Egypt at Present? How Did the Officer Who Refused To Carry Out Orders During the War Win the Order of the Military Star?"]

[Text] Men show their metal when homelands face crises and miscalculations.

Groups of people who have more faith, who are more steadfast, and who are more yielding [than others] confront adversity by elevating their homelands above catastrophes and miscalculations.

When the June 1967 setback occurred, many leaders broke down in dismay. At the same time the essential nature and the fine human metal of many men glowed: they worked silently and patiently, joining together the parts [of the army] that had become unreliable and building and constructing [other parts] anew. They worked night and day, making their utmost, tireless efforts. They were able to get rid of negative aspects; to remedy the climate; and to replace the environment; they even overcame the harshest obstacles and difficulties. Ultimately, they did achieve a healthy, radical military transformation, and their heroic feets shone in the eternally connected history of our people's struggle with the nobility of their character and with their effort to win and to take away victory in 1973.

Today, as we approach the seventh anniversary of the sixth of October which will be forever glorious in history, we are conducting an interview with one of those people: one of the leaders of the glorious Ramadan War. He is an important element of the stage of "patience and silence" whose slogan was proclaimed by President al-Sadat in 1972. That stage began the establishment of the glorious October victory. He is a master of the artillery--an Egyptian military intellectual whose name has always been linked to the military in the best military academies both in the east and in the west. Lt Gen Muhamman 'Abd-al-Halim Abu Ghazalah, a native of the village of Qubur al-Umara' which is located in al-Dilinjat in the governorate of Buhayrah, and the chief of the general staff of our armed forces, is the man for whom the enemy has testified. At an official military meeting that was held last year in Washington, one of the Israeli military commanders said:

"General Abu Ghazalah was firing at us with a high degree of efficiency that was devastating."

Before I go on with my interview with Lt Gen Abu Ghazalah, I would like to narrate this provocative story which I had heard while I was with our armed forces in liberated Sinai during the October 1973 War. This story is a practical indication of the significance of one of the important arts in our life--the art of leading men--and of the skill and the knowledge [involved] in this art which plays a principal role in the progress of our country. Unfortuantely, not may people who have assumed positions of leadership in the various sectors are proficient in the art of leadership.

Before and during the October War Lt Gen Abu Ghazalah, whose title then was brigadier general, continued to move among the artillery formations of the second army which was under his command. The fighting had broken out on the sixth of October and had not stopped for one minute. On the third or the fourth day of the war the fighting had become more vicious, and the fire on both sides--our forces and the forces of Israel--had become more intense. On that day as he was passing, the commander of the artillery was surprised to notice a small unit of artillery fighters led by a young officer who had recently graduated from the military college. This unit had fought a major battle and had been subjected to the enemy's surface to surface missiles. The unit had also been subjected to successive Israeli air raids. Abu Ghazalah was surprised to find the unit's guns on the ground, without the trenches that were necessary at the site to ensure safety. The junior officer of the unit, meanwhile, was in a nervous, abnormal state, which usually happens to a few fighters after battles.

After the artillery commander spoke about the battles of that unit, he asked why the young officer had not dug a trench for his guns.

The second surprise came in the officer's reply. The officer had not yet reached the age of 20.

[He said], "I will not dig trenches for the guns, and I will not carry out orders!"

The situation became tense, but Abu Ghazalah, with his well-known self-control, told the junior officer, "Do you know that not digging trenches for the guns exposes them to destruction?"

"Yes, I know."

The situation became even more tense. The young officer's face twitched further, and he shuddered nervously. He seemed as one who had lost his senses.

Brig Gen Abu Ghazalah realized the situation immediately, recognizing what the officer was suffering from, he made a decision immediately and told the junior officer:

"My duty compels me to put you on trial now and to have you executed by a firing squad because you are destroying the morale of your soldiers with your disgraceful conduct and you are spreading a spirit of rebellion in the unit. However, I will not do that. I will be satisfied with discharging you from the service immediately. You are to return immediately to your home and you are to seek shelter there."

Abu Ghazalah concluded his firm statement. He took a shovel and began to dig trenches for the guns. He was accompanied by a brigadier general in the infantry who spontaneously did the same thing. Half a minute went by, and then the soldiers began to pick up shovels and to dig.

The last surprise came when the junior officer took a shovel and knelt beside the commander of the artillery of the second army. He started digging and apologizing for what had come over him. The tears were streaming down his face as he asked his commander to forgive him so he could resume his post.

The commander of the artillery spoke at length and harshly to this inexperienced officer in front of his soldiers [in a manner] that restored to the officer his self-confidence. Meanwhile the soldiers were pleading for forgiveness for their junior officer because he had shown courage, steadfastness and efficiency throughout the four days of combat. [Although] he had undergone a momentary lapse, he soon regained his senses.

Abu Gahzalah, the father, the human being and the commander who knows what happens in battles to the bravest of fighters, forgave this officer and allowed him to resume his duties.

During the interview which I had with the chief of staff of our armed forces in the last few days, I asked him if that story were true, and he confirmed it. He went on to add, "I followed the combat course of that officer day by day. At the end of the war, he received the order of the military star as a reward for the courage he showed in Sinai throughout the October War."

I am writing this story without comment as an indication of the fine results achieved by some leaders who have understood well the art of leading men.

Major Fallacy

[Question] As we prepare for the seventh anniversary of the October 1973 victory, the price that our people paid for the 1967 defeat is still urgently calling for revenge. The lesson itself needs further details in the conversation of everyone who lived through "the experience or the tragedy" so that we can have a store of conflicting or homogeneous information through which history can pass judgment on this period and on its leaders, the rulers of Egypt. What do you think of this?

(Note: During the June 1967 period Lt Gen Abu Ghazalah was heading the educational branch at the Artillery Academy. That branch was teaching officers in the artillery about the science and the development of their weapons.)

[Answer] The June defeat was not the product of a day or a week, but it was rather the outcome of a military and a political climate, and environment that applied to our armed forces the principle of security before combat efficiency: security for protecting the regime that was in existence then and not real preparation for fighting and for achieving victory. This was the slogan to which Muhammad Hasanayn Haykal devoted a full article in which he discussed people of confidence and people of efficiency. Haykal emphasized the importance of relying on people of confidence, come what may to the people of efficiency. That article aroused considerable clamor because it represented an idea that was prevelent at the time. That idea also implied a major fallacy because the people of efficiency should be people of confidence because of their efficiency. That efficiency was a weapon that protected the efficient from corruption. These are the laws of life. They forgot that confidence strengthens the efficiency of the efficient in a positive way that ultimately serves the country.

It is no secret that the 1967 environment included military commanders whose military knowledge was zero. These commanders, however, were loyal to the regime and did make an effort to protect it. It was natural that we suffer a defeat with such commanders leading our armed forces in a serious war!

[Question] Allow me to ask you a question that is especially senstitive. This is because I am putting before you what has been repeatedly stated by spokesmen who oppose our policy in the Arab homeland. Some of our Egyptian citizens have repeated it with good intentions. In my opinion we must respond clearly and candidly to such opinions so we can get rid of the invisible poison in such talk as it is disseminated in whispers in our midst.

It has been said that by participating at this and the next stage in the construction of services projects that are needed by the people such as transportation, roads, agriculture and housing, the Egyptian armed forces are merely straying from their original duties which are to prepare constantly for combat and to devote themselves to improving combat efficiency so that, God forgid, what happened in 1967 would not happen again. What do you think about this?

[Answer] There is nothing to prevent us from responding to and refuting such statements that stem from total ignorance and ill will, of course.

Our armed forces take part in public activities that are related in a major and in a primary way to the "demands" of our armed forces. I will cite, for example, how this connection comes about.

Among the principal functions of the signal corps in our forces is to lay telecommunications lines to the branches of the armed forces and their fighting formations. When the signal corps lays communications lines for the masses of the people, in addition to the cast reduction and the time reduction that are realized, the corps provides practical, technical training for its officers and its soldiers while using new equipment and developing the equipment that is available to the corps.

To clarify the picture further, I will say that a corps such as the signal corps must spend limited hours every week in practical, military training. It will necessarily utilize its technical equipment; that is, it will wear out its equipment on a practical level. Why then shouldn't corps members train in fields that would ultimately achieve the required results of training and contribute at the same time to solving the public's telephone problems?!

There is a Provisions and Supply Authority in our armed forces. There are more than 13 major departments affiliated with that authority. Among them is an appropriations department one of whose functions is to provide food to the formations that fight on the battlefield. If this authority were to establish a cheese factory or even help the Ministry of Supply build a food plant, this would constitute the essence of its work and not a deviation from its functions.

Thus we find that we did not ask an armored division to make cheese, but we made that request of a military department whose principal function is to contribute with all its energies to providing food.

The same applies to the Department of War Supplies which is the department responsible for providing clothing to the armed forces. What if this department were to contribute towards relieving the public's suffering and were to offer its capabilities to provide civilian clothing also? The machines that produce the overalls for the field can also produce pajamas, shoes and other [items of clothing] for the public.

The corps of engineers includes construction battalions for buildings, for concrete work and for defence emplacement work for the armed forces. The corps also builds bridges and paves roads on the battlefield for the fighting formations. What if this corps were to build a road or a new bridge that would contribute to solving the problems of overcrowdedness and congestion which Cairo and other cities are suffering from? Is not this the essence of the functions of the corps of engineers? Did we bring an infantry brigade or an air defense [brigade] to build a bridge or to construct a new road?

We come to our air forces which have C-130 transport planes for carrying supplies, munitions and, of course, soldiers. Even if these airplanes did not fly and if they remained grounded for 2 years--and this would not be logical--they would have to undergo a "tune-up [operation]. Why then not benefit from the flight hours in the airplane's life by transporting foods from one country to another? We also transport from abroad to the homeland the purchases that are made by the state or by the armed forces. All these functions provide actual training programs for our pilots and for the crews that assist them. These functions also allow us to use the hours during which we are allowed to use the airplanes and operate the equipment without causing a shortage or a delay in the demands of our armed forces at all. Such cooperation with the state and with its civilian sectors takes place according to prearranged planning and scheduling that does not conflict with the principal programs and needs of our air forces.

Does the fact that the transport airplanes of our armed forces take part with the civilian transport sectors to provide food for the people in the various governorates signify that we used a squadron of Phantoms or Mirages to carry out the transport operations that we are talking about?

[Question] Do other armies in large or in small countries carry out such civilian functions in their homelands?

[Answer] Of course. I will tell you about the People's Republic of China which I visited. I found that the Chinese were putting into practice an ideal system in the Chinese armed forces. For every infantry division, for example, they designated a certain area of land so that that division can cultivate the land with various crops to feed its own fighters. The division thus gets no food or grain from the state.

I recall my visit to the 196th infantry division when I visited the People's Republic of China in 1975. This division was stationed in an area that was about 150 kilometers from Peking. Do you know what I found there?

The military intellectual, the veteran master of artillery and the chief of staff of our armed forces answered his own question and said:

I found they had farms, not one farm, for cattle and poultry; I found a cheese plant, bakeries, a pharmaceutical laboratory and a clothing plant. I also found that the basic force of that division spent 6 hours every day in military training and 6 hours in agricultural and industrial production. The families of the officers and soldiers worked all day in production in the factories, the farms or in the fields.

I tested the level of their military training in a practical exercise they performed in front of me. They achieved during that exercise high levels of combat performance.

Let me leave the People's Republic of China and its armed forces and take you back to the technical capability of our armed forces. Our armed forces have an enormous capability which is more than excellent technically. There are maintenance workshops where equipment can be repaired in the factories. These workshops were designed to operate at average war rates, and these are high. This capability is not used in its entirety in times of peace. In fact, parts of this capability are almost idle. The equipment that manufactures gearboxes and spare parts for tanks can manufacture gearboxes for civilian vehicles to meet the needs of the public.

The Difference Between a Base and Facilities

[Question] Your excellency, Lt Gen, I have another question for you that I will present to you candidly.

It has been said that there was no difference between the facilities that Egypt was offering to the U.S. forces in the Red Sea and the acquisition by those forces of a base over which they would operate. Statements made by Egyptian officials on this subject are fallacious--even though as a correspondent who has been working with the armed forces for 28 years I am well aware that such an explanation is basically fallacious. These are not our statements. I would like you to elaborate, [or that matter] if only for the sake of truth. What do you think?

[Answer] Very clearly we must first establish the definition of a base? The chief of staff went on to say [the following]:

A base is an area of land which the state leases to a foreign country for a period of time. The country that leases the land has sovereignty over that area of land which it leased. This means that it can launch from that base attacks by air or by sea against any one of its enemies without notifying the country which owns the land. The country that owns the base has no right also to enter into the area of the base itself without the permission of the country that is leasing it. The country that is leasing the base has the right to fly its flag over the base. This is what happened with regard to Britain, West Germany and South Korea and then the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia. All these countries leased bases on their land to the U.S. armed forces.

Some of us are forgetting the al-Dhahrain base in Saudi Arabia or the Soviet navy base in Aden. In Libya there are Russisn bases that have not been announced even though they do in fact exist in the Gulf of al-Sallum, in Benghazi and in Tripoli. The rejectionist newspapers in the Arab area have stated that these were areas where the Russian fleet was stationed. They are in fact Soviet bases.

So much for military bases; but this is not what happened here.

The facilities that we are actually offering are being offered by the state--just like any state can offer another friendly state facilities so it can accomplish a specific task. These facilities remain under the control and the supervision of the host country; the other country does not fly its flag over the area where these facilities are granted. That area remains part of the land that is controlled by the country that owns the land. The officers and the soldiers of the guest country are subject to the laws of the country which owns the land. In this respect they are like any visiting, foreign tourist. In fact, officers and soldiers are not allowed to wear their military uniform outside the area that is determined for them by the host country.

The Americans who are working with our air forces are cooperating with us for a pre-determined period of time. They are working in a well-known Egyptian air force base: the West Cairo base. They work inside a brick fence; outside the fence they must wear civilian clothing. No U.S. officer, soldier, or person can depart or arrive without Egypt's permission and full supervision. Likewise, the state that has acquired facilities may not carry out any military action, nor may it use its forces against any other country without the official approval of the host countries.

You will also find that permission is requested from every country in the world when the military airplanes of another country pass through a country's air space. Those airplanes may also land to refuel. Such cooperation is one form or one way of providing facilities; all countries continue to cooperate in this fashion.

A short time ago a military airplane that belonged to the Saudi forces landed at Cairo International Airport, and it got what it needed. The same thing happened with regard to European airplanes and, in fact, Russian airplanes also recently received the facilities that they had requested. These facilities that we offer the United States; [the latter] are consistent with our political and our military strategy.

[Question] I told the Egyptian commander who had studied in the Soviet Union with an Egyptian military delegation between 1957 and 1961 and had then joined the American Carlyle College of War--one of the best military colleges in the United States from which famous U.S. generals like Patton, Marshall and Eisenhower had graduated, a college which he had joined in the mid seventies and graduated from in 1979--I told Lt Gen Muhammad 'Abd-al-Halim Abu Ghazalah, the expert of military exercises, about which he has written several books and the expert on artillery and surface to surface missiles [the following]:

In your position of leadership now, can you speak to us frankly about the "dangers" that are presently threatening Egypt?

[Answer] The danger that surround Egypt now outnumber those that surrounded us at a time when our only enemy was Israel. If we were to talk about Libya, we would find that al-Qadhdhafi alone cannot launch an armed attack against Egypt because he lacks the military cadres and capabilities to launch such an attack. However, with help from mercenaries, al-Qadhdhafi does pose a threat to Egypt at some time.

Al-Qadhdhafi has turned Libya into a fertile ground for the mercenaries he recruited from amongst Russians, Cubans, East Germans and from other eastern countries. This is besides the Palestinians whom he uses for their destructive objectives only. If those mercenaries were to put together the weapons that al-Qadhdhafi has amassed, they would create another Afghanistan in the area. This situation in itself poses a major threat because the Soviet Union may in fact create a new Afghanistan out of the Arab area, taking advantage of the Arab leaders--and al-Qadhdhafi is among them--whom they control completely. The Soviet Union would do so by concluding a secret agreement with one of the Arab leaders. The Arab leader, who is a tool of the Russians, would then ask for Moscow's aid, and Moscow would interfere immediately or would carry out a coup in one of the rejectionist countries so as to place its obedient clients at the head of the government.

[Question] What about Ethiopia, Sudan and the waters of the Nile, Your Excellency, Lt Gen? It has been said that the estrangement that has occurred between us and Khartoum was due to the waters of the Nile and the fact that they were diverted to Sinai in order to overcome the obstacles that stood in the way of the comprehensive peace process: the rights of Palestine, the return of Jerusalem, the removal of the settlements and the remaining [considerations] that were covered by the Camp David Accords. What is the truth?

[Answer] There are no problems whatsoever with Sudan regarding the waters of the Nile. The government of Sudan, however, is suffering from political or economic conditions, and these have already been explained by President Anwar al-Sadat. It is important that I mention that we now have an Egyptian military delegation--air, naval and ground--serving to train the forces of the fraternal country of Sudan. There are many Sudanese students in our various military colleges and academies. Sudanese officers who graduated from Egypt and then also went to France and Britain for further study have acknowledged, and most of them have done so in front of us when we met with them, that they learned [in Europe] half of what they learned in Egypt. They said that these powerful countries conceal from them the most recent [information in] the military arts and sciences which the officers of these countries are studying.

Ethiopia's threats are directed basically against Sudan. For us, the waters of the Nile constitute a matter of life or death. The latest news indicates that a rapprochement between Addis Ababa and Khartoum has taken place. In the final analysis we are not advocates of war, and it would be beneficial to all of us if peace were to prevail among the countries of the region.

This Will Not Happen Again

[Question] Allow me to bring to your attention the "point of view" which some people entertain on the matter of cooperation with the United States and on the weapons we get from the United [as a means of] putting into practice the strategy of having multiple sources of weapons.

This "point of view" states that we are pursuing a futile course and that the United States will ultimately become the sole supplier of weapons to our armed forces and [thus] gain the control that the Soviet Union had over us just as was the case in the sixties. How do you respond to these statements that are being made in secret, statements whose clandestine, malevolent objective is not unknown to us?

[Answer] You yourself have responded to your question with what you mentioned at the end of the question. But I will add the following:

Our supreme political command and our military command are quite vigilant regarding the consideration to which you referred. We are fully aware of how superpowers use the fact that they produce weapons and provide them to some government to exert political pressure that would serve their interests. This is what happened in our experience with the Soviet Union, and it will not happen again.

The United States sold 60 modern Phantoms to Saudi Arabia, but it removed some of the sophisticated electronic equipment in those airplanes!

The strategy of having multiple sources of weapons is based on a philosophy that stems from our view--which is clarified to us by this philosophy--that the countries which produce weapons are divided into three groups.

The first group is represented by the superpowers, the United States and Russia. They are capable of producing weapons of any kind and at any time. Accordingly, they are capable of filling orders in the shortest time possible and in large quantities.

The second group [consists of] the advanced industrial countries such as Britain, France, Germany and the People's Republic of China. These countries produce weapons, but they cannot fill orders in the time determined by the importing countries and in the quantities they require.

The third group is represented by the countries that produce specific kinds of weapons such as Italy, Spain, Korea and Brazil. At the same time these countries do not have the capabilities for development that exist in world industrialization. Italy, however, has achieved major progress in the manufacture of naval units. All these countries are experiencing special economic conditions that make them incapable of offering the importing countries any favorable terms for making payments.

We come after that to the developing countries which are trying to build such an industry in their homelands. Egypt and a few Latin American countries are among these countries.

It is through this philosophy and this political understanding that we make plans for what we can acquire through purchases not only from the United States, as your question stated, but also from France, Britain, West Germany, Italy and also a few countries of the eastern bloc. Let me not add anything further. But it has been through our special strategy that we did acquire a flexibility whose results have been good. For example, it is easy to obtain electronic equipment from Italy for a French airplane that we have; or we can make this equipment in our country. We have in fact succeeded in doing so, and a country like France has asked if it can purchase an Egyptian invention which we added to one of the modern French airplanes which are used by the artillery and by surface to surface missiles.

At any rate we will find that ultimately it is better to diversify the sources of weapons and to be quite vigilant regarding what happens around us so that we would not become prisoners or subject to the "world game."

It is important for me to explain that modern weapons represent a huge economic burden on all the countries in the various groups that I mentioned to you--even the United States. But as we say modern weapons are "a necessary evil."

[Question] I am asking you a question as a military intellectual and writer.

You have published 33 books. What is your favorite book?

[Answer] "The History of the Arts of War" which has five volumes. It discusses war from the Stone Age to the end of the Vietnam War.

[Question] Are you preparing a new book?

[Answer] Yes, I work on it occasionally, but I have recently stopped. It is entitled "Memoirs of an Egyptian General." In the chapters of that book I discuss the experiences I have had since I graduated from the Military College on the 2nd of February 1949. [It will cover my experiences] until such time when I should complete it, God willing, perhaps next year or the year after that.

[Question] A final question. Have you come close to death on the battlefield?

The father of Tariq, a student of medicine in the United States; the father of Ashraf, a secondary school student in Cast Cairo; and the father of three girls, one of whom has graduated and is practicing medicine--Abu Ghazalah, the fighter who is loved by his soldiers and his officers as a commander, a father and a human being who is rich in human emotions and fine conduct--replied:

[Answer] I came close to death in Sinai on the 23rd of October 1973. I was riding a military vehicle and I was on my way to investigate the bridgehead of the second infantry division. My colleague, Riyadh Jad, who is one of the commanders of the infantry, was with me. There was another artillery officer with us, the late Raja'i Fu'ad. A mine exploded in the car, and the car blew up and [its parts] scattered into small pieces. My friend Raja'i lost his life and so did the driver. Riyadh Jad was wounded in the chest. When I became conscious, I found myself reciting the Moslem creed, and I was not hurt. It was the will of God. I came close to death in that experience, and I came close to the Almighty Creator who gave me a new life.

CIVIL WAR ANTICIPATED IF KHOMEYNI DIES SOON

Lahore CHATAN in Urdu 25 Aug 80 pp 14-17

[Article: "Who After Khomeyni?"]

[Text] Twenty months ago the Shah of Iran was deposed from his throne. Since then, Ayatollah Khomeyni, for better or worse, has been taking care of the country. The Ayatollah says himself that he will not live long. He is 80 years old now, and from heart ailments to worry about conditions in Iran, everything affects him. Since last winter, Khomeyni, on the advice of his doctors, has been living in the suburbs of Tehran. An ambulance with a red Islamic crescent flag always waits outside his residence. A number of Western diplomats who are still stationed in Tehran and some Iranian officials agree that if Imam Khomeyni dies within the next year, Iran will be engulfed in a civil war and all the efforts of the mullahs to establish a government in Iran will be of no use. Even so, it is definitely apparent that Iran will not join the communist bloc. One White House commentator, who has deep insight into Middle East affairs, said in London: "The supposition (that Iran would join the communist bloc) is irrational. The resurgence of Islam, which has taken place in Iran, will survive even after Khomeyni, because this resurgence has already spread to Turkey, Afghanistan, Pakistan and the Gulf region. It is unthinkable that there will be anything but an Islamic government in Iran for the next 10 years."

The type of government which may be established in Iran after Khomeyni could be a hard line dictatorship, Islamic in name only. Or, it could be a hybrid type of government coming into existence as a result of cooperation between the mullahs and the secular technocrats. In view of the muddled situation in Iran today, the future is very hard to predict. Many political analysts doubt that the present circle of mullahs, which is composed of old disciples of Khomeyni, would survive his death.

Most of the present Iranian leaders have been Khomeyni's disciples. Among them is Ayatollah Beheshti, shrewd leader of the Islamic Republican Party and a staunch follower of Islamic fundamentalism. Beheshti has tried at every step to downgrade Iranian President Bani-Sadr, and is now in control of both, the supreme count and the parliament. Ayatollah Khalkhali, who is a notorious judge and known as 'butcher', is also one of Khomeyni's disciples. Some other disciples of Khomeyni are: Minister of Commerce Reza Sadr, Islamic Revolution Prosecutor Shaykh Ali Ghadausi, Minister of the Interior Shaykh Mohammad Reza Mahdavi-Kani, and at least six members of the dissolved Revolution Council. But the religious leader considered to be Khomeyni's most likely successor is Ayatollah Montazeri.

Khomeyni has had the foresight to prepare all these religious leaders for his theocracy, but the present state of affairs has led to deep frictions among the mullahs. The fact of the matter is that Islam does not recognize the existence of any group of mullahs who have authority to act as middlemen between man and God. But since most Iranians are Shia by faith, they look to the holy city of Qom for guidance. In Iran, it is commonly said that when one is in doubt about anything, he should always consult an Islamic scholar. That is the reason why every Iranian looks to one holy man or another for counsel and advice. Ayatollah Khomeyni has a uniquely respectable position among such holy men. Common people obey his orders with religious fervor and pascion, something which Westerners tend to equate with religious fanaticism. The behavior of the armed guards of the 52 American hostages, and of the members of Hezb-e Eqtedar [Eqedar Party], who attack their leftist opponents in the streets of Tehran, are manifestations of this very religious passion.

The influence of the Shia school of thought is not limited to Iran, but has spread to certain areas of Iraq and the Persian Gulf countries. Shia precepts provide for the constitution of a council of leading Islamic scholars. These scholars are called ayatollah's. Each ayatollah has hundreds of thousands of enthusiastic followers. These scholars are bearers of strange titles, and Khomeyni has been universally acknowledged as the "Grand Scholar," or the "Prince of the Ayatollahs." As far as religious titles are concerned, other members of the council of scholars rank below him in status. Khomeyni's popularity has unquestionably made him head of the council, while he wields political control over Iran. In the past, there was never a time when the scholars accepted a political personality as their leader. The present unique situation has scholars worried over the role of people like Ayatollah Beheshti and Ayatollah Montazeri, who are rising slowly to the top, not on the basis of their knowledge and scholarship, but because of their armed followers.

One Iranian expert said recently in America that in Iran today the only thing that matters is who was foremost in opposing the Shah. This state of affairs has led to the situation where lower level scholars, belonging to the Khomeyni school of thought, have organized councils of sorts which have challenged Iran's centuries-old institutions. It is just possible that such an organizational program was set up by Khomeyni himself. Khomeyni already had feuds with the five great scholars who are called 'ayatollah', and the problems gripping Iran today are an offshoot of that feud.

The crucial thing now, is how the scholars and mullahs, armed only with the Koran, will take charge of a nation in the 20th century. When Khomeyni started teaching in the Edare-ye Elmie of Qom in 1927, he got into trouble. His preaching about Islamic rule in Iran and his attacks on the Pahlavi kings made the leading scholars adopt such a cautious attitude toward him that until 1964 he was not allowed to join the council of scholars. When he was finally allowed to join the council, it was under pressure. Because of his attacks on the Shah's regime, Khomeyni was arrested four times after 1962. Shah Mohammad Reza Pahlavi then started thinking of putting him to death. At this point, Ayatollah Shari'at Madari, the influential leader of 13 million Turks of Azerbaijan, intervened with the Shah's regime, and a solution was found. Khomeyni was made the "Grand Ayatollah" and exiled to Iraq. According to Pahlavi law, the Shah could execute an ordinary mullah, but he could not execute the Grand Ayatollah.

Shari'at Madari even now has a seat in the parliament. Differences between him and Khomeyni on the question of a new Islamic consitution caused severe riots in Azerbaijan last winter. Ayatollah Madari was strongly opposed to the idea that a religious scholar should hold all sorts of controls in the government, as Khomeyni now does. An expert on Eastern affairs commented on this in London, saying that not only Shari'at Madari, but a great majority of the scholars want to instill the teachings of Islam in the hearts of people, rather than use[Islam merely as an instrument of power. Shari'at Madari has kept silent on most issues, because he does not want to stir up a civil war between the people of Azerbaijan and the Khomeyni government by his remarks. Even when the revolutionary guards executed by firing the leaders of the Islamic Republican Party of Azerbaijan, on charges that they had connections with Savak, Shari'at Madari refused to denounce the revolutionary guards for this act. Those who have visited him at his residence in Qom say that he is living under (house arrest?). The atrocities that have been committed in the name of Khomeyni have (intimidated?) the great scholars.

Ayatollah Kho'i, keeper of the holy places of Najaf, Ayatollah Qomi, grand scholar of Mashhad, and Ayatollah Shirazi have already said in repressed voices that Iran is now slowly departing from the Islamic path. Last month, they expressed their views after a weekly Jom'eh [Friday] prayer gathering. Their followers even exchanged angry words with Khomeyni supporters. The demonstrations that took place in Azerbaijan last winter show how well the orders of these religious leaders are obeyed by their followers. Commenting on those demonstrations, an Iranian said that Shari'at Madari would have to say only one word, and 13 million Azerbaijanis, ready to martyr themselves, would break loose on Tehran. But Shari'at Madari does not want to do any such thing. He is a quiet person, and so are the other ayatollahs. They do not like a holy war against another ayatollah, but they say privately that Khomeyni should restrain his over zealous supporters and workers.

All those who are experts on or know anything about Islam are riding the wave of orthodoxy and fundamentalism that has spread in Iran today. Peasant mullahs lead revolution councils and pass sentences on anti-revolution elements. They have unprecendented authority. An American professor, who specializes in Iranian politics, says: "The rural mullahs are doing this reluctantly. Most of them want to follow the example of Ayatollah Taleqani, that is, they want to have nothing to do with politics, and want to return to the mosques." Ayatollah Taleqani was a social reformer and a staunch opponent of the Shah. After the revolution, he died of a heart attack.

A British expert on Eastern affairs has expressed the opinion that the armed mullahs roaming the streets of Iran will stay armed, and that those who argue that politics and the atrocities of the fundamentalists have no place in Islam (do not quite know what they are talking about). In the government, the fundamentalists have cornered all their opponents, including Bani-Sadr. Ayatollah Khomeyni recently warned Bani-Sadr that the new government was going to be one hundred percent Islamic. Now, Bani-Sadr has no choice. It is Ayatollah Beheshti who can do what he wants. Beheshti controls the Majles, that is, the parliament, and for key ministries, including the premiership and the ministry of oil, he is selecting only those who toe the party line.

Inside the parliament, Beheshti's men have started an open fight with their secular opponents. This fighting has severe consequences, so much so that when the Islamic Republic Party accused Ahmad Madani of contact with the CIA, Ahmad Madani did not even talk back. It must be remembered that Madani was the second man in line for the presidency of the country. Even the supporters of Mehdi Bazargan and members of the National Front have become targets of the fundamentalists, and many Western sources say that this well-respected group will also go underground because of the threats against it.

It would not be out of place to mention here that even some close confidants of Bandi-Sadr have been caught in the cleanup movement of the Islamic Republican Party. Each government office has an Islamic society which aims at uprooting anti-revolution elements in that office. These societies are, in general, related to the Islamic Republican Party. During the last three weeks, they have made attacks on Ali Reza Nobari, governor of the Central Bank, and Foreign Minister Sadegh Qhotbzadeh, who want to lessen the influence of the mullahs in the government.

The armed forces have also become the targets of the fundamentalist mullahs. Officers trained in the U.S. have generally been labelled as being pro-Shah. The revolutionaries are worried that the foreign-trained officers may be unhappy with the political changes that are taking place, and that they might revolt. Nor are the doubts of the revolutionaries baseless. Recently, 300 army personnel, including air force generals and a former chief of police, were arrested on charges that they planned to blow up the residences of Khomeyni and Bani-Sadr with Phantom F-4 fighters. Air force pilots and other personnel often have to take orders from mullahs who know almost nothing about the latest weaponry. If the personnel disobey, they are sentenced to hard labor, The British press recently reported that one mullah ordered a pilot to shoot down a spy satellite flying 3,000 kilometers above the ground, way out of the range of aircraft. When such is the state of affairs the possibility of a revolt in the army cannot be ruled out. The mullahs' interference has alienated the army and a large segment of the technocrats, the intellectuals and the business community--groups which want to (calm?) Iran down. Political analysts say that if Beheshti compels Bani-Sadr to resign, whatever technocrats are left in industry and government would leave Iran and join with the other Iranian exiles.

The threats of the mullahs have had another bad consequence. Because of them, middle-of-the-road elements in Iran and Iranian minorities have been compelled to adopt extremist attitudes. When the revolutionary guards temporarily arrested the leader of the half million Kazaks, Kazak (representatives?) organized a protest and walked out of the majlis. The Kurds also are ready to fight the Tehran Government, because no attention has been paid to their demands for autonomy. The Kurds blame the Islamic Republican Party for creating the tension.

Terrorists activities against the mullahs are also on the increase. Recently, there were three bomb explosions in central Tehran, in which 6 people were killed and 100 wounded. An organization named Forqan was blamed for these explosions. This organization undertakes political murders. Last year, it was accused of assassinating several mullahs. The Marxist-Leninist group Fedayin is pursuing underground activities in the provinces of Khuzestan and Kurdistan. Its aim is to turn these secret activities into open guerilla warfare against the mullahs. The Islamic Republican Party, by allowing only religious fundamentalists to take part in the 100 percent Islamic government of Khomeyni, has increased its own chances of a rapid downfall.

Bandi-Sadr, who looks meek because of his moustache and eyeglasses, has finally been driven to vent political anger. His supporters have made public cassette tapes which tell how certain officials of the Islamic Republican Party are busy downgrading his administration. Recently, Bani-Sadr's newspaper scored points over Beheshti's newspaper in the matter of granting the title of "Grand Ayatollah" to Ayatollah Montazeri. Ayatollah Montazeri leads the Friday prayer in Qom, and Bani-Sadr's paper prints his messages on the front page.

Many political analysts say that Montazeri's personality lacks the religious and political charisma which can have the same kind of hold on Iran that Khomeyni has. For this reason, both Beheshti and Bandi-Sadr think that the post of a religious chief of state should be made a merely ceremonial post. Anyway, should Montazeri succeed Khomeyni, Beheshti would still have the upper hand. Beheshti and Montazeri both studied under Khomeyni at the same time, and both of them took part in revolutionary activities. One Iranian observer remarked that these persons do not trust Western-educated people like Bani-Sadr and Mehdi Bazargan. Within the Islamic Republican Party, it often becomes hard to distinguish between opportunism and faithfulness to Khomeyni.

Since they follow Khomeyni's instructions only formally, and not in spirit, Beheshti and his group hold the view that religious zeal should be used or exploited for their own objectives. At one point, Ayatollah Beheshti organized demonstrations in front of the American embassy in Tehran solely to thwart the efforts of Bani-Sadr and Qotbzadeh in connection with the release of the hostages. Thus, release of the hostages could not be accomplished. Hojatolislam M (Khamene'i?) the spiritual leader of the armed guards, dealt a severe blow to Bani-Sadr's prestige by following the orders of the Islamic Republican Party. Hojatolislam A Rafsanjani is in close contact with Hezb-e Allahi [Divine Party]. Rafsanjani was recently elected speaker of the majlis. The Hezb-e Allahi people have compelled their secular opponents to go underground and have harassed newspapers not connected with the Islamic Republican Party to the extent that they have folded.

Beheshti has done careful planning to end up in the center of power. Reliable sources say that before the revolution, Beheshti was called "Mr Cassette," because he used to arrange the smuggling of Ayatollah Khomeyni's cassettes into Iran. In March 1979, Khomeyni ended his 15-year exile and made a triumphant return to Iran. By this time, Beheshti had already founded and become the leader of a well organized party, the Islamic Republican Party.

Western diplomats say that Beheshti had completed the organizational groundwork for the party in the autumn of 1978. At that time, Khomeyni was still in France, and used to say that once the Shah was ousted, he would consider his work done and retire peacefully to the quiet of the mosques of Qom. But Khomeyni's work is not done. Acknowledging the shortcomings of the revolution, he said not long ago that the Islamic courts were in bad shape, and that the situation was not any different as far as the army and other institutions were concerned.

Lately, Washington and anti-revolution elements have been blamed for the ailments of Iran. It was recently revealed that Egyptian radio stations have been broadcasting anti-Khomeyni propaganda, and that high American officials have privately met with the former Iranian Prime Minister Shapur Bakhtiar and his former generals who are opponents of the present regime. But the fact of the matter is that many of the ills that have befallen the revolutionary government are of its own doing. Authority is still divided between two groups. The extremists, sabotaging Iran's rebirth in the wake of the revolution, have played lightly with the solidarity of the country.

Khomeyni himself is to blame to an extent. His anti-Western viewpoint spells political hazards for the Middle East. His vision lacks breadth. Now that the constitution of Iran decrees that the mullahs will run the country, it is no longer relevant to wonder how an Islamic government will be really run. The threats of the fundamentalists, and the killings and bloodshed, have created two extreme factions in the country. If Khomeyni dies soon, Iran will be caught in a war between these two extremist factions.

LEFTIST MAGAZINE INTERVIEWS PRESIDENT OF IRAN

Athens ANDI in Greek 10 Oct 80 pp 25-27

[Interview with Iranian President Bani-Sadr by Sofia Andonopoulou]

[Text] Question: What are the principles governing Iran's foreign policy? What type of relations are you seeking to have with other countries?

Answer: Speaking from a scientific viewpoint, relations are established in two ways. According to one way, the type of relations which are established between countries is imposed on both parties. The two sides have certain advantages, they make exchanges. They exchange in a way that ensures the two systems that they will remain as they were, will continue to survive according to the previously prevailing conditions. The other type of relations is that within which the two systems are destroyed completely in order to be replaced by a new situation. The first type of relations is that which sovereign countries impose on dominated countries, the strong countries on the weak. The second type of relations is that which weak countries must establish among themselves, the dominated countries who want to destroy the system in force.

The type of relations which we want to re-establish between Iran and other countries certainly does not belong to the first category. We will have to re-establish a type of relations within which we will destroy the system in force.

The strong countries, the imperialist countries, have imposed an order, as it is called, on our world. If we destroy this "order," if we change the present situation, it is natural for it to seem like some great event has happened, to seem to us that the change has occurred in a disorderly, irregular way because this imperialistic order has been imposed on us as the only model.

If I now wish to transform this answer of mine in a political way to a political language, I would have to say that the type of relations which we want to have with other countries is relations against the imperialist powers, against the sovereign countries. We must put an end to this epoch in which the imperialist powers told us and are telling us, made us believe, that if the weak countries re-establish independent relations among themselves, they cannot develop; that, at any rate, they will have to have relations with the imperialist countries. But what we want to show is that the weak countries can and must have independent relations among themselves, that they will not have to build relations with the imperialist countries.

Only in this way can they destroy the sovereignty and imperialism of the western and eastern bloc, particularly of America and the Soviet Union.

Question: What is the strategy of your foreign policy concerning the Third World, the non-alined countries and the European countries?

Answer: As I told you previously, our general policy is a policy which aims at the destruction of the imperialist countries' sovereignty. Our world is presently organized in a system with many contrasts between the superpowers of the west and east and the rest of the world. All the rest of the world is forced to follow this order of things. We must create an equilibrium within which we can isolate the two superpowers, America and the Soviet Union, so that the other coutries--the weak and those a bit stronger, the countries which are dominated--are liberated. In other words, the other countries, aside from the superpowers, must re-establish such relations among themselves that the oppressed peoples can be united, can build a strong unity, a strong totality. This strong totality is very different from that which Mao spoke of. This strong totality will allow the weak countries to make themselves independent of the imperialist countries. This is my political position.

Question: What is your evaluation of the international situation and what do you estimate as a possible revolutionary development in the future?

Answer: From what I told you before in answer to the other two questions, it is clear that in the world today there are two currents which are continually colliding. In Europe, the capitalistic current which follows that two superpowers, particularly America, prevails. European capitalism thinks that its attachment to America is the sole condition for its survival and that the moment which will mean its separation from American capitalism will also be the moment of its death. However, another current is also being developed in Europe which says, for example, that if the weak countries are able to build a front among themselves, if they succeed in being united, they will be able to defend themselves.

Which of these two currents will win depends on our role, the role which Iran will play. If we succeed in creating a strong current in countries like our own, we will be able to strengthen this second current in Europe and in this way we will be able to create a revolutionary current in other countries of the world. Thus, even in the superpowers, America and the Soviet Union, even within these countries themselves, some currents could be developed against the over-concentration of power.

Question: You have been elected president of this country by the great majority of the Iranian people. What are the guidelines of the program which you presented to the Iranian people?

Answer: My plan and program for Iran is written in my book "The Islamic Republic." Perhaps you can find it translated into English. There are four basic units there: independence, defense, economy, ideology. Why ideology? Because, in my opinion, we cannot and must not apply our principles, our policy, with coercion. If we do not use the ideologic factor, then the only route remaining is coercion. But, in my opinion, we cannot and must not use any coercion whatsoever. We cannot rebuild, for example, a devastated economy in a country like ours without a strong power. This strong power can be either coercion, which in this case will create a Stalinistic regime, or, if it is not coercion, it is the ideologic factor, the ideologic factor which--this and only this--I consider the only solution to our problems.

If we wanted to organize coercion, if we wanted to develop it, to endow it with branches and offshoots, like a strong police force, strong army, etc., then the only thing we would have to do is follow western and eastern imperialism. If we wanted to use force, we would attach ourselves to one of the two imperialist powers.

This is my philosophy. Certainly, with this method, I face many problems because the tendency to use coercion is great. And Iran has survived four-hundred, five-hundred years of tyranny and oppression. And power entices many.

Question: Is there a strong conflict between you and those who follow you, on the one hand, and the Islamic Republican Party, on the other? What are the differences between your perceptions and program and those of the Islamic Republican Party?

Answer: Speaking from a scientific viewpoint, I would say that, in our country, that which we would call a party does not exist because we cannot ascribe the term party to any type of political group. A true party demands a political viewpoint, program, organization, ideology. Based on all these, one could speak about a party. But, in Iran, such a thing which we can call a party does not exist. Despite all these, there are limited political groups. These political groups, in my opinion, do not reflect more than two to four percent of the will of the population within Iranian society. And these political groups consider coercion the only solution to our problems, with the difference that they say the direction of the coercion has significance. In the previous regime, the direction of coercion was from the top to the bottom; now it will have to be from the bottom to the top, from the oppressed people to the oppressors.

But we do not believe this. We believe that the use of coercion splits up the society. The use of coercion would mean nothing other than that one group which was strong and governed and which now has shattered, gave up its place to another group. For example, in the Soviet Union, the Tsar gave up his place to Stalin. Our masses, the Iranian masses, have the culture, the ideology of the "divine unity," the non-use of coercion. Nevertheless, the masses are unorganized. If we want to organize them, this must happen on the basis of suppression of any coercion whatsoever. What we finally need is an absolute science, or something very close to an absolute science.

We must make the society absolutely conscious. This effort must create that knowledge in society which will allow it to build itself on the principle of man's relationship with God, or, in other words, on the principle of mobilizing ideology, not coercion.

Question: Your Islamic ideology, if I understand it correctly, has as a goal a society without rich or poor, a society without classes in which man will not be satisfied only in a material way, but all his spiritual powers will flourish also. But, even if the distinction between the rich and poor disappears, could another great distinction exist in the society, that between, on one hand, the minority of special and governmental officials who control the state and, through this, are guardians of the entire society and, on the other, the majority of people who carry out commands from the other? (This, for example, is the case in the Soviet Union and other eastern societies.) What are, in your opinion, the changes which the Islamic Revolution must bring about so as to make this distinction disappear and arrive at a society in which man expands himself?

Answer: The worst class system is that which is based on inequality of knowledge, of information. Let us suppose that we create a society in which prevails equality only as concerns material goods, for example, food, housing, etc. However, can the ignorant ever be in a relation of equality with those who possess knowledge? We will have to destroy censorship in Iran. We will have to make knowledge, information, a prerequisite of equality in making political decisions.

The people will have to be absolutely aware of what is happening in our society. We must go to the people, not sit behind closed doors, to make decisions. The other method is the method of bureaucracy and technocracy. Our own method is the method, the principle, of mobilizing the ideologic factor and this must become a deep awareness in the people. If we sit within our offices and make decisions, the people do not know why we are doing this or that. But if we come to the people, if we speak to the people, if we present the problem to the people, then it is much, much better. This inequality (to which I referred) will be destroyed. For this, we must say to the people that we do not need coercion, we do not need to use coercion. The only thing which we have need of, which we require, is for us to acquire knowledge and, more, to acquire greater and greater information, so that everyone in the society has the information needed to know what is happening in the society. I reject the use of coercion because I know that this will lead us to failure, to destruction. I know that if we use coercion, we will return to the previous regime.

Question: In your book "The Economy of the Divine Unity" you wrote that everyone in the society must do three forms of work: manual labor, administrative work (directing, deciding, governing) and investigative or creative work (researching, innovating, inventing). Please analyze this principle.

Answer: In all the existing social systems, one of these three forms of work acquires a dominant role and prevails. In the system which we call "Tohindi," that is, "divine unity," the work of governing and investigation is the principal work of mankind. And this is the principal role of every man.

What are the characteristics of this system? This system is based on the abolishment of opposing forces. It is based on that which we call man's relationship with God, not with others. In order for one to achieve this, great investigation, great innovation, great creation is demanded. Consequently, ideology plays a very significant role for the creation of the new society.

In short, I would say that the answer you are seeking can also be found in another book of mine called "Governing and Implementation of Governing."

Question: Would you like to send any message to the Greek people?

Answer: The things I said are equivalent to a message. But tell them that this ideologic current which the west has imposed on societies today results in the destruction, the complete destruction, of all of mankind's values. The dimensions of this destruction increase more and more every day.

Mankind, slowly or swiftly, must forget the use of coercion for ever and mobilize ideology, spirituality, in its place.

In my opinion, we must not come to terms with the destructive forces, the imperialist forces of the west or east. But we will have to become aware that the use of coercion is not a solution for us.

In this way, only in this way, will we become aware that the planet Earth is sufficient for mankind, that mankind does not need anything else.

FRANJIYAH DISCUSSES POLITICAL TRENDS, HIS, LEBANON'S FUTURE

Nicosia AL-'ASR in Arabic 3 Oct 80 pp 7, 12

[Interview with Former Lebanese President Sulayman Franjiyah, Conducted by GAMMA Correspondent Lilian Beret]

[Text] This interview with Former Lebanese President Sulayman Franjiyah was conducted by French journalist Lilian Beret for the GAMMA News Agency. Pictures were taken during the interview by the agency's French photographer, Jean Pierre DuVille. The French journalist prefaced her interview with the following remarks.

"Former President Sulayman Franjiyah, who held the post of Lebanese president from 1970 to 1976 and who is now 70 years old, has lived in his summer retreats at Ihdin and in a mountainous area of northern Lebanon controlled by his so-called "al-Mardah" militia ever since the assassination of his son Deputy Tony Franjiyah and more than 30 other supporters on 13 June 1978.

"From time to time there are armed scuffles and clashes between his supporters and the armed men of the Phalangist Party, which is led by Shaykh Pierre al-Jumayyil. Even though he moved from the capital, Beirut, Sulayman Franjiyah is still the leader of a cohesive group of supporters, and remains the weightiest leader with respect to the Lebanese political situation. He is the main ally of the Syrians, and no government can be formed in Lebanon without his approval. Last August, he used his veto power against the formation of the government of Lebanese technocrats, which would have included a representative of the Phalangist Party. Recently, he has reached a 'gentlemen's agreement' with the progressive forces of the 'National Movement' and with Former Prime Minister Rashid Karami, in order to combat Bashir al-Jumayyil and the forces of the 'Lebanese Front.'" Here are the questions and answers.

[Question] Ever since the end of your term, you have been continually receiving visitors--Lebanese leaders and foreigners--at your homes at Ihdin or Zgharta. Exactly why are they visiting you?

[Answer] According to Lebanese traditions, the home must remain open to everyone. This applies to the president of the republic as well as to any Lebanese citizen. Some of those whom I receive visit me in order to inquire after my health and to get my news, out of friendship. Others visit me to tell me of their problems, in view of my experience. There are a few groups which visit me to seek information about national problems--as you know, there are many and varied problems in Lebanon--so that they can take some sort of general stand on them.

At the present time, Lebanese politics is divided into several trends having conflicting goals. I personally see three main political trends:

1. a policy which strives to restore our country to its pre-civil war situation; this is the policy which I follow;

2. a policy followed by others to create a religious, racist state; and

3. a group which wants to establish a canton system.

But I personally continue to promote the same slogan: a unified Lebanese state free to determine its own destiny.

Why Doesn't the Army Move In?

[Question] But doesn't the idea of forming a "national unity" government seem to you to be a kind of delusion?

[Answer] The phrase "national unity" certainly does not have the same connotation in Lebanon as it has in Europe. In Europe, there are political parties which want to be represented in the government. If one of these parties is not represented in the government, it moves over to the ranks of the opposition.

In Lebanon, the political parties coexist with groups belonging to several sects --Maronites, Shi'ites and Sunnis. If one wants to speak of a national unity government, these sects must be represented in it. All the governments formed in Lebanon included representatives in the ratio of 50 percent for the Christians and 50 percent for the Moslems. Therefore, instead of forming a government containing ministers representing the combatants, a government must be formed which includes representatives of the sects. The latest formula for forming a government, presented through mediators to those in the government, was as follows: If we take the Republican Palace as the center of gravity, why doesn't it order the Lebanese army, supported by the Arab deterrent forces, to advance one km every day in all directions? In less than 100 days the army would be able to extend the sovereignty and influence of the Lebanese government to all of Lebanon.

On this basis, and if a specific date is set for achieving this goal, I would grant the people in power full freedom to appoint whatever ministers they choose, without my being represented personally.

But if people insist on bringing "technocrats" into the government, these technocrats will continue to clash among themselves inside the palace. Any government which is concerned only with current affairs and red tape matters, without asserting its powers, will serve no purpose no matter what it is.

Relations With Syria

[Question] To be precise, don't the powers of the Lebanese government depend on Syria's good intentions? Didn't the Syrian forces enter Lebanon at your request? How do you justify that now?

[Answer] I would be ready to do it again, without any doubt. The best example that I was right is as follows: when the Arab summit conference met in Riyadh at the beginning of President Ilyas Sarkis' term, the Arab leaders adopted this solution during that conference, and resolved to send Arab forces to restore order and peace to all parts of Lebanon and to separate the combatants.

[Question] But that initiative was presumably temporary. How long will the Syrian forces stay in Lebanon?

[Answer] The Syrian forces today represent the orders of the Lebanese authorities. Every 6 months the Lebanese requests the renewal of these forces' presence. For this reason, anyone who feels that the presence of these forces constitutes a danger to Lebanon's future logically ought to attack the authorities who request the renewal of their term, because the Lebanese government is responsible for this and not the Syrians themselves.

[Question] Your friendship with Syrian President Hafiz al-Asad is well-known. How did it begin?

[Answer] My friendship began with the family and father of the present Syrian president, and then shifted to Hafiz al-Asad himself when he was a soldier and then president of the republic. This friendship has not changed; it consists of old family ties, not political ones.

[Question] But it is hard for you to not think of political matters. For example, what do you think of the recent Syrian alliance with the Soviet Union? Do you agree with it?

[Answer] To be able to make a correct judgment on the policy of the president of the republic, a person must be informed as to the situation in Syria before President al-Asad's time, especially the economic situation. The changes are obvious and great. As for al-Asad's policy towards foreign states, that is up to him, and it is up to him alone to decide the line he will follow in light of his country's interests. I would like to add that because of the Israeli alliance with the United States, any leader who wants to preserve his country's interests has to tend towards an alliance with the Soviet Union. We have to recognize that the United States considers only Israel in the Middle East.

[Question] Some people have expressed their fear of Syria's intentions towards Lebanon. What do you say?

[Answer] I feel that this is sheer extortion. If Syria really wanted to expand its territory or extend its sovereignty to Lebanon, what is preventing it from doing so now? Part of its army is already in Lebanon, and we have no government. The world has forgotten that our country exists. Syria is present in the heart of Lebanon and in the midst of Lebanese politics, as proven by the fact that before the president of the republic appoints any ministers, he sends delegates to Damascus to find out the Syrian president's point of view. Under these circumstances, why doesn't our neighbor take advantage of this situation?

I repeat that as long as al-Asad is president of Syria, he will desire nothing but Lebanon's well-being. Anything else is sheer extortion and a threat to exploit it by some Lebanese groups outside of Lebanon.

The End of Israel!

[Question] There is another current issue that concerns Lebanon for better or worse, and that is the unification of Jerusalem, after the Knesset's July voting to resolve this issue. What is your opinion?

[Answer] The unification and Judaization of Jerusalem is the most serious issue with respect to the whole world, not just Lebanon or Moslems or Christians. If the Christian world does not act against this decision, I am convinced that this will mean the end of everything for the Christian religion. This is because after the unification of Jerusalem, how could those who do not believe in Christianity respect what it represents?

My first reaction upon hearing of the Knesset decision was, "This decision is the beginning of the end for Israel." Let us look at the past. What do we see? That 1,000 years ago all the European states united to launch a crusaders' war to conquer Jerusalem. Three hundred years later, they were expelled from it. History always repeats itself, but nowadays it won't take 300 years to do so--it will repeat itself as soon as the Arabs reach an understanding among themselves. If this policy continues, Israel will fall soon.

[Question] The Palestinian cause is only one step removed from Israel. Do you believe that the Palestinian cause will be settled some day?

[Answer] That will be no surprise to me. In any case, I feel that Israel cannot remain if it continues its present policy. I hope that the Palestinian issue will be solved according to Resolution 242, which calls for restoring the situation to its pre-June 1967 war situation.

[Question] What conditions are necessary for achieving that?

[Answer] The only thing which the solution requires is an American president with a humane conscience who can implement such a solution.

With Arafat? No!

[Question] We know that you are always receiving Palestinian delegations. Does this mean that you have secret relations with Yasir 'Arafat? If there are such relations, what is their purpose?

[Answer] There most certainly aren't any secret relations. In fact, Yasir 'Arafat has unfortunately never understood us, and is not interested in establishing relations with the Lebanese authorities in general. Everything which has been said is erroneous, and I am wondering when we can say "enough!"

But I certainly do receive Palestinians in northern Lebanon from the Tripoli region, whether at Ihdin or at Zgharta.

The purpose of such meetings is extremely clear--to establish peace and mutual understanding in the north. So far these visits have had positive results.

[Question] Are you optimistic about the next few months?

[Answer] Relatively speaking, especially after 2 years.

[Question] Why 2 years?

[Answer] Because President Sarkis' term will end after 2 years, unless he heeds the citizens' call and resigns before that time.

A State Without Movement

[Question] What is your basic opposition to President Sarkis?

[Answer] His inactivity. It is extremely serious, especially under our country's present circumstances, that matters are proceeding as they are without his reacting to them forcefully. We have a republican president who depends on the days. Many people, including ourselves, feel that we were mistaken about his abilities. Nevertheless, he has the means of doing something. The Arab and western worlds are prepared to back and support him. Let me give a single proof, one which can be revealed. Compare the situation and conduct of the Italian president with that of the Lebanese president. During a period of 2 days, there were disasters in both countries: an attack in Bologna (Italy) and the 7 July incidents in Lebanon. The attack in Bologna resulted in the deaths of more than 80 persons, and in Lebanon, if I can trust Danny Sham'un, who came here to meet me, the 7 July incidents resulted in the death of 350 persons. In Italy, the 85-year old president, who has no real powers in his country, felt it was his duty to attend the victims' funerals.

[Question] At that time, the internal divisions of every camp were aroused. Do you believe that what some people call the "mini-war" between the al-Jumayyil and the Franjiyah families will find a truce or solution some day?

[Answer] I don't see how. In any case, a complete solution to the Lebanese crisis could be achieved through a government which wanted to control every part of Lebanon, except for the Lebanese south, which is outside our control.

As for forgiving them for killing my son Tony, without a trial this will never be. But after the trial, why not?

[Question] Mr President, you have withdrawn to what many people describe as the "fortress," and you are tied down night and day by your armed forces, the Mardah. Don't you feel sometimes that you are a prisoner, albeit a voluntary one?

[Answer] On some days I can imagine myself a prisoner, although a voluntary one in any case. Besides that, one of my personality traits is that even when I was president of the republic, I saved time for myself to spend with my family and my private affairs. How can you think that I am a prisoner in what you describe as a "fortress?" Look around you. The people living in this area have maintained their traditions. During the summer they go to Zgharta or Ihdin where the weather is cooler. I don't believe that they are unhappy. Then too, you must not forget that I don't leave the region very much, for I am getting too old for that.

[Question] What constitutes the Franjiyah entourage now, on the military and popular levels?

[Answer] I cannot give exact figures, but in any case that is not up to me to comment on. On the personal level, the Franjiyah supporters are in the north, and go no farther than that. As for the political level, the Franjiyah supporters are something else. We have friends and persons supporting us throughout Lebanon, even in Beirut. But I will not say, as some people are saying, that 90 percent of the inhabitants of Lebanon are loyal to me.

I Could Succeed Sarkis

[Question] Do you believe that you still have a political future?

[Answer] If I have spoken freely and openly declared some facts perhaps more than others, that is precisely because I feel that I could succeed Sarkis.

[Question] Perhaps. In any case, no government can be formed without your approval. As we know, there has been much discussion of deputizing your son Robert. In your religion, is your son the one people listen to and interview? Is this the situation you want?

[Answer] My son Robert will have the same destiny as I have had. In 1957, I was concerned with local political matters in the village and the region, while my brother, Hamid Franjiyah, was concerned with general political matters. Unfortunately, my brother was stricken with an illness which prevented him from pursuing his activities and his way of life. It is a tradition in our family: the older one is concerned with politics and the younger one does what he wants.

After the disaster which happened to Tony, Robert was forced to assume responsibilities which he had not wanted in the first place. He is performing them well, and everyone trusts him totally.

[Question] Some people feel that this tradition and family or partisan spirit shows vestiges of feudalism.

[Answer] All I can say is that this region has managed to preserve the human element, which is scarce in other areas. We depend on it very much, and we know everyone by their first names only. For this reason, our home is open to everyone every day. Whenever anyone has a problem or has been treated unjustly, he comes to us so we can act as a judge. He is always satisfied with our decision and verdict. I feel that this is true socialism, and I am proud to say that it began here. Whenever any one of us is confronted with an obstacle, the whole village helps him, and the neighbors are ready to fix coffee and food.

France's Policy?

[Question] What do you think of France's foreign policy vis-a-vis the Middle East and Lebanon?

[Answer] I have nothing to say about French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing, but during the past few months I have come to feel that the French president was adopting a strong, extremely frank stand with respect to the Arab cause, even though it doesn't always have enough pressure, and that these stands reflect the president's innate concern for justice.

[Question] Nevertheless, many observers and Lebanese reproach France for being somewhat lacking in concern for the Lebanese crisis.

[Answer] I have often complained about France's unconcern for what is going on in Lebanon, at least the unconcern of the country's eladers. But we have always been able to say that we are not living in the eighteenth or nineteenth century, and that every state has to concern itself with its own problems. However, I believe that the French people's friendship for Lebanon will never dwindle, as proven by a simple but touching story. I have a Lebanese friend who hires a taxi when he arrives in Paris to go around the French capital. When the driver learned his nationality, he refused to charge him any fare, saying, "You live in a war-torn country, and you need sympathy more than I do."

The European Initiative

[Question] Does it seem to you that the Middle East visit by Common Market Representative Gaston Thorn was of any use?

[Answer] I doubt it. Many leaders and representatives from the United States and Europe have made similar fact-finding trips before Thorn, including the Vatican's foreign minister, but these officials don't know all of the many details of the Lebanese issue, and therefore their role is extremely limited.

FOREIGN MINISTER DISCUSSES SAHARAN QUESTION IN FRANCE

LD301319 Rabat MAP in English 1219 GMT 30 Oct 80

[Text] Paris, 30 Oct (MAP)--Mr M'hamed Boucetta, Moroccan minister of state in charge of foreign affairs and cooperation, was received here Wednesday afternoon by President Valery Giscard d'Estaing of France to whom he conveyed a message from King Hassan II of Morocco.

At the end of this audience, Mr Boucetta told newsmen that the message was "a message of friendship." Then he gave explanations of his mission in France and made comments on the latest developments of the Moroccan cause.

The minister mainly said "I am here to lead the Moroccan delegations at the works of the great Moroccan-French joint commission devoted to the study of the whole relation between our two countries, and I have conveyed a royal message of friendship to the French president which expressed our will to maintain the excellence of these relations and develop them."

The Moroccan minister went on saying "Of course we spoke of problems of common interest and the evolution of the situation in North Africa."

Asked whether the Moroccan Sahara question was dealt with during the meeting, Mr Boucetta said "We always tackle the situation in North Africa, because we are all concerned. It concerns Morocco in particular and it concerns its friends who would like to see peace, and stability re-established in the area."

When asked about the evolution of the situation in the Moroccan Sahara he said that it was progressing on the military plan, because Morocco totally controls the territory, and on the diplomatic plan, because attempts are being carried on at the African level, by the recommendations of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) and by the special committee which is entrusted with this affair.

The minister finally replied to a journalists' remark related to a better disposition of Algeria vis-a-vis Morocco since the coming to power of President Chadli Bendjedid saying "What we presently witness is that attacks are launched not against the Saharan provinces but against provinces to the north of the Sahara."

The minister further underlined, "We cannot say there is a radical charge at present."

JOINT COMMUNIQUE ON BOUCETTA VISIT

LD032337 Rabat MAP in English 1216 GMT 3 Nov 80

[Text] Paris, 3 Nov (MAP)--The workers of the third Moroccan-French intergovernmental commission ended here Friday under the chairmanship of Mr M'hamed Boucetta, Moroccan minister of state in charge of foreign affairs and cooperation, and Mr Jean Francois Poncet, his French counterpart, in an atmosphere of confidence and serenity.

At the end of these works, a joint communique was published in which it is first recalled that the Moroccan-French permanent intergovernmental commission which met here on 30-31 October 1980, was created by an agreement concluded here on 2 July 1971 between Morocco and France.

During the two day meeting, Mr Boucetta was received by French President Mr Valery Giscard d'Estaing, as well as by French premier, Mr Raymond Barre.

Mr Boucetta and his French counterpart made a tour d'horizon of problems of international politics.

The two men confirmed the attachment of their countries to the cause of peace and security and to the respect of the independence and territorial integrity of states.

They expressed concern over the prolongation of the Iraqi-Iranian conflict and their support to attempts to put an end to it through peaceful means.

They exchanged viewpoints on the evolution of the Middle East conflict and reaffirmed that only a global settlement taking into account the Palestinians' rights is susceptible of securing a just and lasting peace in the region.

They also reaffirmed their governments' condemnation and the international condemnation of the Israeli measures aimed at modifying the statute [as received] of the city of Al-Quds, and the necessity for Europe to carry on its action in this line.

The ministers expressed their satisfaction at the next resuming of the Euro-Arab dialogue and emphasized the interest the two countries grant the tripartite dialogue aimed at a closer cooperation between Europe, the Arab world and Africa.

Mr Boucetta and Mr Francois Poncet discussed the situation in Africa and expressed concern over the tension currently prevailing in Africa. Then they examined with particular attention questions raised by the relations existing between Morocco and the European Economic Community.

The two ministers expressed satisfaction at the positive evolution of bilateral relations in various fields, first in technical and cultural cooperation where they decided to step up efforts in education and the training of cadres, then in the economic field where several questions were examined and means to encourage the current tendency aimed at reestablishing balance in trade exchanges were sought. Questions related to the Moroccan community in France were also examined and consultations in this regard will be carried on.

The two ministers finally expressed satisfaction at the positive results of the works of the commission and Mr Boucetta warmly thanked the French minister for the welcome the Moroccan delegation was met with and invited Mr Francois Poncet to visit Morocco. It is to be recalled that Mr Boucetta was received here Friday by the French president to whom he conveyed a message from King Hassan II of Morocco, and Friday with Mr Barre, French premier, who accepted an invitation from his Moroccan counterpart Mr Maata Bouabid to visit Morocco next January.

MAURITANIAN INTERVENTION IN WESTERN SAHARA EXAMINED

Rabat L'OPINION in French 27 Sep 80 p 1

[Editorial by Mohamed Tamri: "The Imponderables"]

[Text] Upon receiving Mauritania's new ambassador to Paris, the French president reaffirmed that his country "can only approve a policy of authentic neutrality with regard to the conflict now going on" in the Sahara.

Emphasizing that the neutrality proclaimed in Nouakchott must be authentic, President Giscard d'Estaing does not for a moment doubt the direct involvement of Mauritania in a conflict raging on its borders, within which the mercenaries find bases and seek refuge, mercenaries whose ranks are constantly supplied with Mauritanian citizens. As King Hassan II said at his latest press conference, the forces which Morocco finds in the field are 2 to 5 percent Saharan, about 25 percent Malian and Niger and the rest Mauritanians.

The Mauritanian coast is also placed at the disposal of these same mercenaries and they are the authors of all the attacks recently made on Spanish, South Korean and Portuguese fishing boats.

This demonstrates to what extent a country that was long Morocco's ally is now committed to its detractors. One can also see the great difference between the proclamations of faith of the Mauritanian leaders and their actions. That is what emerges from the statement of the French president when he emphasizes that the proclaimed neutrality must be authentic.

The French policy on Mauritania, taking its interests into account, has always been to use it as a buffer between Senegal in particular and the Arab-Muslim world. However, since the overthrow of President Ould Daddah, the Mauritanian governments that have come after him, especially that of Ould Haidallah, by virtue of their incoherence and the contradictions characterizing their positions and their overall concept of regional balance, distort the scenario and introduce so many imponderables that the balance is increasingly threatened.

In his statement before the Mauritanian ambassador, Giscard d'Estaing added that his wish was to "see an overall settlement to the painful problem that concerns a region in which France has only friends."

The wish of the French president joins the concerns of Morocco, whose most fervent desire is to see peace return to our region and which is doing its utmost to bring it about. But in order for this wish to come true, it must be shared by the other parties in the conflict, which does not appear to be the case at the present time for the Mauritanian leaders, whose policy can only add fuel to the fire in short-range terms.

As King Hassan II emphasizes: "If Mauritania is not careful, as a nation and as a government, it will have to pay the price for this inevitable peace. It will not be Morocco that will do so."

The warning is clear: "If Mauritania is not careful, if the Mauritanian authorities do not check the freedom they are giving their nationals to become involved in an adventure against a friendly, neighboring country, one day there will inevitably be peace" and Mauritania will suffer the consequences."

BRIEFS

PROTEST OVER MOROCCO VISIT--The Queen's visit to Morocco has elicited a protest from the Sahara Action Committee based in London. At a news conference at the Africa Centre in London the Committee, a representative of the Sahrawi Arab Democratic republic, Kamal Lajer, and a Labor member of Parliament, Mr Christopher Price, all registered their disquiet at the implications of the Queen's visit to Morocco and the possibility that it might be used by Moroccan propaganda. The protest, which was signed by several British parliamentarians, noted that "in view of Britain's claim that it is neutral in the conflict, a royal visit to Morocco is surely inadvisable." The committee called on the British government to review its policy adding that "if it wishes to be even-handed it should maintain relations with both parties to the conflict--Morocco and the Polisario Front." Letters have already been written to the Foreign Office concerning the visit. The reply said, in effect, that the visit bore no relation to Morocco's activities in Western Sahara. Buckingham Palace simply referred the committee to its correspondence with the Foreign Office and added that the Queen's visits are arranged on the advice of her ministers. The one thing which saves the Moroccan visit from any embarrassing political consequences is the continuing ignorance of the British public of the conflict in Western Sahara. Mr Price, who made no pretense to being an expert on the Western Sahara, also voiced concern on the possibility of British arms sales to Morocco, now that the Iranian market, on which the British arms industry had come to depend, has closed. Kamal Lajar, the representative of the SADR, confined direct comment on the royal visit to Morocco by observing that the "United Kingdom gained an image de marque in Zimbabwe. If the Queen is to visit Morocco, you can easily see, it will be harmful to that image de marque." [Text] [London WEST AFRICA in English 27 Oct 80 pp 2110-2111]

FORCES FOIL MERCENARY ATTACK--Rabat, 25 Oct (MAP)--The Royal Moroccan Armed Forces on 22 October foiled a planned mercenary attack south of Ras El Khannfra. The Royal Moroccan Air Force on a reconnaissance flight spotted enemy grouping estimated at several battalions and they immediately intervened to pursue the mercenary bands. They inflicted on them heavy losses in men and equipment. The intervention of the Royal Moroccan Air Force continued from 1000 to 1400. At 1500 the remnants of the mercenaries tried to regroup to mount a suicide action but the planes of the Royal Moroccan Air Froce supported by the artillery engaged them, foiled their plan, and made them retreat in defeat. The battles have resulted in the martyrdom of 14 and wounding of 65 of our men. The losses among the mercenary ranks were 150 killed and 60 enemy vehicles destroyed. [Text] [LD252010 Rabat MAP in Arabic 1530 GMT 25 Oct 80]

FORCES CONTINUE MOPPING-UP--The Moroccan Royal Forces continue their mopping-up operations in the south. On Sunday 26 October 1980 they surprised a column of mercenaries west of (El-Haouza) consisting of several units carried by more than 300 vehicles. The gangs of mercenaries tried in vain to confront the advance of our royal forces, whose reply was quick and effective. The land forces, supported by the Royal Air Force, put a complete stop to the advance of the mercenaries, who were forced to flee to the east and southeast. The Royal Armed Force achieved their goals in full and carried out the plan which had been drawn up for them. The battle lasted from 1300 to 1700. The Moroccan side lost 5 martyrs and 30 wounded. The mercenaries left on the battlefield 250 dead and wounded, and 80 vehicles--7 useable and the rest completely destroyed. [Text] [LD272110 Rabat Domestic Service in Arabic 2000 GMT 27 Oct 80]

GEOLOGY, ENERGY AGREEMENTS--5 Oct (MAP)--Early Friday evening, Moussa Saadi, minister of energy and mining research, arrived at the Mohammed V Airport following a short visit to Guinea and Senegal, in the course of which he met with Guinean and Senegalese colleagues to discuss cooperation in the areas of energy and mining. Minister Saadi was also received by President Ahmed Sekou Toure during his visit to Conakry and President Leopold Sedar Senghor during his stay in Senegal. Reporting on his trip to the two countries, the minister of energy and mining said that he had made the visit at the head of a large delegation for the purpose of improving Morocco's cooperation with Guinea and Senegal in the field of mining and energy. Referring to his visit to Guinea, Saadi said that the talks with his Guinean colleague Ismael Toure dealt with the different aspects of cooperation in mining, geology and energy. Saadi stated that agreements will be signed in this field between Morocco and Guinea as soon as the Moroccan experts who remained there have drafted the accords, probably at the time of Guinean Minister of Mining Ismael Toure's next visit to Morocco. Saadi said he was grateful for having been received by Ahmed Sekou Toure, president of the Republic of Guinea, to whom he extended the best wishes of the king on the occasion of the 23d anniversary of Guinea's independence. Speaking of his visit to Senegal, Saadi announced that his talks with Senegalese authorities were aimed at expanding cooperation in energy and mining, particularly through the conclusion of agreements between Morocco and Senegal in these fields. The minister expressed his satisfaction with the meeting with President Senghor, to whom he transmitted the fraternal greetings of King Hassan II. The minister of energy and mining was greeted upon his arrival by Hadj Mohamed Okacha, representing the governor in the prefecture of Casablanca, and by several high officials from his ministry. PROGRESS IN AGRICULTURE NOTED

[Article by Bill Wang: "Farmers Succeed in Growing New Red Rice Variety"]

[Text]

HOFUF, Oct. 26 (CNA) — Saudi farmers in Al-Hasa, the Kingdom's biggest oasis near the Arabian Gulf, have been successful in growing a new red rice variety developed by a Chinese agricultural mission to improve rice productivity in the region.

About 30 local farmers have been harvesting the rice they planted in May with the assistance of the Chinese mission. At that time the mission began an extension program to introduce to farmers the new variety, a hybrid between the local red rice variety of Hassawi and a dwarf, high-yield white variety produced in the Republic of China, Ai Chiao Chein.

On the average, the farmers have produced seven tons of rice per hectare of land, nearly two-and-a-half times as much as the local variety can yield from a plot of the same size. But what is more significant is that the new variety takes only four months to mature while the local variety will not be ready for harvest until six months after the planting.

Prof. Lin Cheng-i, leader of the mission, points out that the new variety has a strong ratooning ability. Therefore, after the first cutting, shoots will come out of the stems, and a second harvest can be expected in about another 80 days without the need for a new planting.

Because of the significantly reduced growth duration, Lin says, even after the second harvest, there will still be time for another crop of wheat or vegetable, thus achieving a full utilization of the land. In addition, there are other superior characteristics about the new variety. For example, it is considerably more resistent to salt than the local variety and can thrive on drainage water, which generally has a salt content nearly 50 per cent more than ordinary irrigation water in the region.

This has been demonstrated by a local farmer, Khalifi bin Shaio Al-Nuwaiser. Under the cooperation of Chinese experts, Nuwaiser had grown the new variety on a plot irrigated by drainage water, and the result was highly satisfactory. Even though Al-Hasa boasts of the best and most extensive irrigation system in the Kingdom there is still a lot of land out of its reach, and with the introduction of the new variety, the acreage of rice fields can be expected to increase considerably.

Of course, the Chinese mission's success didn't come overnight. In fact, it has been operating in Al-Hassa for more than a decade, and the amount of effort the mission has put in can probably never be matched by any other Chinese agricultural mission abroad.

This is due to the fact that the people in Al-Hasa have a special preference for red rice. The Republic of China has over the years produced many high-yield rice varieties, but none of them are of red variety. As a result, the mission has had to work from scratch and to breed an entirely new variety to satisfy the local people. Before the successful breeding of the current new variety, a number of other varieties had been produced by the mission. But they were far from satisfactory, and much effort had been exerted to modify their undesirable characteristics.

In 1977, immediately after his appointment to the current post, Prof. Lin decided to give up all the previously produced varieties and to start the work all over again.

This time he chose Ai Chiao Chien for the breeding of a new variety because the dwarf variety is early to nature, easy to grow and has a high yielding ability. From the offsprings of hybridization between Ai Chiao Chein and Hassawi, Lin picked out the new variety, which retains almost all the desirable characteristics of both varieties.

Last year, the mission invited farmers to its experimental farms and formally announced the successful development of the new rice. After enough seeds were produced, extension work was started earlier this year.

At first, most farmers were hesitant, and only some 30 of them would want to give the new variety a try. But after these farmers' resounding success, it has become the most sought-after rice variety in the region. Apart from its success in rice, the mission has also brought about a monumental change in the production of vegetables and melons in Al-Hassa.

The cantaloupe and watermelon introduced to the region by the Chinese mission have enriched King Khaled's table. In fact, the King likes the fruits so much that he has asked the mission to grow some of the melons in the garden of his summer palace in Taif.

In the past, farmers had never succeeded in growing watermelon in Al-Hassa because the time suitable for growing the melon here is too short. The only time suitable is the period between March and May. Before March it is too cold, and after May it is too hot.

To prolong the cultivable period, the mission introduced the use of PE covering to protect the plant from damage caused by low temperatures. As a result, the seeds can be planted in February, and the melon grows very well in the region.

The mission has applied the same method to the production of cucumbor. To everyone's surprise, the yield of one variety has doubled while that of another has quadrupled.

Some of the vegetables the mission has introduced to the region have brought fortune to local farmers. Among them is Chinese cabbage. When the vegetable was first introduced, the local people were not too crazy about it because they thought it was too coarse to be served as salad.

But Chinese cabbage is extremely popular with the Chinese and Koreans working in the area, and a scramble for the vegetable has steadily driven its price up. Currently, a Chinese cabbage is sold for SR15. The profit margin can be astronishing since farmers can produce 30,000 cabbages from a hectare of land within a period of two months.

After three years of working here, Prof. Lin has discovered that there are many favorable factors for agricultural development in the Kingdom. For example, crops generally grow better here because they get sufficient sunlight. In addition, crops here are rarely attacked by disease since germs are not so active in a place with such a long and hot summer.

He believes the Kingdom will be able to achieve some measure of self-sufficiency in agriculture as long as farmers are equipped with advanced farming techniques and motivated by enough incentives.

OILFIELD DEVELOPMENTS--More than 70 technical papers covering the most important developments in Saudi and Gulf oilfields are to be presented in Bahrain at a major conference in March, according Richard Savage of Bahrain's Exhibition Center. The specialist gathering, which is aimed at the region's top oil technologists, is organized by the Society of Petroleum Engineers. It will be held from March 9 through 12, 1981, at the Exhibition Center Bahrain, alongside the second Middle East Oil Show. The program committee is chaired by Saudi Arabia's Deputy Minister of Petroleum Ahmed Zamel. He announced that more than 120 papers had been presented for consideration during two days of extensive discussions. After stressing the high technical quality of the papers presented, Zamel said, "I am working with a committee of high caliber expects in the oil industry to ensure good standards of technical presentations. "This important event will provide an opportunity for engineers, scientists, managers and technicians to exchange views and ideas on important issues that are encountered specifically in the Gulf area," he added. Before leaving Bahrain, the fifteen-man selection committee of international experts inspected the new conference facilities nearing completion at November's building, construction and solar technology show, Arab-build '80. SYRIA LOOKS FOR NEW, CHEAPER WAYS TO GENERATE ELECTRICITY

Damascus AL-BA'TH in Arabic 25 Aug 80 pp 4, 11

[Article: "Observations on the Situation and Future of Electricity in Our Country: The 'Adhra Electric Generation Station Uses Solar Energy; The Local Beginnings of Use of an Inexhaustible Energy Source"]

[Text] It is anticipated that our country's consumption of electricity in the coming 5 years will double. This increase means that the rate of dependence on oil derivatives for electric generation will also increase. This year it is estimated that we consume 4 billion kilowatt hours. The hydroelectric power plant on the Euphrates River will ensure us of 2.8 billion kilowatt hours, i.e. roughly 70 percent of our consumption of electricity while the remaining water-power stations--Suq Wadi Barada in Damascus, al-Rustam, and Muhradah stations--will ensure us another 10 percent. Thus the total share of waterpower used in electricity generation in our country will be in the vicinity of 80 percent of the total electric power we produce.

However, electricity consumption is rapidly increasing in our country. It even surpasses the theme which the party has maintained: 'Electricity in the villages every day', since just in the first trimester of this year 152 villages had electricity installed. Add to this the additional housing units, factories, and new establishments all demanding increased electric consumption.

Engineer Muhammad al-Shaqfah, technical consultant to the minister of electricity informed us that our country's consumption in 1985 will be 8 billion kilowatt hours, and in his estimation the median amount that water-generated power can give will represent only about 30 percent of the total electric power generated in Syria in 1985. It is obvious that water-generated power contributes a fixed amount whereas consumption is a rising variable. According to his estimates, Syria will need 1.6 million tons of fuel oil in 1985 to ensure the total demand for electricity that year. It is axiomatic that these figures will increase exponentially in the years that follow 1985. Under the circumstances of rising oil prices, the search for a substitute for electric generation appears urgent. The attempt must be made to moderate our consumption of electricity.

In this context, Mr al-Shaqfah is pointing out our country's poverty in water power and that it is imperative for us to look for two sources for electric power generation: reliance on nuclear energy and second, solar energy.

We have observed or read of projects in the Ministry of Electricity in our country that there is a foreign company that has asked permission to conduct a study of the subject of utilizing water power along the coastal regions to generate electricity. There's another company that is studying the use of [oil] shale also which is plentiful in Syria. Proposals have been gradually completed in order to start economic and technical studies about the possibility of utilizing nuclear power for electric power generation in Syria. Likewise an experimental station for generating electricity from solar energy and from wind has been set up in 'Adhra.

In the opinion of the technical consultant of the minister the solar solution is the most preferable since all the other power sources will be exhausted in the world whereas solar power is inexhaustible. However, electric generation by means of the sun still remains extremely complicated. The initial costs of a kilowatt hour comes to 200,000 lira, relying on the costs of the experimental station at 'Adhra. Whereas the initial cost of a kilowatt hour in steam driven stations comes to 2,000 lira and using nuclear reactor generators, 10,000 lira. In his estimation the interval separating the serious decision to build a nuclear reactor to generate electricity and the time when this experimental station can profitably be used must be only 10 years, even though some studies indicate that this hiatus will be 20 years.

Perhaps the figures that we've been given present us with a clear picture of a country steadily advancing, for it is well known that electricity is civilization, and that the more consumption of electricity increases, the more work and comfort there is to raise people's hopes. However this is not inconsistent with runaway increases in the cost of obtaining electricity. Initially, we must look for additional water power which is considered one of the cheapest sources of electricity. The positive picture referred to above must become even more profound in the sense that we will surely consume more electricity. This will compel us to search for alternative sources to oil because of the crisis and the continuous rise in prices this commodity displays. Under the present circumstances there is no alternative to the nuclear solution for electricity except that this does not prevent us from utilitizing solar power for space and water heating. It is well known that the apparatus which can achieve this power transfer is cheap and abundant. It would increase electricity so that we can use it in place of oil derivatives. It is axiomatic that it will not be long before the world solves the present difficulties facing the transfer of solar energy into electricity at reasonable costs.

TWO PROVINCES START ACTIVE ROAD BUILDING PROGRAMS

Damascus AL-BA'TH in Arabic 20 Aug 80 p 4

[Article from the SYRIAN ARAB NEWS AGENCY: "A Start in Work on the Ring-Road for Homs. Work on More than 100 Road Projects in the Two Provinces of Tartus and Suwayda"]

[Text]--General Fu'ad 'Absi, governor of Homs, asked the Syrian Road Company to begin maintenance and improvement work on the axis road of Homs which stretches from the oil refinery to the fork to the Palmyra road. The costs of this road will come to 8 million lira. In addition the Homs ring-road project planned to run from the end of the Damascus highway to the Tripoli road will be completed and will cost about 80 million lira.

In Tartus the director of communications confirmed that more than 100 principal and secondary road projects have been entrusted to the directorate of communications for their completion this year in order to improve and enhance the highway system and to facilitate the movement of public transport to and from the city centers, neighborhoods and outlying areas.

These projects will cost about 30 million lira.

The director of communications praised comrade Danhu Da'wud, governor of Tartus, for the support and measures that he took and which gave the directorate the opportunities to accomplish these projects on schedule.

He also pointed out in his statement to correspondents of the ARAB NEWS AGENCY that the completion of one of ten projects in the countryside had come to a cost of 3 million lira.

He said that the longest network of roads in the province was the mountain roads and that they required special work and bridges, since they are exposed to the destructive processes of heavy rains which don't allow the directorate's workshops with their meagre resources to undertake as promptly as possible the preventive maintenance and repairs measures that are needed in response to these processes of nature.

He added that the directorate needed to improve its important job with more modern equipment and by continously training the skilled workers needed to maintain the roads.

He pointed out that the Syrian Roads Company is now entrusted with the work of widening, expanding, and upgrading the Tartus-Safita and the Tartus-Duraykish roads.

During the next five-year plan work on the Tartus-Shaykh Badr, Baniyas-Qadmus, and Shaykh Badr-Duraykish roads will be finished.

He mentioned at the end of his announcement that the directorate in cooperation with the party branch office and the local branch of the Revolution Youth Union and the executive office of the local administration has taken possession of a number of secondary roads necessary for the peasant populace by means of using the youth production and training camps.

Likewise, the communications directorate in Suwayda has undertaken eleven road projects within the province.

The sum of 6 million lira has been appropriated for this work. These projects will be completed during the current year. They are included in the directorate plan of maintaining the road network in the province.

ALEPPO'S NEW CEMENT FACTORY--The military housing authority has decided on setting up a cement factory in Aleppo with a daily production capacity of 1,200 tons of cement. This is in order to ensure enough cement for its development projects. An official in the authority indicated that the total cost of setting up this project shall reach 150 million lira and he expects it will be completed and begin production at the beginning of 1982. In other news the first experimental phase of the production program of the Arab Cement Company began recently with a capacity of 3,000 tons of cement daily. This is in preparation for shifting the plant to an actually profitable level at the beginning of next year. It should be mentioned that the total cost of the project could approach in the environs of 940 million lira considering the present completion costs of the plant. THE APPROPRIATIONS BUDGET'S PROJECTS--The level of expenditures of projects assigned in the separate budget for 1980 was exceptional and came to 25 million Syrian lira. A member of the executive committee of the provincial assembly announced this yesterday and added that five projects of the original 16 projects slated in the investment budget for 1980 had been completed. Their costs have reached 21.15 million lira. The necessary preliminary studies for the remaining projects are now being finished so that they can be contracted. This executive committee member explained that the completion rate of the maintenance plans was 60 percent since an appropriation of the sum of 6 million lira for these projects coming out of this year's budget was made. The military housing authority will shortly carry out the execution of the two projects in the administration building of the Water and Public Facilities authority at a total cost of 37 million lira. A responsible source in the provincial branch office of the housing authority announced this. He added that the authority expects to complete the two projects by the end of 1982. Recently an agreement was concluded between the Roadco Company and the city of Aleppo for the building and paving of various streets in the city's neighborhoods at a total cost of 4 million Syrian lira. The company has already begun work according to the contracted plan and it is expected that it will complete work on this at the end of the current year. LEADER DISCUSSES POLITICAL, ECONOMIC POLICIES

San'a' AL-THAWRAH in Arabic 9 Oct 80 p 2

/Article: "Text of the President and Commander's Responses to Press Questions Presented by Qatar Paper AL-RAYAH AL-QATARIYAH"/

/Text/ Question: Mr president, what is the 19th year of the September revolution bringing to the people of Yemen? What about the Committees of National Dialogue and Correction? Was it necessary to transfer such important matters to the activities of committees, causing us to fear bureaucratic procrastination and the dominance of the official character over the popular one?

Answer: There is no doubt that the 19th year of the revolution will witness a great evolution in the new life of Yemen, because it represents a continuation of the serious national revolutionary course which we have striven to assert through deed and practice in all areas. There is no doubt that it will witness the establishment of a revolutionary council elected publicly, freely and directly by all members of the people through the system set forth by the General Election Law we recently issued, which will win a victory for the course of the revolution in the process of reaffirming democracy and the practice of democracy. It will also witness the completion of the implementation of all comprehensive 5-year economic and social development plan projects and serious preparations for the second 5-year plan. However, the most important thing we aspire to achieve and realize in the 19th year of the revolution is the National Charter, since that is one of the most important vital pressing demands which will guarantee that some of the political ailments created by the illusion of a political vacuum, illegitimate personal aspirations and the impetuous leap into reality and vital truths are remedied.

Naturally, in order to achieve an important objective, it is necessary that people be assigned to carry it out--be that one person or more. Several tasks and activities in particular can only be carried out by a chosen group, and here is where the designation of the committees comes. There is no harm in that, as long as the committee performs its work and is followed up on by the leadership and the entity responsible for performing the job, since, if it fails, it will be dissolved and another committee will be formed which will be able to perform the work and the tasks assigned to it. Therefore there will be no fear for the activity of the committees as long as there are people constantly to follow up on their activities, which is what we are doing.

Question: Have the discussions between the two halves of Yemen arrived at a crystallization of the notion of union? Union is a legitimate right, but has it acquired an identity? Does the president feel that there are some Arab or foreign forces which might oppose the establishment of a strong state in the south of the Arabian Peninsula, in a sensitive location?

Answer: Our discussions with our brothers in the southern half of the nation are in order to reattain the enduring unity of Yemen. We are acting to embody a clear, specific notion of the nature and character of the union state through the bases and principles contained in the two Cairo Agreements, the Tripoli, Kuwait and San'a' statements, and other subsequent statements. The tasks assigned to various unity committees have been aimed at discussing this issue and reaching final agreement on it. There is no doubt that the committees have covered great and significant strides in this regard. Thanks to that, we recently took a number of important executive steps which will have the effect of bringing the day of union close, among them establishment of joint tourist, cultural, and commercial companies and organizations, unification of postal and communications systems, and so forth.

This confirms that we are proceeding along the proper path to reattain unity, before which no obstacle or impediment of any kind can stand since it is the destiny of the Yemeni people and its inevitable, ineluctable future. We do not feel that there are Arab forces opposed to the establishment of Yemeni unity--rather, everyone is encouraging its consummation, and the same is the situation with respect to friendly countries. There is no doubt that there are enemies of Yemeni unity, but they are in reality the enemies of the Arab nation and the enemies of its solidarity and unity, primarily Israel and the forces of international Zionism.

Question: Once again, the winds of danger have started to blow from the African Horn, now that Somalia has offered military facilities to America. What about Yemen, on the shores facing Somalia? What is the effect of that on the unity talks between the two halves of Yemen?

Answer: Any foreign military presence in the region will constitute a blatant threat and extreme danger to the peace, security and stability of the region. Therefore we are acting against all foreign military presence in the region, because that will become a direct cause for drawing the region to the brink of international struggles and a race for foreign dominance and influence, bringing direct damage on all the countries in it. We are not satisfied with this and others are not either. We are appealing to everyone to coordinate and cooperate in repelling it and overcoming it.

There is no doubt that such things as this can have no effect on the course of the program of dialogue underway between the two halves of the nation for the sake of the reattainment of unity.

Question: News has proliferated about Yemen's readiness to join the Perseverance and Steadfastness Front. To what extent is that correct, and what strategic and political dimension will Yemen add by joining it?

Answer: We are in favor of every Arab position which will have the effect of strengthening Arab forces and combining them and their resources in one entity which will be better able to confront the Israeli and Zionist enemy and enter into a decisive national struggle with him. This naturally does not mean, and does not commit us to join a specific bloc on the Arab stage, especially since Arab solidarity requires that we all go beyond blocs toward a single specific position uniting Arab statements, mobilizing all resources and powers, and employing them to one end, which is the attainment of victory in our inevitable battle of destiny.

Question: Have the Arab countries in general and the Gulf states in particular offered the requisite economic support to deal with some of the economic situations Yemen is suffering from? Has the necessary aid been presented or is their aid below the requisite level?

Answer: There is no doubt--and this we do not deny--that many Arab countries, Arab Gulf countries in particular, are playing their national part as far as we are concerned by embracing a number of important projects which will help us achieve economic and social development and progress; the space would be very long if we tried to get into details. However, we would like to stress here that our urgent developmental needs are receiving full understanding and care from our brothers who are able to provide it, and, were it not for the generous aid we are receiving from them, we would not have been able to make these great strides in the process of construction, development and gorwth.

Question: What are the features of the second 5-year plan? Is it accompanied by a cultural educational plan to move the productive capabilities of the Yemenis forward?

Answer: In preparing the second 5-year plan we will concentrate on building the domestic economy and translating the principle of self-reliance into reality by concentrating on productive projects, be they agricultural or industrial, especially since we have concentrated on the construction of the basic structures of development in our first 5-year plan. We have made substantial strides in this, as well as realizing basic essential services. This means that we will also concentrate on human development and preparation of the staffs and the technical and scientific capabilities production requires.

Question: Is Yemen suffering from a human drain through the emigration of many of its people to work in Arab and foreign countries?

Answer: Not to a large extent, because our country is rich in tremendous human resources and we have an abundant reserve of workers. However, we are deficient in technicians. Emigration helps us acquire this type of technical worker who returns to the homeland after acquiring skills which are not available here and technical expertise we really are deficient in.

Question: What is the extent of your relationship with the state of Qatar?

Answer: We are linked to the fraternal state of Qatar by warm fraternal relations which have deep historic roots. These are well developed relations which serve the interests of the two fraternal states and their common national aspirations.

I consider this a valuable opportunity to praise the role the fraternal state of Qatar is playing in supporting and backing the course of development of our country and helping us in many fields.

FATAH MEMBER COMMENTS ON IRAN-IRAQ WAR

Beirut MONDAY MORNING in English 20-26 Oct 80 pp 50-61

[Interview with Abu Iyad, Fatah Central Committee member, by Lydia Georgi]

[Excerpts] The Palestine Liberation Organization has proposed a "face-saving" plan to end the Iraqi-Iranian war and has high hopes that Baghdad and Tehran will accept it, according to Salah Khalaf (Abu Iyad), ranking member of Fateh's Central Committee.

In a private interview with MONDAY MORNING, Abu Iyad outlined the Palestinian plan as follows:

--A cease-fire will be declared;

--Iraq will announce its readiness to withdraw to the borders specified by the 1975 Algiers treaty or the 1913 treaty of Constantinople;

--Iran will immediately announce that it is ready to enter into direct negotiations with Iraq in any neutral country if Iraqi forces pull out of Iranian territory;

--Islamic or non-aligned states will supervise the withdrawal of Iraqi troops, after which negotiations will start.

A translation of the full interview, which was conducted in Arabic, follows:

You have said that the PLO will continue its mediation between Iraq and Iran and is planning to propose a solution for the problem between the two countries. Do you think you will be more successful than you were in the first mediation attempt?

When the matter involves an attempt to end a conflict between two countries which we believe are themselves being harmed by the war, the important thing is not whether we succeed or not; the important thing is that we have taken a stand in support of the principle of the cessation of hostilities between two countries which are among the major supporters of the Palestinian Revolution.

That is why, since the visit of Abu Ammar (to Baghdad and Tehran), we have taken every possible measure, we have thought out loud, and we have sometimes made contacts behind the scenes to put a stop to this war.

I believe the time will come when our call will be heeded, because the two sides will discover that our call is right, and that this war was planned to last until the capabilities of both sides are exhausted. They will also discover that it has been decided that no one is to be victorious in this war – neither Iraq nor Iran.

The United States, which I believe is indirectly encouraging the war, is keen on weakening the two countries and anxious to prevent either of them from emerging as the victor. It does not want Iran to emerge strong from this war because it does not want it to control the oil of Iraq and Saudi Arabia, and it does not want Iraq to emerge strong because it does not want it to have influence in oil affairs. The thrust of American thinking regarding this war is to have both Iraq and Iran emerge from it weak.

If the two countries discover this fact and drop their intransigence, I believe they will accept our idea to end the war and establish good neighborly relations through constant meetings and negotiations.

Do you think this is likely to happen in the current circumstances?

I think every day of war will convince the two parties of the sincerity and rightness of our call to end the hostilities.

There is now the idea of calling a meeting of the non-aligned nations' coordination office – an idea which the PLO proposed and is still backing. The PLO has contacted both countries on this matter, and there may be agreement in principle on the part of both countries to accept the mediation of the non-aligned nations.

There "may be" agreement?

I say "may" because I don't want to be overoptimistic, but I have great hope that we will be able to push this mediation in a direction that would create meeting points between the two parties and yield results.

I believe the two countries have begun to sense that the world is not really interested in arranging a cease-fire. On the contrary.

The greatest losses the two countries are incurring are not human losses; they are economic losses. Oil sources and refineries are being hit. The European countries are usually afraid to lose a handful of oil barrels; why are they so uninterested in this war? Why? I say they are not interested because they are being told by the U.S.: "Don't worry about oil. You will get all the oil you want. You will be the ones to rebuild the two countries after their destruction." In other words, "The oil of Iraq and Iran will be mortgaged to us until the two countries have rebuilt what the war has destroyed."

This means that the oil flow will be uninterrupted, unemployment in Europe will disappear, and we will be the losers – we the Palestinians and the Iraqi and Iranian peoples.

This is why we refuse to give up hope in stopping the war and why we will do everything in our power to stop it.

And this fact has begun to be recognized by our brothers the Iraqis and our brothers the Iranians.

Don't you think the relative lack of interest is at least partly due to the fact that other oil countries, especially the Gulf countries, have decided to increase production to compensate for the loss of Iraqi and Iranian exports?

Why are the Europeans not anxiously seeking an end to the war? Why aren't they pressuring the U.S. to stop the conflict? Everyone involved in the oil business knows that before this war broke out, the Europeans stored oil reserves that would meet their needs for four months. In other words, they have calculated that they will have enough oil for their needs even if the war lasts three months. In addition to this, Saudi Arabia, the Gulf countries and some other OPEC countries have increased their production covering part – not all – of the shortfall.

Given these facts, if the European countries know that after two or three months of war and destruction they are likely to be back in the region to rebuild and repair what has been destroyed, why should they be uneasy about the war – especially since there is a red line in this war, which means that neither country can emerge victorious?

There may be some European sentiments here or there, but in practice, the Europeans and the United States have taken a definite position: keep the war going but impose a ceiling on it, so that neither party wins.

Do you believe the Gulf states are encouraging this attitude by increasing their production?

This matter is connected with the Gulf states' relations with Europe and America. It has nothing to do with the encouragement of the war.

I don't believe that the continuation of the war would serve the interests of the Gulf states. My information is that those states are apprehensive about the war — they are afraid that the war will continue and spread to their territory, and they are afraid that the victor, gaining the upper hand, will deal with them from a position of strength. There are many reasons why they are afraid of this war, but they are now compelled to either support the Iraqi side or adopt a neutral position. My information is that they are all announcing their neutrality.

Saudi Arabia has not announced its neutrality.

Saudi Arabia may be a little more than neutral, but the general attitude among the Gulf states is that this war is against them as it is against Iraq and Iran.

Is there any coordination between the PLO's mediation effort and the mediation effort of the Islamic Conference, and will there be any coordination between it and the proposed non-aligned mediation effort?

The PLO is a member of both the Islamic Conference and the non-aligned nations organization, so any move made by those two bodies is made with our knowledge and encouragement.

The Islamic mediation effort has not succeeded, so we are now inclined to favor a mediation effort by the non-aligned nations, which include the Islamic states. This will give the effort a wider scope and avoid giving the war any (religious) color.

Perhaps even before this interview is published, the non-aligned nations' coordination office will have met and decided to send a team representing several countries to Baghdad and Tehran to detect the meeting points between the two countries and work out a timetable for a cease-fire, then for withdrawals, then for direct talks.

We encourage all these trends, which in no way run counter to the PLO's efforts to play a role.

You have said that Iraq should withdraw to its pre-war borders. Does this mean that you blame Iraq for the continuation of the war?

When a man tries to play a role — to exert "good-will efforts," in diplomatic language, because people don't like the word "mediation" — to end a war of this kind, he is bound to encounter difficulties.

Where do the difficulties lie?

Iraq says: "I have a right to lands which were given to me under the Algiers treaty. I have tried and failed to regain these lands by peaceful means, and I finally had to resort to force."

War is always started for a specific target, but wars may start as one thing and end up being something altogether different. Wars, by nature, develop by themselves, no matter how controlled they may be. This war started as a war over Iraqi land and became a thrust into Iranian territory. That has complicated the matter further. Now the Iranians say that acceptance of a cease-fire would imply acceptance of the occupation of their land, and it would mean that they would have to enter into negotiations as a country which has part of its territory occupied.

Negotiations will be difficult to start if Iranian lands remain in Iraqi hands.

So what is to be done? An unconditional Iraqi withdrawal? Iraq says that would mean a political defeat which would have negative internal repercussions.

That is why we have suggested that a cease-fire be declared first; that the Iraqis then announce their withdrawal to the borders specified in the Algiers treaty or the 1913 treaty of Constantinople; that the Iranians then announce their agreement to enter into negotiations with Iraq in any neutral country if the Iraqis withdraw from Iranian territory. In the meantime, friendly nations — Islamic states or non-aligned states — would supervise the Iraqi withdrawals to avert the possibility of another war breaking out in the process.

That is a general idea of our proposal, which would save the face of both countries.

Have the two countries responded favorably to this suggestion?

I don't think there is any other option. The only other way out is for one of the two countries to defeat the other and impose its conditions, and I don't see that happening – unless we want a very long war.

Does your suggestion of an Iraqi withdrawal mean that you are blaming Iraq?

It is not our job to decide who is wrong. Our job is to stop the war. When the war stops and peace returns, a man can freely state his views. But until our efforts to stop this war bear fruit, we must cast no blame unless casting blame can serve our purpose, which is the cessation of hostilities.

Everyone has his own views about the war. I have said, for instance, that the Arabs are either watching idly or gloating or inciting. None of these attitudes is a proper Arab attitude. The proper Arab position is one in favor of stopping the war by any means. Inciters, idle watchers and gloaters can do nothing but harm. That is not a time for idle watchers or gloaters or inciters. I don't need to name any names, because the position of everyone in the Arab world is known.

As for us, we are avoiding those three categories and trying not to call things by their names. However, we have evidence and documents to indicate who is at fault in this war.

Who is at fault?

We'll say it after the war ends.

You have been quoted as saying: "Arab land is precious but not precious enough to justify war." Would you explain that statement?

Sometimes, when we say we are against this war and we blame someone for continuing it, our statements are misunderstood and interpreted as biased statements against Iraq or against Iran.

We have taken a clear position against the continuation of this war, and one of the reactions we get is: "What do you mean? Our land is occupied and we want to regain it?" If we tell them, "Don't regain it," they say, "Don't you, the Palestinians, want to regain your occupied land?"

I say we have in this region one major conflict and several secondary conflicts which can be settled by negotiations and in time.

The major conflict, the basic conflict in this region is between us and Israel. That is why the Arabs have for over 30 years been convinced that all their capabilities should be funnelled into this conflict and that no war should break out in the region outside this basic conflict.

There are problems between all Arab countries – border problems between Iraq and Kuwait, border problems among the little Arab emirates, border problems between Iraq and Saudi Arabia, border problems between Libya and Algeria, border problems between Tunisia and Algeria, border problems between Tunisia and Libya... There are problems over an entire desert. We are against all these side wars. If we start settling our disputes over every kilometer by force, all our capabilities will be wasted in side wars – they will be poured into tributaries, and not in the river proper.

That is why I say we must push these disputes aside. Algeria can get along without a bit of land from Libya or Tunis, and the same applies to all the rest. Let us put off these matters and look to the land that has been occupied by external forces. Because those disputed lands, whether they are held by Libya or Algeria or Tunisia or Morocco, remain in Arab hands. And where Iraq and Iran are concerned, concessions are also possible on the part of both. We can go on demanding our rights and seeking them. But in the short run, we must not wage wars over those territories, because there is an external enemy occupying a large part of our land.

This is what I meant by that statement.

Do you agree with those who are saying that the Gulf war has brought U.S. military presence back to the region?

If we look at the military and political map of the Gulf region after the outbreak of the Iranian-Iraqi war, we will find the following:

There is American military presence in the heart of the Gulf – naval vessels and fleets. Even some French naval vessels have entered the Straits. Carter has also called for a meeting of the six countries that depend on the Hormuz Straits to prepare a plan for the creation of a naval force in the Gulf.

Iran, of course, has been intelligent enough to stay away from the Straits, but the military forces are there anyway.

No one can credibly state that he knows whether the consequences of the war will remain limited to this presence or will develop further. There may be surprises. An analysis of the repercussions of the war could be a hundred percent sound and still not take unpredictable surprises into account. This must be kept in mind.

I believe that the presence of those fleets in the Gulf has gained a certain legitimacy through the Iraqi-Iranian war. Before the war, if one vessel had made a move in that area, the entire world would have been up in arms. Four or five vessels would have set the world boiling. Now, it has become a natural thing: there they are, in the Straits, digging themelves in, strengthening themselves in the area.

Fear of the consequences of the Iraqi-Iranian war makes the Gulf states say, "We're ready to turn to the devil for help." I know one Gulf official – I will not name him – who told me, "If the devil himself came to help us and offer us protection from the dangers around us now, we would accept and you can't blame us." This is specially true of the states that have adopted a position of genuine neutrality and may consequently be threatened by both Iraq and Iran. Those people are thinking, "We will accept help from the devil himself."

Who is the devil in the world today? The United States is the devil of our age, and it is able and willing to intervene. Let's be realistic: who has strong military presence in Oman and Somalia?

The Iraqi-Iranian war has consecrated American presence in the region. How long the war will be, what its results will be, and how these will develop the American plan to strengthen U.S. presence in the area we do not know.

Do you think it is possible that the U.S. will intervene militarily in the war?

If Saudi Arabia or the Gulf is threatened, or if the Americans feel that the balance is tipping in favor of one of the two sides, they may intervene – because, as I told you, America does not want anyone to emerge victorious from this war. We call this war a war of rams. When rams fight, they go on fighting until their horns snap off and they both collapse. That is the kind of war they want the Iraqi-Iranian war to be. If they find that one of the two sides may win, they may intervene.

But it is your view, I gather, that whether they intervene or not, their presence has been consecrated by the war. Do you believe that this presence will remain consecrated after the war is over?

The longer the war lasts, the stronger the arguments of the Americans will be in their talks with the Gulf states and the more credible they will sound when they tell the Gulf states, "You have no one to depend on but us."

I have talked about possible surprises. When the Iraqi-Iranian war broke out, anyone reading the opinion columns in the Western press – specifically, in the American press – could catch a whiff of the internationalization of oil. The idea which came across was that since the Gulf states and Iran and Iraq were unable to protect the oil, why should the oil be kept under their protection? Iraq and Iran are big nations, and yet, for whatever reason, they started a war and stopped oil production. Saudi Arabia and the Gulf states are weak compared to Iraq and Iran. If Iraq and Iran can't protect their oil, how can Saudi Arabia and the Gulf states be expected to protect theirs? And that being so, why shouldn't America intervene and establish a supervisory presence in the area, thus internationalizing the oil of the Gulf so that it can no longer be at the mercy of anyone?

That is the trend of their thinking, and their thoughts apply to other countries – like Qadhafi's Libya, for instance.

They want to gain control of the oil sources, on the grounds that this valuable resource, which is so essential for Europe and the U.S., should not be at the mercy of people who – look at them! – don't think twice of destroying their own economies.

Don't ever imagine that this theme is not involved in the plan: "The Arabs and the Iranians are backward people whose control of the oil sources must not be allowed to continue. This resource must be in our hands."

It is my view that this will be one of the surprises of the war: the internationalization of Middle Eastern oil, so that it falls under the full control of Europe and the U.S. – either directly or indirectly.

This means that Iraq and Iran are playing the American game by continuing the war, doesn't it?

We sometimes fall prey to a plot without realizing it. This was aptly demonstrated in Lebanon, where several parties thought they were working for the interests of Lebanon by declaring a holy war against the Palestinians. The consequences were not what they imagined they would be. They discovered that they and others, including ourselves, were playing the Kissinger game.

In other words, not everyone that plays a part in a plot is a plotter or an agent connected with the plot. Sometimes people slip into the plot without knowing it, drawn into it by those who have studied their mentalities and know how to influence them.

Where the Iraqi-Iranian war is concerned, they definitely intimated to the Iraqi leadership that the Iranian revolutionary regime would fall as soon as the Iraqi forces made their first move because the Iranians did not have an army, and if they did, they didn't have spare parts. That's the kind of misleading information they fed them.

And I have no doubt that spare parts have arrived in Iran – not directly from the U.S., of course, but via Japan and other countries – and the Iranian army is beginning to play its role again. Iran has in the meantime been told that if the Iraqis suffer one defeat, their leadership will definitely fall.

All the mistakes that have been made in history were made because of inaccurate or incomplete information.

In the light of what you have said so far, how do you evaluate the attitude of the Gulf states toward the Iraqi-Iranian war?

I believe they are among the victims of the war, but of course certain circumstances are dictating their positions. Perhaps they have disputes with Iran. What can we expect Sheikh Zayed to do when the Iraqi leadership tells him, "We will return the three islands to you"? Can he say, "No, don't return them to me"? The Gulf states are in a delicate position.

I'm not defending anyone, but I'm telling you that those who instigated this war made it a very complex one: they made it a war between the Arabs and the Iranians. Are you with the Arabs or with the Iranians: If you're with the Iranians, are you with Islam or against Arab nationalism? And the Iranians will tell you, "Are you with the right or the wrong? If you're with the right, then you're with us." And so on.

Those who planned this war chose the right time and place for it. Even the rumors and slogans that accompanied it were well-studied.

The fear of some Arab states, like Saudi Arabia, has prompted them to request advanced American arms. Does this...

This is fear of the results of the war – fear of what will happen if one of the two belligerents wins; in the case of Saudi Arabia, if Iran wins.

Furthermore, they may say that they have bought or asked for these arms, but we say that, in practice, all the Gulf area is sinking deeper into American influence, either willingly or unwillingly, as a result of this war. And the longer the war lasts, the more American reinforcements we will see in the area.

How do you evaluate the Soviet position, and how do you think this position may evolve in the event of direct U.S. intervention or permanent American military presence in the area?

The Soviets are now observing the situation, and I believe that their attitude is similar to ours. They, like us, regard this war as an advantage to the U.S.

As for what their position will be, this depends on a number of factors, foremost among which is the length of the war.

We must not forget that the Soviet Union has a friendship treaty with Iraq and has commitments under that treaty. At the same time, the Soviet Union, at least as far as it is concerned, has good relations with the new regime in Iran, despite the Iranian attacks on it and the way the Iranians are equating the Soviets and the Americans.

Given its relations with the two sides, the Soviet Union is likely to adopt a strong position if the war lasts much longer.

Also, the extent to which the U.S. interferes in this war, either directly or indirectly, will determine the Soviet attitude.

In short, I believe that the more the Soviets feel that this war is entailing more American military presence and influence in the area, the more quickly they are likely to adopt a position and make a move.

Isn't it strange that (U.S. Secretary of State Edmund) Muskie and (Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei) Gromyko should meet and come out with the sole decision that the two powers would remain neutral? What does this mean? It means that the Soviet Union has said that it will not interfere if the U.S. does not interfere. But the two countries' positions differ. The Russians are against this war from beginning to end. The Americans are not clearly against it. On the contrary, they are indirectly encouraging it — by having their agents incite Iraq to continue the war and by having their Asian allies send spare parts and war materiel to Iran. The U.S., in other words, is pouring oil on the fire and is by no means being neutral.

On the other hand, we know through our contacts with the Soviets that they really want this war to end, because they see no interest in having it continue. The longer the war lasts, the stronger American presence becomes in the area...

What do you think the Soviet reaction to this will be?

I can't make decisions for the Soviet Union, as you know, but I imagine that it will do anything if it feels that its interests are being threatened.

When the Soviet Union was asked to intervene in Afghanistan, it intervened without hesitation. The superpowers have taught us that if a certain red line is crossed they will make their move regardless. Of course, I'm not equating between the U.S. and the Soviets, because I consider the Soviet Union an anti-imperialist power that supports all popular liberation movements in the world.

However, the Soviets have no visible interest in the Iraqi-Iranian war, which is why they have not been quick to take a position. The U.S. has the means to intervene. It is present in the Gulf and Saudi Arabia. But the Soviet Union is not present. It has friendly relations with Iraq, and it has a friendship with Iran which is subject to attack by the various statements. It is in a difficult position.

Do you think there is any possibility of a direct conflict between the U.S. and the Soviet Union in the Gulf?

I say there is a red line for international action. I believe that if the war remains localized, if it remains limited to Iran and Iraq without any flagrant interference by the U.S., the Soviet position will remain unchanged. But if the Soviets feel that the U.S. has crossed the red line, I believe they are capable of doing anything.

What significance do you attach to the signing of the Syrian-Soviet friendship treaty at this time? Do you regard it as an attempt to establish a strategic balance between the superpowers in this area?

No. I view this treaty from a different angle. I consider that it establishes a certain balance between Syria and Israel. Egypt has withdrawn from the battle. Iran and Iraq are in effect out of the battle — not permanently, but for a period which I cannot determine. In Turkey, the U.S. is ruling through the generals. There are bad relations between Syria and Jordan. Syria is under siege, and it has an extension in Lebanon through the Arab Deterrent Forces.

What do you expect Syria to do in these circumstances? It can either withdraw into itself and announce its capitulation or break the siege through a treaty with the Soviet Union. I think Syria did the only thing it could do. It had no other option.

So this is not a matter of superpower balance; it's a matter of balance relating to the Arab-Israeli conflict. I don't share the view expressed in your question.

Which are the parties which are benefiting from the Gulf war, in your view, and which are the parties that are being harmed by it?

All the states in this region are being harmed by it. Outside this region, the U.S. and Europe are benefiting from the war, because this war will guarantee the oil of Iraq and Iran for them as they rebuild those two nations. The weakness of the two belligerents after the war, the effects the war will have on the Gulf countries – all these things serve the interests of the U.S. and the European states.

In addition to all the states in this region, we, the Palestinians, are among the losers in this war.

We consider the Iraqi army a reserve army for us in any battle (with Israel). No matter how sharp the differences between Iraq and Syria, if a battle erupts between Syria and Israel, Iraq is bound to enter it. This was demonstrated in 1967: Iraq is bound to come in, even if it comes in late. It was demonstrated in 1973: Iraq is bound to come in.

And then there is the new factor – Iran. Iran cannot possibly adopt a neutral position in any future Arab-Israeli war.

So we, the Palestinians, are among the losers.

Do you think the damage done to the Palestinian cause will be temporary – in the sense that the war will divert attention from the Palestinian issue for the time being – or will the war have long-range adverse effects on the Palestinian cause?

The damage is temporary. It is limited to the present and the near future – not the distant future.

When two big nations like Iran and Iraq are neutralized, we are bound to be harmed. It is true that any people which believes in its cause and is willing to go on fighting for it as long as it takes will eventually win, but where our cause is concerned, time is also important.

Our assets used to be the presence of Egypt, Syria, Iraq – Arab presence in general – and the presence of Iran. We lost Egypt. Now we have lost Iran and Iraq, albeit temporarily. Our assets have been diminished. We had been depending on all those forces to strike a balance between Israel and its giant allies, specially the United States, and ourselves.

Why do we turn to the Soviet Union? To compensate for the imbalance thus created.

But the Soviets cannot fight our battles. They can help us, but they cannot carry our cause for us, and neither I nor any Arab would agree to have the Soviets liberate our land for us. The Soviets can help us to the extent of our presence. But if we are not present, who do they help? Ghosts? Hence the importance of our own power.

Judging by what you have said, the Palestinians are being harmed not only by the loss of Arab and Iranian power but also by the increase of American presence in the region. Am I right?

American presence in the region affects us, yes. For one thing, it can withdraw the political power of oil from our assets.

Consider how Israel is handling this war: It is telling the world that the only stable state in the Middle East is Israel, and that the presence of Israel is not the cause of Middle Eastern instability. It is saying: "This oil, which has been placed in the hands of juveniles, is the root of Middle Eastern instability. You Americans and Westerners who are trying to settle the Palestinian problem and give the Palestinians a state, look what the Arabs are doing to each other! Those people cannot be trusted with oil. We can."

All this is harmful to us, because the Europeans and the Americans are naive enough to believe that kind of argument.

What will the Palestinians' reaction be if the Americans succeed in gaining control of the oil sources?

Let's be clear about this: what I told you is that one of the surprises of this war may be the internationalization of Middle Eastern oil, in the sense that this oil will no longer be under Arab and Iranian control but will be under the control of the U.S., which will argue that the Arabs – their sheikhs and emirs and kings and presidents – are not fit to bear the responsibility for this oil.

Should this happen, what will the Palestinian reaction be? You have said more than once, for instance, that you will attack the oil wells or the oil routes...

Instead of saying that, I would prefer to say that the Arabs and the Iranians are capable of reacting more strongly. I say we stand with the Arab nation in confrontation of the American peril. It is better to be modest and not carry the cross alone.

Do you think the recent developments in Turkey have anything to do with the current happenings in this region?

I say that the Iraqi-Iranian war was a very predictable one, and that the U.S. was indirectly directing it.

It is no coincidence that Europe built up so much oil reserves; it is no coincidence that the military coup in Turkey preceded the war; and it is no coincidence that some Arab countries adopted positions of encouragement, instigation and incitement toward this war. All these things were indications that a war was being expected and that misinformation was being fed to both sides to bring them to the point of collision and thereafter to escalate the conflict. These were not coincidence; they were predetermined.

A Turkey ruled by a strong military regime which can keep it stable is able to shoulder more responsibilities in the context of an Iranian-Iraqi war. It has borders with both countries and oil pipelines passing through its territory. It knows when to block Iranian air space and when to block Iraqi air space. A Turkey ruled by generals can help (the U.S.). After the war is over, I expect them to send the soldiers back to their homes and bring the civilians back to power.

Some observers believe that the U.S. will not adopt a decisive attitude toward the Iraqi-Iranian war before its presidential elections, and that the period after the elections will be of paramount importance for the Middle East. Do you agree?

I am against linking anything with the American elections. I believe that on all important issues, in the Middle East and elsewhere, the U.S. administration has a constant policy. A new President may introduce some changes in the details, but the core of that policy remains unchanged. Those who are pinning their hopes on the American elections are wrong, in my opinion. No matter who is elected, American policy will remain essentially unchanged. Nothing can change it short of a massive popular revolution or a total overhaul of the American system.

I believe that this war was planned during the term of President Carter, but if it is perceived to be in the interests of the U.S. after the elections, it will continue after the elections. In other words, the elections have nothing to do with it.

Of course, we hope we will not be tools in America's hands, and neither we nor anybody else are satisfied to wait for the U.S. to save us. That is why we are doing everything in our power to keep this war in our hands, because if this war is internationalized, it will destroy the entire region.

The war will be internationalized if one of the two countries, willingly or unwillingly, becomes dependent on the U.S. Dependence on either of the superpowers would mean being at the mercy of that superpower. And it is a well-known fact that in modern war, no Third World country can wage a long war alone. The longer the war lasts, the more the chance of dependence on either the U.S. or the Soviet Union.

I have said that there may be surprises. So far, there have been none. The war remains a local one between two states. The superpowers are involved only to the extent of their previous commitments toward those two states, but they have not intervened directly. The big danger to the entire region will come if the war is internationalized.

So you don't expect a change in the American attitude toward the Gulf war if the Republicans win in the elections?

I don't think so. Carter and Reagan share the same views about this war.

What is your reaction to Reagan's statement that he is ready to hold talks with Palestinians who are not members of the PLO?

The Palestinian people have not elected the PLO, of course, but they have accepted it as their sole legal representative. All the American and European delegates who have come here realize this. So far, our people are rallying around us, and this is recognized by almost the entire world. At the U.N., in the last vote on a Palestinian resolution, 114 states voted for us. That means that, aside from the Big Five (of which the Soviet Union and China support us), close to three-quarters of the world stands by us. So I consider such statements to be designed for local consumption.

I challenge the United States and our Zionist enemy to accept the principle of an independent Palestinian state without the PLO. That doesn't mean I don't want the PLO, but I challenge them to give any Palestinian in the occupied territories an independent Palestinian state.

This is just another attempt to divide the Palestinian people, to create an alternative leadership for them. Carter tried it, and so did Nixon. Israel and Egypt are also trying to create an alternative leadership for the Palestinians. But I believe all those attempts have failed. How else did the autonomy project fail? It failed because our people were unanimous in declaring the PLO their only legal representative and in stating that they reject anything that the PLO rejects. That is what aborted the autonomy project, despite the fact that it was backed by the U.S. and Egypt. It is true that Israel also hampered the project, but the Israeli obstacles were not basic. What aborted the project was the fact that it meant nothing to our people, the fact that we reject it whether the Egyptian amendments are accepted or not.

What do you think the effect of the projected Syrian-Libyan union will be on the Palestinian issue?

In the Arabs' current state of division, dispersion and conflict, any meeting between two or three or four Arab states is a relief and can help narrow the gaps among the Arabs.

We always judge things through their effect on the Palestinian cause. We support anything that serves the cause. I believe that Syria, with its military and human capabilities, has economic needs that can be covered by Libya. If this complementary relationship develops as a result of the union, the union will be a positive factor which, added to the Soviet factor, will help redress the balance between the Arabs and the Israelis after the withdrawal of Egypt and the vaccum caused by the Iraqi-Iranian war. This union would benefit the Palestinian revolution and both Syria and Libya (for Libya is also exposed to dangers).

That is why we have announced our support of this union, and our only reservation is that this project must not be allowed to fail because the people can no longer endure experiments and failures. That is our only reservation.

How do you think Palestinian-Jordanian relations will develop, given Jordan's attitude toward the Gulf war and reports that five of the Palestinians in Jordanian jails have been executed?

Our relationship with Jordan was originally based on Jordan's rejection of the Camp David agreements, and later on Jordan's rejection of the autonomy project and all the results of Camp David. On that basis, we turned over a new leaf in our relations with Jordan.

At the beginning, we adopted the silent approach in our dealings with Jordan, but there have always been elements in the Jordanian regime trying to hamper the negotiations -- by making use of Jordan's intelligence service, by maltreating our people, by playing down the importance of Jordanian-Palestinian relations.

In recent weeks, we have criticized this attitude repeatedly. The last time we protested, they told the Palestinian delegation that they would not execute the five Palestinians you referred to. They said that their case was non-political, relating to the murder of a policeman, and they promised to halt the executions. Regarding the other Palestinians in Jordan jails, they said they were in the process of releasing them.

I would rather wait for a while and see whether those promises are kept.

As for Jordan's attitude toward the Gulf war, I believe Jordan was wrong to adopt a position of incitement, because this position will in the final analysis reflect on it. We have said that in this war, it is predetermined that neither side will win. What applies to the two sides applies to those who encourage them. The gains that Jordan may be seeking will not materialize.

However, our differences with Jordan at this stage are not over this, but over the matters you mentioned and a number of other issues – the failure of Jordan to push the dialogue in the direction of common political positions, the question of contacts with the people and popular mobilization, the matter of opening a PLO information office in Jordan... We are concerned with bilateral relations and have not tried to interfere in Jordanian policy – its relations with Iraq or Saudi Arabia or this or that country. Jordan is an independent nation and free to adopt whatever policy it wishes. What concerns us is our bilateral relations.

So there is no confirmation of the press reports that the five Palestinians have been executed?

According to the information we have received, they have been sentenced to death but have not been executed yet. Contacts are under way to halt the executions.

How do you think the Gulf war and the Syrian-Soviet treaty will affect the situation in Lebanon?

Lebanon is part of this region. If we, the Palestinians, are affected by the Gulf war, Lebanon as a state and a people is bound to be affected by it and by its repercussions.

If America decides to hit us because of the role we are playing in trying to stop the war, or because of the dictates of the settlement it has in mind, it can only hit us through South Lebanon, either by occupying new areas (expanding Saad Haddad's enclave) or by striking a blow that it believes can liquidate the Palestinian Revolution.

I believe that the Americans are too clever to do this while the Gulf war is raging. But if the war stops and they feel that it has not yielded all the desired results, or for some other reason desired results, or for some other reason (the Syrian-Soviet treaty, for instance, and the difficulty of attacking Syria directly), they may try to hit the Palestinians and the Syrians through Lebanon. In that event, they would launch a major war against the fedayeen in Lebanon and wait for Syria's reaction: will it intervene or not? If it intervenes, they will test its power; if it doesn't, that will be another test of its power.

So anything that happens in this region, especially the Iraqi-Iranian war, will, I believe, have an effect on Lebanon. We can reduce that effect by reaching an understanding that will prevent the conflict from becoming internal. Confronting an Israeli war against us and the National Movement would be much easier than confronting an internal threat – the return of the Lebanese war in its sectarian or regional form or in any other form. That is the big danger, and that is the danger we can avoid.

That, in short, is the possible effect of the Gulf war and the treaty on Lebanon.

Where the Syrians are concerned, I believe the treaty will make them more at ease in Lebanon and prompt them to deal more openly and positively with the Lebanese reality and the Lebanese authorities.

What role could the Syrian-Soviet treaty play in the event of an attempt to hit the Palestinians in Lebanon?

We must not forget that this is a treaty between Syria and the Soviet Union, not between Lebanon, Syria and the Soviet Union.

But Syria is present in Lebanon through the ADF.

It is difficult for anyone to make decisions for someone else. I personally am against Syria getting involved in any battle in support of us if it is not prepared for it.

I don't know the details of the Soviet-Syrian treaty. I believe the Syrians had decided that they would intervene when they had to – through their air force, for instance. What their behavior will be after the treaty I don't know.

I say, however, that the test of the Syrian-Soviet treaty is not in Lebanon but in Syria. The treaty cannot be said to have any effect on Lebanon except in a general way — morally, and the fact that Syria, having gained strength by this treaty, will become more at ease in Lebanon. Syria will decide whether and to what extent it should intervene in Lebanon or the South in the event of aggression, but whatever the decision is, it cannot be regarded as a measure of the strength of the Syrian-Soviet treaty. That treaty can be tested only by a direct attack on Syria.

In other words, there may be a text in the treaty which states that the Soviet Union will defend Syria by all means, including, perhaps, the dispatch of Soviet forces to Syria. But I don't think that text applies to Lebanon. ●

PUBLIC OPINION POLL TAKEN

Beirut MONDAY MORNING in English 20-26 Oct 80 pp 22-27

[Article by Claude Khoury]

[Text]

Around half of the Lebanese people want Raymond Edde to be the next President of Lebanon.

And over 60 percent of them want Caretaker Prime Minister Selim Hoss to be reappointed as prime minister of the next government, which 63 percent of the nation believes should be formed without further delay.

These are some of the findings of an opinion poll conducted by Monday Morning over the past two weeks — the first poll of its kind since the outbreak of the Lebanese war in 1975.

Questions about the performance of President Elias Sarkis and the government of Premier Hoss, the identity of the next President and prime minister, the form the next government should take and the possible effects of the Gulf war on Lebanon were put to 219 Lebanese men and women of all sects, ages and walks of life (see description of sample in box).

Their answers:

LEBANON'S NEXT PRESIDENT

Raymond Edde was chosen as Lebanon's next President by 46.5 percent of the sample.

The next most popular choice, former President and National Liberal Party leader Camille Chamoun, lagged far behind with just over four percent, followed closely by President Sarkis (three percent) and Beshir Gemayel, commander of the rightist militias (also three percent).

The rest of the votes were scattered among over 20 candidates: MP Fuad Lahoud, Army Commander Victor Khoury, former President Charles Helou, Central Bank Governor Michel Khoury, Justice Minister Yousef Jebran, former MP Jean Aziz, former President Suleiman Franjieh, businessman Pierre Edde, Education Minister Butros Harb, George Deeb, NLP military commander Dany Chamoun, MP René Moawad, Gaby Lahoud, U.N. Ambassador Ghassan Tueni (who is a Greek Orthodox), Public Security Forces Director General Farouk Abillama', Yousef Ashkar and MP Fuad Naffah.

Those candidates received one to four votes each.

Six votes went to Premier Selim Hoss, with all six respondents stating that the man had proved that he was conscientious and that it was about time Lebanon got rid of its Maronite President tradition.

One vote went to businesswoman Myrna Bustani, the only woman ever to serve as a member of the Lebanese Parliament. The respondent justified his choice with the argument that "Lebanese men have failed."

It is noteworthy that the question about the next President did not include any suggested candidates; the respondents were left free to nominate their own President.

The unchallenged victor in this mini-election, Raymond Edde, was described by the respondents who chose him as "a man who knows what he wants," "a man of action," "a man who is not afraid of anyone," "a realist," and "a man who refused to get involved in the filth of the Lebanese war."

Edde ran against President Sarkis in 1976. After he lost the election, and after surviving two attempts on his life, he left Lebanon for Paris, where he has lived for the past four years.

Judging by the results of the poll, Edde is a favorite among all major Lebanese sects:

He was nominated by:

- 42.6 percent of the Maronites
- 62.7 percent of the Sunnites
- 43.7 percent of the Shiites
- 59.26 percent of the Druze
- 26 percent of the Greek Orthodox

Among the Maronites, the next most popular candidate was Camille Chamoun (11.1 percent), followed by Beshir Gemayel (7.4 percent).

It is noteworthy that around 11 percent of the sample refused to nominate anyone, explaining that they knew of no one worthy of the post.

THE PERFORMANCE OF PRESIDENT ELIAS SARKIS

In response to the question "Do you think President Sarkis has done all he can to end the Lebanese crisis," 60.7 percent said "No" and 38.3 percent said "Yes." The rest did not answer the question.

The Maronite respondents were kinder in their assessment of the President's performance, with 53.7 percent of them stating that he had done all he could in the circumstances. The same answer was given by 52.2 percent of the Greek Orthodox and 42.8 percent of the Protestants.

But only 23.5 percent of the Catholics, 22.2 percent of the Druze, 31.25 percent of the Shiites and 30.5 percent of the Sunnites agreed that the President could not have done more to end the crisis.

Those who disapproved of the President's performance (and paradoxically, some of those who approved) stated that:

- The President was wrong not to take clear positions against certain parties in Lebanon (38.8 percent);
- The President was wrong not to make more use of the Lebanese Army (24.2 percent);
- The President was wrong not to take some sort of initiative in the Arab world and the rest of the world to end the Lebanese crisis (18.7 percent).

Blame for the continuation of the Lebanese crisis was also cast at:

THE SAMPLE

The 15-question questionnaire prepared for this survey was filled out by 219 Lebanese citizens, either in writing or on the phone.

The random sample was distributed as follows:

SECTS:

Sunnite: 26.9 percent
Maronite: 24.6 percent
Shiite: 14.6 percent
Druze: 12.3 percent
Greek Orthodox: 10.5 percent
Catholic: 7.7 percent
Protestant: 3.1 percent

SEX:

Male: 62.5 percent
Female: 37.5 percent

AGE:

20-40: 75 percent
Over 40: 18 percent
Under 20: 7 percent

OCCUPATION:

Employee: 28 percent
Professional: 27.6 percent
Student: 13 percent
Self-employed: 11.5 percent
Unskilled worker: 5.5 percent
Executive: 4.6 percent
Housewife: 4 percent
Civil servant: 2.7 percent
Undetermined: 3 percent

PLACE OF RESIDENCE:

Areas controlled by the leftist National Movement alliance: 61.7 percent

Areas controlled by the rightist Lebanese Front alliance: 19 percent

Undetermined: 19.3 percent (these preferred not to state specifically where they lived and indicated general areas like "Beirut" or "Mount Lebanon").

Of the Maronite respondents, 54 percent live in Lebanese Front areas, 35 percent in National Movement areas, and 11 percent preferred not to say.

Of the Greek Orthodox, 30.5 percent live in Lebanese Front areas, 47.8 percent in National Movement areas and 21.7 percent undetermined.

Of the Catholics, 23 percent live in Lebanese Front areas, 64 percent in National Movement areas and 6 percent undetermined.

Of the rest of the sects, no respondent said he lived in Lebanese Front areas, but significant numbers did not indicate exactly where they lived. The place of residence of 33 percent of the Sunnites, 25 percent of the Shiites, 7.5 percent of the Druze and 16.6 percent of the Protestants was left vague. The rest said they lived in National Movement areas.

In seeking answers for the 15 questions in the questionnaire, we encountered two extreme reactions:

A significant proportion of the respondents were anxious to give their views and in fact gave more answers than were required, going into long explanations of their responses. Several insisted that their names be noted although no names were required. One felt that those people were totally dissatisfied with the current situation and pleased to be given an opportunity to say why.

Many, however, were very reluctant to talk, some responding with marked hostility and some indicating that they were afraid to speak up, even though they were assured that their names would not be noted. This was particularly true of the people who were questioned by phone, apparently because they were afraid the conversation was being taped. The typical reactions of this group were: "We don't want to get involved," or "Filling questionnaires won't settle the crisis."

The Maronite respondents were among the most reluctant to answer the questions, demonstrating extreme suspicion. "Why should I tell you my occupation or where I live?" one of them asked angrily. "Do I know you?"

•The Arabs (37 percent);
•The Palestinians (33.7 percent);
•The Lebanese militias (33.7 percent);
•The Lebanese Parliament (15 percent).

Insignificant numbers of respondents also blamed Israel, the United States, the West in general and the Lebanese people themselves.

DELAY IN THE FORMATION OF A NEW GOVERNMENT:

Of the full sample, 63.4 percent said President Sarkis was wrong to delay the formation of a new government so long. They generally argued that the absence of a government with full authority was contributing to the chaos in the country and leaving Lebanon without adequate leadership at a time when the country was in urgent need of leadership.

But 32.2 percent said President Sarkis was right to delay the formation of a new government. These explained that (1) the President was refusing to form a government because any government formed now would be under "external," mainly Arab, influence; (2) the President was delaying the formation of the government because any government he could form now would be ineffective; (3) the President was not deliberately delaying the formation of a government but was being prevented from doing so by the conflicting Lebanese parties and factions.

The Maronites were equally divided between approval of the delay (48.15 percent) and disapproval of it (48.15 percent).

Other sects were predominantly against the delay:

Sunnites: 71.19 percent against, 27.12 percent in favor

Shiites: 87.5 percent against, 12.5 percent in favor

Druze: 59.25 percent against, 40.75 percent in favor

Greek Orthodox: 60.86 percent against, 39.14 percent in favor

Catholics: 64.70 percent against, 21.73 percent in favor.

PERFORMANCE OF HOSS GOVERNMENT

The majority of the respondents said that the current Hoss government had not done all it could in the present circumstances to improve the security situation, bring down the cost of living or promote national accord.

•Security: 67.5 percent of the sample said the Hoss government had not done well in this field, and 32.5 percent said it had.

•Cost of living: 75 percent said the Hoss government had not done all it could in the circumstances to bring the cost of living down, and 25 percent said it had.

•National accord: 68.5 percent said the Hoss government had not done everything in its power to work for national accord, and 31.5 percent said it had.

Asked whom they blamed for the failure of the government to perform well, the respondents gave the following answers:

•The various armed parties in Lebanon (66.2 percent)
•The President of the Republic (25 percent)
•The individual ministers (20 percent)
•Premier Selim Hoss (10.5 percent)
•All of these combined (11.9 percent)

Insignificant percentages also blamed Foreign Minister Fuad Butros, the rightist Phalangist Party and the Lebanese people in general.

These percentages held more or less constant among the individual sects.

THE NEXT PRIME MINISTER

Premier Selim Hoss was the unchallenged favorite for the post of prime minister of the next Lebanese government, with 68 percent of the sample voting for him.

The next most popular candidate was former Premier Takieddin Solh, who, however, received the vote of only 6.4 percent of the sample.

Others nominated included former Premier Rashid Karami (4.1 percent), Islamic Council President Shafik Wazzan (3.6 percent), and former Minister Malek Salam (3.2 percent).

An insignificant number of respondents also nominated former Premier Saeb Salam, former Premier Amin Hafez, Internal Security Forces Director General Ahmad al-Hajj, Reconstruction Board Chairman Mohammed Atallah, and Interior Minister Nazem Kadri.

Around three percent said they wanted the next premier to be a "military man."

Premier Hoss' popularity was evident among all major sects:

- He was supported by 51.85 percent of the Maronites, whose next best choice for premier was Takieddin Solh (18.5 percent).
- He was supported by 81.35 percent of the Sunnites, whose next best choice was Rashid Karami (8.47 percent).
- He was supported by 84.38 percent of the Shiites, whose next best choices were Saeb Salam (3.12 percent), Rashid Karami (3.12 percent) and "a military man" (3.12 percent).
- He was supported by 77.8 percent of the Druze, whose next best choices were Takieddin Solh (3.7 percent), Saeb Salam (3.7 percent) and Amin Hafez (3.7 percent).
- He was supported by 65.12 percent of the Greek Orthodox, whose next best choice was Shafik Wazzan (13 percent).
- He was supported by 41.36 percent of the Catholics, whose next best choices were Shafik Wazzan (11.76 percent) and Malek Salam (11.76 percent).

THE NEXT GOVERNMENT

The majority of the respondents – 49.31 percent – voted for a coalition government grouping all parties in Lebanon.

Other choices that emerged were:

- A military government (15 percent)
- A parliamentary government (15 percent)
- A government of technocrats (13.69 percent)

Also mentioned by a few respondents were "any government," "any strong government," "any honest government," "a government not subject to Arab influence" and "no government."

With the exception of the Protestant minority, which was equally divided between a coalition government (28.57 percent) and a military government (28.57 percent), all sects showed a marked preference for a coalition government:

The first two choices of each sect were the following:

Maronites: Coalition (48.14 percent), military (18.51 percent)

Sunnites: Coalition (45.78 percent), technocrat (22 percent)

Shiites: Coalition (46.87 percent), parliamentary (21.87 percent)

Druze: Coalition (62.96 percent), military (14.82 percent)

Greek Orthodox: Coalition (56.53 percent), military (26 percent)

Catholics: Coalition (47 percent), parliamentary (17.64 percent).

It is noteworthy that whereas the coalition, parliamentary and technocrat formulas were mentioned as possible choices in the questionnaire, "military government" was not listed. Those who chose it added it unprompted to the multiple choice list provided.

THE EFFECTS OF THE GULF WAR ON LEBANON

There appeared to be general agreement among the respondents that the war between Iraq and Iran would do Lebanon more harm than good.

The respondents said the Gulf war would harm Lebanon by:

- Starting proxy battles in the country (49 percent);
- Diverting attention from the Lebanese problem and therefore delaying its solution (38.35 percent);
- Delaying the solution of the Palestinian problem, and therefore the solution of the Lebanese problem (29.22 percent).

The respondents said the war could benefit Lebanon by:

- Diverting the routes of Iraqi and Saudi oil back to Lebanon (19.17 percent);
- Forcing the superpowers to speed up efforts to find a solution for the Middle East problem (14.15 percent)
- Relieving the international pressure on Lebanon by creating another major trouble spot (6.39 percent);
- Increasing the flow of Gulf funds into Lebanese banks as Arab businessmen try to get their money out of the new trouble spot (2.73 percent).

EUROPEAN INITIATIVE TOWARD ARABS CRITICIZED, SCRUTINIZED

Paris AL-MUSTAQBAL in Arabic 18 Oct 80 pp 36-39

/Article by Samir 'Atallah: "The Arab Gamble on Europe: From Behind the Rifle to the Venice Summit"/

/Text/ In Paris in 1961, bombs were exploding before everyone who called for Algerian independence. The Boulevard of the Champs Elysees was full of troops and armored vehicles, as it was on the eve of the German invasion, in the fear that paratroops and generals who wanted to overthrow DeGaulle before he agreed to independence would strike; the newspapers--all the newspapers--were talking about the Arabs with resentment; and the Arabs coming to France could be numbered on the fingers of one's hand.

Paris was drenched in the blood of Algerians and it was bearing--and still does bear--the effects of the Suez war and Bizerte on its face. French relations with the eastern countries, eastern countries of all kinds, were tense or broken. There were almost daily demonstrations against the french on the streets of Damascus, Beirut and Cairo.

London's situation was not much better. There were the harbingers of revolution in Aden and there was the shadow of Suez and Eden's defeat in the canal. There was "abd-al-Nasir's daily war against "the English," In brief, all Europe was nonexistent in the Arab world. Conversely there was no Arab presence in Europe. There were no relations. West Germany was still giving Israel billions in aid in reparations for the war.

In brief, "greater" Europe, including Italy and the bitter memories it had left in Libya were still a symbol of a long stage of colonialism, the mandate, Sykes-Picot and the Balfour declaration.

The Americans, in their turn, tried to benefit from the new situation. The "vacuum" left by the departure of the British and the French, as far as America was concerned, was a golden opportunity to become "number one" in the region, after the Suez war had emphasized for the first time "on the ground" that oil was the steam of modern industry and that the major countries would turn into villages without it under martial law.

However, the egregious American error was to repeat the egregious European error. Washington tried to come in by the same door from which Europe had left, that is, the door of treaties and alliances. John Foster Dulles was obsessed by the fear of Communism, and he saw an invisible red flag in the vanguard of every national movement. After the hot war in Suez the Arab world found itself getting into the cold war from all the outlets channels and seas surrounding it, after the Sixth Fleet had "mobilized itself" in the Mediterranean--while Peter the Great's dreams of "warm water" were inspiring Nikita Khrushchev.

Thus the Arabs turned in two directions. Europe was in no way in either. "abd-al-Nasir looked for weapons and found them only in the east. He looked for banners for the High Dam and found them only in the east. Before Algeria became independent in the Maghreb, the union between Syria and Egypt occurred. Then there occurred another national evolution, with the Ba'th Party's advent to power in Iraq and Syria. Then there occurred the major evolution, that is, the 1967 war.

From the 1967 war there arose a long-term invisible victory: after 5 June the Palestinian cause in practice stopped depending on Syria and Egypt. With the occupation of the West Bank, Gaza and the Golan Heights, The Palestinian cause, again, in reality, was no longer just a Palestinian cause, and the 1967 fiasco was not just a military fiasco.

Thus, in addition to the genesis of the Palestinian revolution--which, in a short time, would involve the whole world in its cause--the whole Arab world was looking for a role in repelling the defeat, and bitterness grew with each passing day. The Arabs found that Israel's victory ultimately was an American victory and that in Egypt's defeat lay a sort of Soviet deficiency.

In 1967, in terms of the Arabs, Europe was either isolated or neutral. Britain had left South Yemen but retained a somewhat diffident presence in the Gulf through old treaties. As for France, the Arab world was on the list of its commercial concerns but not on the political list.

The Boycott and the Mirage

As regards Europe, also, the June war was to change the political balance vis-a-vis the Arab world, or at least it was to be the beginning of a change. In Paris, DeGaulle imposed a military boycott on Israel, which had raided Egypt's defenses with Mirages. In London, for the first time since 1956, the British Foreign Office was searching for a political balance and was devising Resolution 242, calling for evacuation from "occupied Arab territories," without recognizing, or referring to, the Palestinian people. Directly after that, France and Britain called for the first time for a big powers' club for "quadrilateral talks," again in the United States; these talks gave birth to the mission of Gunnar Jarring, then expired before the mission expired.

Aside from the results, and even aside from the importance of the European role, this stage was in any event the start of the European return to the Arab world--first, by a route in opposition (though at the outset parallel) to the American path, and second through a door wholly different from that through which it had exited in the late fifties and early sixties.

Thus any evaluation of modern European-Arab relations will perforce start with 1967, whether on the official, commercial, or oil level, or on the media level, in which the Palestinian revolution played the catalytic or transformational role when the European papers in countries whose media had been purely Israeli started to listen to, then write, then in large part turn in sympathy.

These relations gradually escalated until they reached their climax at the Venice Summit, that is, the summit the European leaders held expressly to issue their famous "declaration" on the Palestinian revolution, along with the separate declaration on...Lebanon.

With the Venice summit, numerous questions and queries arose openly, implicitly and secretly on the levels of leaders, revolutionaries and the people.

Is Europe really on our side?

Is the European initiative a backup for Camp David?

Are the Europeans really able to adjust the balance the Americans have disrupted?

Is the source of European support just fear over oil? Is it due to arms sales? Is it due to trade?

Is it strategic, that is, due to the mediation which is a European extension to the Arab east and the Maghreb together?

Is it sincere?

Is it capable of persevering in the face of detente or agreement between the Americans and the Soviets?

Finally, do we need it?

The answer to all these questions is yes.

However, there is need for detsils, many details: European-Arab relations are not as complex as they seem, but they are also not as simple as they sometimes seem. It is true that the spirit of colonialism disappeared of its own accord, it is true that contemporary Europe no longer admits a colonial psychology, even from within, and it is true that there is a strategic relationship and perhaps even geographically common interests (as contrasted with the United States and the Soviet Union), but it is also true that there is a difference, mentally, intellectually and socially, which will keep the West west and the East east, or two or three easts, in the essential view of things.

Whether European policy is organically linked to American policy, as Arab pessimists say in the face of despair and doubts, or is independent or wants independence, as the optimists say in the face of good tidings, one can deal with European policy toward the Arab world only in the context of the American position. If Europe really is independent, it can thus constitute an instrument of pressure on Washington while, if it is not, it can still constitute an instrument for making the Americans conscious of an area whose sweet and bitter side the Europeans know.

From 1967 to 1973

Some people consider that while the 1967 war constituted a shift in the European position toward the Arabs, the October war recorded a European shift vis-a-vis the American position toward the Arabs. The strangled victory in October put Europe before three new facts: first, that Israel was not a country which could not be defeated; second, that the Arabs were able to win; third, that oil was being transformed from a vital commodity to a weapon--and a remedy.

For the first time the strangled victory and the oil victory placed the Arabs in a position of strength. In addition, the new position led to the convening of the Geneva Conference, which still is in suspense. It also for the first time led to the issuance of an official declaration by Gerald Ford's administration announcing that there was a "reappraisal" of American policy toward Israel.

In brief, this "reappraisal" regressed and became step-by-step, then piece-by-piece, although in Sinai alone, in an obvious attempt to strip the Arab world away from Egypt. When Carter's administration came, there was at the beginning a tendency to get the big powers to take part in "peace talks on the Middle East"--indeed Alfred Atherton, Carter's special envoy to the region in 1978, stated that Resolution 242 constituted a comprehensive settlement, whether it was applied in toto or not applied at all. Washington's desire to get the participation of the Soviets and Europe led to the issuance of a statement in October 1977 by Andrei Gromyko, and the American secretary of state at that time, Cyris Vance, reiterating the acceptance of general principles for a settlement and an invitation for a followup on the Geneva Conference under the chairmanship of the two parties.

However, the Geneva Conference, which put Europe at rest and gave it a new breath, was soon replaced by Camp David, that is, first of all the departure of the Soviets and second of all the Europeans from all attempts at a settlement, not to speak, naturally, of the departure of the Palestinians and the Arabs.

Some Arabs consider that Europe was in agreement, if only implicitly, or at least at the beginning, with Camp David. However, the Europeans deny it. Some say that Europe opposed it from the beginning, not because of an impulsive rush toward the Arabs but because it knew that the new American policy would increase the alienation between Europe and America itself at a time when the Europeans were trying to reduce the number of problems at dispute between the old continent and the new one.

The Europeans are not calling for a position more supportive of the Arabs, but since 1967 they certainly have wanted a position more balanced than the American one. They felt that it was in their ability to adopt such a position, first, because of the historic and economic relations with the Arab world and secondly because the European elections are not decided by the Jewish voter or by Jewish influence like the American ones. Europe did not say that it would go to the point of demanding the disappearance of Israel in supporting the Arabs, but it was not prepared to support Israel in the occupation of Arab territories either. In the last volume of his memoirs, DeGaulle relates that he once told Ben Gurion, "France is ready to help you survive but it is not ready to supply you with the means which will enable you to invade new territories."

It is not known to what extent the French position reflects the positions of the other European countries. However, it is certain at least that the European group is now acting through one body, the "Council of European Political Cooperation," which was established in the early seventies. In May 1971 the foreign ministers of the European states (six at that time) "accepted" a report from the "political committee" spelling out a common position on the Arab-Israeli conflict. In general the report reiterated the elements which are included in Resolution 242, in-cluding withdrawal from the occupied territories (with minor adjustments), the call for "secure borders" (that is, borders supported by international guarantees and demilitarized zones subject to international supervision), and a solution to the problem of "the refugees" and the problem of shipping in the Gulf of al-'Aqabah and the Suez Canal.

Although there was no new element in the report, it seemed like a European attempt at an initiative to put pressure on Israel regarding the occupied territories. While the Arab states welcomed the initiative, Israel hastened to declare that the European family had no right to interfere in the Middle East question.

Then official Europe issued a statement on 6 November 1973 calling on Israel to "end the occupation it had been carrying out since the 1967 war" and said that "in the event of the attainment of a just permanent peace, the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people would have to be taken into consideration." Although the statement was very far from satisfying any Palestinian or Arab demand, some people interpreted it as a European turning point toward the Arabs as a result of the October war and the oil embargo. However, the fact is that it was a reaffirmation of previous statements and United Nations resolutions.

However, the October war, to repeat again, actually led to the establishment of an Arab-European dialogue for the first time, that is, for the first time in the context of the Arab world collectively and for the first time in the context of Europe collectively as well. One of the forms of this dialogue is what was officially called the "Arab-European dialogue" in 1974 between the Arab League and the European family. Although bilateral relations were and still are much stronger than what the dialogue between the two "families" has come up with, it did include a number of economic issues as well as trade, scientific and technological cooperation and cultural and social exchanges. Only the issue of energy was officially excluded from the agenda. It was agreed that each side would issue a statement on the subject of the Arab-Israeli struggle after returning home.

In the first official document in this regard, issued in May 1976 in Luxembourg, the two parties stressed that it was necessary that the legitimate rights of the Palestine people be recognized as a precondition for a just permanent peace. The Common Market issued a reminder of its statement issued in November 1973 while the Arab party called for the Liberation Organization to participate in all negotiations on a settlement. In similar corresponding statements, the Europeans condemned the settlement policy which Israel was pursuing and stressed their opposition to any changes in the status of the West Bank, including East Jerusalem.

However, in exchange, "official" Europe continued to refuse to acknowledge the Liberation Organization and rejected the Arab demand that the preferential trade agreement they had concluded with Israel in 1975 be suspended until the latter withdrew from the occupied Arab territories.

From "Refugees" to "a People"

Although the European "shift" was important, it was also gradual, tentative and slow. In 1967, the Palestinians were referred to in the British-made Resolution 242 as "refugees." This position changed in 1973 with talk about the "legitimate rights" of the Palestinian people. Mention of a Palestinian "national home" did not appear until 29 June 1977 in a lengthy statement issued by the European Council which stressed that the national homeland was a precondition but also called for the acceptance of "secure recognized boundaries for Israel."

Satisfied as the Arabs were with the policy of balance chosen by the Europeans, they also felt that this balance was restricting European steps to a large extent and benefiting the Arab cause to a small extent. Although there is a serious conviction that the Europeans really are sincere as regards the rights of the Palestinian people, there is a corresponding conviction that Europe is unable to depart from general American policy. Otherwise, how can one interpret the stand in favor of Palestinian rights and at the same time the salutation to Carter for "great courage" in arranging the Camp David agreements?

The European "predicament" appeared clearly in the wake of Camp David, because, in spite of the "salutation," the market's foreign ministers seem to have exerted unremitting effort at the same time to point out that "the agreement must not constitute a separate peace" but should be a first step toward a comprehensive peace "to which the representatives of all, including the Palestinian people, will agree, and which the international family will approve."

About a year after that, the Europeans drew back again, although slightly, from American policy. In June 1979 the market foreign ministers issued a statement declaring that the Security Council resolutions must be the basis for any settlement, and they condemned "any step or statement which could obstruct peace," thus referring to the Israeli occupation and settlement policy.

Rather than content themselves with standing on the sidelines of American policy in the region, the Europeans saw in the results left by the Camp David treaty an opportunity to carry out a special European initiative, and many of them did not hide the fact that Europe was waiting for the failure of the autonomy talks, or, more correctly, the announcement of this failure, to carry out its initiative. There is a conviction on the part of a large number of Europeans that European diplomacy alone is qualified to perform such a role. It is said that the British told the Americans at one stage that they knew the affairs of the region better than Washington and that it was up to Washington to leave them to create the solutions and get out of the stagnation which had existed since the Geneva conference.

Although the French have overtly gone farther than the English have in leaning toward the Arab world, the British have in reality been insisting for some time on amending Resolution 242 to include the rights of the Palestinian people. Although they have not yet ventured to propose the amendment officially, the former British representative to the United Nations, Sir Ivor Richards, said in the Security Council debate in 1976 that any settlement in the Middle East would have to be founded on three considerations, and that the third consideration, that is, Palestinian rights, was not included in Resolution 242. In his speech he called for reference to the Palestinian identity to be added to Resolutions 242 and 338 (which was issued after the October war), but Britain again abstained from voting on the drafts of resolutions affirming the rights of the Palestinian people (27 January and 29 June 1976) because these drafts did not refer to the other sections of Resolution 242, that is, the secure boundaries and so forth.

In spite of its insistence on stating that the definition of the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people is a matter subject to negotiation, the British government accepted the principle of "a Palestinian national homeland." Former foreign minister David Owen declared before the House of Commons in March 1979 that the "national homeland" must be part of the comprehensive settlement and said that "autonomy on the West Bank and Gaza" was the first step toward that.

It appears that Mrs Thatcher's position is not very different from the Labor position. Like the Laborites, she welcomed Camp David, but considered the treaty "just a partial step toward a comprehensive settlement and a solution of the Palestinian problem." This, as the foreign minister, Lord Carrington, said on 22 May 1979, is "the heart of the problem."

The British consider that the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan has underlined the need to hasten to arrive at a solution to the Arab-Israeli struggle.

During the tour Lord Carrington made of the region this year, he discovered that Arab officials were prepared to cooperate with the West in the face of "the common challenge," but was also "surprised" that the Arabs made such cooperation conditional to the maximum degree on the progress which could be attained in the context of a solution. At that time it was stated that Lord Carrington returned from his Arab tour convinced that it was necessary to hasten to amend Resolution 242, while the secretary of state for foreign affairs, Lord Douglas Heard, declared "We are studying with our European partners whether there is a means by which it will be possible for European countries to improve opportunities for attaining a settlement." He pointed out that such a step might lie in filling the "void" in Resolution 242, which refers to the Palestinians as refugees, "because the Palestinians have rights far more advanced than that, and we consider that the Security Council must recognize those rights."

The Right of Self-Determination

If an initiative of that sort occurs, the French will certainly be Britain's major partners in it. There is no doubt that the French were ahead of the British, as they were ahead of other Europeans, in suppprting the Palestinian cause; in this sphere theirs has been the loudest market country voice in criticizing Camp David, once in an official statement issued by the council of ministers, another time in the words of Raymond Barre, and several times in the words of the foreign minister Jean Francois Poincet. During the Arab tour French President Giscard D'Estaing made this year, he emphasized that the Palestinian problem was not one of refugees but was one of a people who must enjoy the right of self determination within the context of a just comprehensive peace. In Giscard D'Estaing's position, which first appeared in a joint declaration issued in Kuwait, then was repeated in the rest of the visit, Western newspapers saw a basic shift in the European position.

This is because at that time the phrase "self-determination" appeared for the first time in a diplomatic document signed by France. It implicitly transcended the issue of a "national homeland" and supported the establishment of an independent Palestinian state. One should bear in mind that France had previously voted for international resolutions containing the same principle, as Abu 'Ammar pointed out in his comment on the subject.

However, the right of self determination, in spite of its significance, is not everything. There is a conviction on the part of Arab officials that there is a conviction on the part of Europeans, from Paris to The Netherlands--naturally proceeding through Luxembourg, which has assumed charge of the latest European movements--that the right of self determination, national homeland and the Palestinian state are matters which have been settled.

The dispute is over who will exercise the self-determination and who this state will be. Here, precisely, European policy once again is the captive of American policy, or, more accurately, it falls prey to the schizophrenia it has not been able to rid itself of.

Last year for the first time the Europeans, in their "Arab position," went to the point of naming the Liberation Organization. That happened for the first time in the speech which the foreign minister of Ireland delivered before the United Nations in the name of the European family, then was repeated in the speeches given by other European ministers.

However, Europe named the organization diffidently considering it a "partner" in the settlement not a representative of the Palestinian people. Even in the "Venice declaration," the organization remained "a partner," as far as Europe was concerned. This made a number of Palestinian leaders reject the initiative, in spite of their conviction that it constituted a sincere step on Europe's part, whatever the motives and causes.

Between Diplomacy and the Combatants

While some Arab leaders "understand" the European "limit" or "restrictions," others simply state that while the politicians understand Europe's situation, how can it be explained to the combatants? Either Europe is with us to a specific point or it is not.

In other words, more simply, how can Willi Brandt meet with the head of the Liberation Organization in his capacity as "the head of international socialism," but not as a leader of the ruling Democratic Party in West Germany, or, more accurately, as a former German chancellor? How can France accept a Liberation Organization office in Paris and receive Abu al-Lutf, the foreign minister of the organization, then be afraid of receiving Abu 'Ammar?

Is European support just verbal, then?

Some Europeans admit this, but, as one of Giscard D'Estaing's companions on the French president's visit to Abu Dhabi said, "Talk about politics and international relations is also important."

That is to say, talk in some cases is a position. It seems that what Europe is afraid of, or so at least some of its politicians say, is that if they go far in supporting the Arab policy which rejects the Camp David policy, that will cause it to lose its influence in carrying out an initiative, and there is no doubt also that there is a split among the Europeans in viewing the matter, or more precisely in the treatment of it, although the market countries ultimately anticipate a united political statement.

The French position is different, without a doubt, from the British one, and the British position is different from the Dutch one. The position of the Europeans who belong to the market is different from the position of the Europe which is still outside it. Austria is an inseparable part of Europe, as is Spain. The two have gone to the point of officially recognizing the organization and receiving Abu 'Ammar as the chief of a state while Greece, for example, which has not recognized Israel, still is hesitant to take Arab steps because it is a candidate for entering into the market.

In fact, during his visit to Israel a few days ago, the foreign minister of Luxembourg, Gaston Thorn (chairman of the current session of the Common Market Council), met the mayors and Arab leaders in the occupied territories and heard them inform him that the Liberation Organization was the sole legitimate representative. However, Thorn's response during the meeting did not go beyond the stipulation contained in the Venice declaration--the declaration which was behind his visit--although he dwelt on the existence of disputes between Europe and Israel. At the end of Thorn's visit Menachem Begin issued a declaration in which he said that "since the Venice conference, Israel no longer considers Europe an objective, independent partner."

This is true.

Between 1967 and 1980 Europe no longer has been a partner of Israel's. Between the American position, which rejects the Liberation Organization, the national homeland and the right of self-determination, and the European position, which recognizes the three, there is a vast distance. There certainly also is a vast distance between the positions of Spain and Paris.

However, there is another fact, which is that the "difference" in European positions is still far better than the American position, bearing in mind that what is required by this party, the Arab party, is not just who is rotating around the threshing floor; what is required rather is the wheat.

PROPOSAL FOR ARAB TRANSPORT, TOURISM

Beirut THE ARAB WORLD WEEKLY in English 11 Oct 80 pp 16-19

[Text] During the last two decades, the Arab world has been experiencing a rapid transformation in its structure as a whole, be it on the political, economic, or social levels. The economic and social changes registered have led to the improvement of certain fields of activity in the region.

Thus, the means of transportation and communications have been developing alongside tourism, trade and other economic activities. For this reason, the potential importance of Arab tourist activities has attracted the attention of both the tourism and transport industry and proposals to plan and improve these activities have been coming from various sources.

Air Transport

Between 1966 and 1976, Arab air transport activities have increased at an annual rate of 16 percent, when the annual increase in the world in general was 11 percent.

In an interview with the AL NAHAR ARAB & INTERNATIONAL weekly edition, the general manager of the Lebanese airlines company Middle East Airlines (MEA) said he estimated that, during the next ten years, Arab air transport will still have an annual increase of 15 percent, compared to the projected 9 percent for the world at large.

The high rate of increase of the Arab air transport operations is supported by the equally growing tourist services. AL NAHAR reported that the percentages, as far as passenger movement is concerned, were the following: 44 percent between an Arab country and a European country; 34 percent between two Arab countries, and the remaining 22 percent between the Arab world and other parts of the world.

These figures demonstrate that most of the Arab airlines' activities are with the outside world (66 percent), while only 34 percent are inter-Arab activities. The report added that there had been some neglect as far as linking together the major Arab airports was concerned.

There are 29 major Arab airports, and air services between them average 9.45 lines, instead of the expected 28 routes each airport should have established with the remaining 28 airports.

Proposals

In order to promote the development and improvement of inter-Arab air services, the report suggested the following measures:

1. To encourage Arab nationals to visit various Arab countries by:

a. launching campaigns which would introduce the various countries to potential visitors

b. to facilitate travel arrangements by canceling entry fees or speeding up the entry process

c. to improve airport services, especially the baggage claim section

d. to improve car rental operations so that a tourist who lands in one country could easily move about and to neighbouring countries by car.

e. to construct highways linking Arab cities to the main historical and touristic sites

f. to improve industries that cater to tourists: hotels, furnished apartments, camping sites and youth centers and hostels.

g. to organize tourist attractions, musical, cultural, etc

h. to develop touristic, historical and sports centers

i. to encourage the holding of trade fairs by providing the necessary facilities.

2. To encourage airlines companies to open new flights between the various Arab cities

3. To help airlines companies expand their operations and offer better services to their passengers

4. To ask airlines companies to lower air fares, this would be compensated by the profits realized through the increase of air flights and passengers.

Moreover, the report underlines the importance of introducing charter flights for middle and short distances, because it would attract a new social stratum whose limited income make regular fares inaccessible to them.

Charter Flights

A study made by the secretariat general of the Arab Federation of Tourism has come up with the following conclusions as far as chartered air transport is concerned:

1. The reduced air fares currently applied by regular airlines are still too expensive for the average Arab citizen

2. The principle followed of pricing air tickets on the assumption that the plane will be half-full leads to high prices

3. Chartered air transport is an important means to develop Arab tourism and has a market which differs from that of the regular airlines. It would not compete with the latter, especially insofar as long-distance flights are concerned

4. Tourism and business in general would be promoted if certain necessary facilities were provided for on chartered air flights

5. Current regular air fares in the Arab world are relatively more expensive than those practiced in Europe and other parts of the world. Therefore, the introduction of charter air services would lower the rates.

Land Transport

Land transportation has remained the most popular form of travel in the Arab world, both inside a country and from one country to the other. One of the main reasons for this is the fact that airports are located only in major cities and this does not attract passengers from towns located far from the city.

More than 3 million Arabs travel each year from one Arab country to the other by car. This has prompted a project agreement for the creation of an Arab Association of international Auto Transport. The association is expected to offer highway facilities to travellers from one Arab state to the other.

Railroad transportation is limited because of the lack of up to date railways between major Arab cities. The secretary general of the Arab Federation of Tourism, Mr Abdel Rahman Abu Rbah was quoted by AL NAHAR as saying that Arab efforts to establish modern networks of railroads in the Arab countries would bring about economic and social developments to the areas. The railroads could be used for tourist and trade purposes.

Recommendations carried by the AL NAHAR report for improving land transport in general are the following:

1. To hold an international meeting between Arab and European experts representing the tourism industry, the car industry and clubs in order to promote and organize automobile tourism in the Arab countries

2. To call on the Arab League's Company of Arab Land Transport to implemented needed improvements in order to promote tourist and trade activities and exchanges between the various Arab countries. [as published]

Maritime Transport

Maritime transport does not play an effective role in the development of tourism in the Arab countries. Only recently has there been some efforts to promote this means of transportation. AL NAHAR points out to a neglect on the part of the Arab official authorities in promoting and helping maritime companies.

The report says that the establishment of an Arab cruise ship company, with car transport services, would do much to help increase both maritime and land transport activities between the various Arab countries.

In conclusion, the report said that the social and economic changes that are taking place in the Arab world are leading to an increase in touristic activities which, in turn, require the development of means of transportation, on the inter-Arab scale.

STATUS OF MOSLEMS IN CHINESE TURKESTAN REVIEWED

Riyadh AL-RIYADH in Arabic 31 Aug 80 p 14

/Article by Iain MacKenzie: "The Moslems in Communist China Do Not Believe in God"/

/Text/ Islam is showing new vitality in China, but there are questions about its future in a Communist country where the older generation of believers is disappearing from life.

During the past 2 years, a number of mosques have been reopened, but government policy in this regard is linked to the need to improve the conditions of the domestic minorities in China and the country's reputation abroad. Chinese Moslems still lack any connection worth mentioning to the outer world, and the events in Iran and Afghanistan have not had any effect worth mentioning on them.

In the Zinqiang area situated in the far west of China, Su Mutung, the superintendent of minorities and the senior official in charge of religious affairs, said:

"During the Cultural revolution, Moslems were beaten for going to mosques, but now the government has resumed applying its former policy (on religious matters) and has prepared mosques. This however does not mean that there is an increase in the number of believers."

The areas which comprise the greatest accumulations of original Moslems are the Xinang Ughur region, which enjoys autonomy, in the far west of the country, the neighboring Jansu area, and the (Nankhiahiah) area adjacent to Jansu and Inner Mongolia.

These three areas contain about 9.4 million persons who are considered traditionally to be Moslems, out of a total population of 23.7 million, while about 3.6 "original Moslems" live in various areas of China, according to a document published by the Chinese Islamic Society for an international Islamic conference held in Pakistan early this year.

One can describe "original Moslems" as Moslem people who follow Islamic customs in such matters as eating, drinking and life styles and belong to groups which embraced Islam in the past but are not necessarily devout followers of the Islamic creed.

In the Xinqiang area, for example, the following minorities are considered to be traditional Moslem groups:

Bughur /sic; probably Uighur/: 5.7 million persons.

Kazakhs: 800,000.

(Hawis): 500,000.

Kirghiz: 100,000.

Tajiks: 23,000.

Uzbeks: 7,000.

Tatars: 3,000.

Su Mu-tung, member of the Committee of Minorities and Religious Affairs, said that it is difficult to estimate the number of devout followers in the region.

He stated, "It is truly difficult to determine the number of true believers because faith in religion is a private matter which does not concern the state."

'Abdallah al-Hajj, the imam of the (furin lin) mosque in Urumqi, estimated the number of true believers at roughly more than 700,000 Moslems out of an "original Moslem" population of 7 million. If this estimate is approximately correct, and reflects the situation in other areas of the country, the actual number of devout Moslems in China is close to 1.3 million. The overwhelming majority of the Chinese Moslems are Sunnites; in addition there is a small percentage of Shiites.

Su Mu-tung said that according to last year's statistics, the number of mosques in the Xinqiang region totalled 5,000 and the average number of people praying in each totalled 140.

"In its abovementioned document, the Islamic Society said that the number of mosques in Xinqiang totals 1,900, but there has been no explanation for this contradiction."

'Abdallah al-Hajj said that the number of people praying in the (furin lin) mosque more than doubled during the past 2 years, that is, reaching the figure of 300 people praying on Fridays. He said that the city of Urumqi itself contains 34 mosques while the town of Xinqiang, close to the Soviet borders, has more than 120 mosques.

The number of Moslems in the Jansu area adjacent to the northern Xinqiang area comes to about 1.14 million out of a total population of 18.94 million, according to statistics on the area and Islamic Society figures.

The original Moslems consist of (Hawis) and (Dunfis) along with several thousand (baos), Kazakhs and a few Uighurs.

The capital of the area has two mosques. People in charge of the larger of the two, which is built of red brick and was constructed at the site of a smaller mosque destroyed during the Cultural Revolution, said that work on the construction of this mosque began this year and it is to be completed next October.

The persons in charge of this mosque also added that 500 persons go to the mosque for the Friday prayer out of a total of about 2 million inhabitants in the city of Lanzu and its surrounding area.

The officials in the area said that there are other mosques in the villages and rural areas in regions inhabited by Moslems, but these officials have no idea of the number of these mosques.

The inhabitants of (Nantihia), situated to the East of the Jiansu area, number more than 3.6 million, one-third of whom are Moslems descended from the (Hawi) people.

The Nanxia region is still considered closed to foreign visitors, but there is no reason to believe that the position of the local authorities in this region concerning religion is very different from that of the authorities in the neighboring Jiansu.

Inner Mongolia, where the original inhabitants are considered traditionally Lamists, has 28,000 Moslems, most of whom are (Hawi), according to the imam of the two big mosques in the regional capital of Huhut.

The imam said that a number ranging from 700 to 800 persons comes to perform the Friday prayer in the mosque, which was reopened in July of last year, having been closed in 1966 during the Cultural Revolution. He said that more than 700 people frequent the other mosque in the town.

The Chinese Islamic Society says that there are also 50,000 Moslems and eight mosques in the old town of Zian located in the Shienjin region and 160,000 Moslems and two mosques in the capital, Beijing.

However, it seems that the figures for Zian and Beijing concern original Moslems rather than true believers. The Dong Si mosque in Peking, for example, has about 1,000 persons performing prayers during the most important religious occasions.

Article 46 of the current Chinese constitution says "Citizens have the freedom to believe in religion and the freedom not to believe in the call to atheism."

This provision compares with the provision of Article 88 of original 1954 constitution, which states "The citizens of the People's Republic of China enjoy freedom of religion."

However, the constitutional guarantees of freedom of religion were perverted during the Maoist Cultural Revolution in 1966, when mosques, shrines and churches were closed and desecrated on many occasions, religious personages were abused and devout followers of religions were persecuted.

Chinese Moslems admit that they were more mistaken than the followers of other religions during the 10 years of the Cultural Revolution, because of the deep-rooted nature of Islam in the region.

However, the mosques were closed, the devout were beaten, and members of Islamic sects were forced to abandoned their traditional customs. Su Mu-tung said that imams in the Xinqiang area were forced to raise pigs and eat pork during the Cultural Revolution, and they later lost their religious status as a result of that.

Stories are also told about imams who were forced to go about the streets with pig heads hanging from their necks. A Moslem from Kaxgar says that the mosques in that great Asiatic city were closed in 1966 and turned into shops, stores and warehouses during the Cultural Revolution.

The main mosque in the town of Hubut, whose history goes back 200 years and whose appearance from the outside is still in good shape, was saved from destruction during the Cultural Revolution because Red Guards used it to store the food they plundered from families in this area.

The fourth national conference of the Islamic Society was held in Beijing last April. It was the first national meeting of this type to be held since 1963. Politics immediately dominated the meeting and the conference chairman, al-Hajj Burhan, in his opening statement, declared his support for the Arabs in their struggle against Israel and for the Afghans in their battle against the Soviet Union.

The director of the government bureau of religious affairs in /word missing/Xioa Xiangu, said that believers and atheists are politically and socially equal in China and that freedom of religion is long-standing basic policy of the Chinese Communist Party.

Xiangu mentioned two other points directly related to the government's domestic and foreign policy: approval of religious freedom will help consolidate unity and rally all forces about the development program in the country.

Many people in other countries believe in the Islamic religion, and Islam in particular has great influence in countries of the third world, especially in Asia, the Middle East and Africa. However, Xiao went on to say, "Freedom of religion requires adherence to the socialist platform and preservation of the Communist Party leadership and the dictatorship of the proletariat."

Last June the newspaper PEOPLE'S DAILY, the official organ of the Communist Party, warned that religious freedom will be assured only through official supervision of religious authorities.

The newspaper said, "Citizens of the People's Republic of China must give priority to the unity of the country regardless of whether they believe in it, and personal religious activities and the interests of sects must be subjected to the general good of the country"

They stated that the government will establish schools for teaching the Koran and other subjects like religious policies. In a publication by Lanzwa radio toward the end of last July, it was stated that the Islamic Society "agreed that young people below the age of 18 should not be permitted to participate in religious activities."

The government's goal in granting further religious freedom and giving great autonomy to minorities is to strengthen unity among the various nationalities in China, and this slogan finds an echo in the mosque.

'Abdallah al-Haff, in the (furin lin) mosque at Urumqi, said,

"The slogan now is love of the nation, love of learning, and love of religion. We must call all citizens toward unity and the effort to develop China."

SOVIET MILITARY OFFICERS, AFGHAN OFFICIAL REPORTED KILLED IN KABUL

Quetta BALUCHISTAN TIMES in English 27 Oct 80 p 4

[Text] New Delhi, Oct 26--Reports from Afghanistan say two Soviet military officers and a senior Karmal regime official were killed by the Freedom Fighters near a Soviet military camp in a Kabul suburb last week.

According to diplomatic sources in New Delhi, reports of attacks have been coming in almost daily despite contentions by the Karmal regime about the country returning to normal.

These sources further said that the Afghan capital continues to remain tense. While the Kabul authorities control the capital and some other cities, much of the countryside is ruled by the Freedom Fighters who become active particularly during the night. AFP says commercial flights between Kabul and Jalalabad have been rerouted because of insecurity near Kabul.

Discontentment among the people is also reported persisting because of the conscription campaign to draft young men for compulsory military service. One Afghan youth was recently killed in the capital while resisting the conscription campaign. Night posters and secret letters are also said to have been distributed protesting against the conscription and urging those who had joined military service to give it up and support the Freedom Fighters.

Meanwhile, the leader of the Soviet-backed regime, Mr Babrak Karmal, has completed his official visit to the Soviet Union. The Soviet News Agency Tass however, said he will stay on for several days for rest and treatment. The officials accompanying Mr. Karmal during the visit have returned to Kabul.

In East Berlin, an International Communist Conference has ended with differences continuing among delegates over the Afghan crisis.

According to conference sources, the Spanish and Italian delegates sharply criticised the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan.

'NIGHT LETTERS' CIRCULATED IN KABUL BY REBELS

Karachi MORNING NEWS in English 27 Oct 80 p 8

[Text] New Delhi, Oct. 26--Afghan authorities prevented an anti-Soviet shutdown of business in Kabul on Friday by threatening shop owners with fines and loss of their licences, a report frcm Afghanistan said yesterday.

Some shops in the centre of the capital opened late in apparent response to the call for a shutdown, but by 10 a.m. it was as usual, said the report from a Kabul source that in the past has been accurate.

The strike call was issued in "night letters (shabnama)," as the Afghans call pamphlets circulated around Kabul by the guerillas, the report said. It requested the people to stage a five-day general strike to protest the presence of Russian troops in Afghanistan and what was described as the sale of Afghanistan to the Soviet Union by President Babrak Karmal, who has been visiting the USSR for the past 10 days, it added.

The "night letter" warned that shops ignoring the call would be burned down, the source said. On Wednesday and Thursday, Communist Party members rode through the streets of Kabul in Soviet military jeeps, warning over loudspeakers about fines and loss of licences, the report said.

The call for a business strike was not confirmed independently.

Still another strike call has gone out in "night letters," a Western diplomatic source said. It asks Afghan military officers to demonstrate support for the guerillas by staying at home or in their barracks next Monday.

The guerillas killed at least 10 Russians and captured seven in a shootout with a Soviet military construction crew last Wednesday 15 kilometres outside of the capital, yesterday's report from Kabul said.

The guerillas attacked a group of Soviet trucks loading sand for a construction project at the dry bed of the Kabul River. Construction of barracks is underway at several military bases around Kabul, and Afghans take this to mean that the Russian troops plan an indefinite stay.

Varsity Strike

Students and professors at the Kabul University launched a strike this week to protest against the Afghan Army recruitment methods, university sources reported in Kabul.

The strike which started on Friday should run to Tuesday, the sources said. It is the first protest of its kind since April, when a series of strikes and demonstrations broke out in the Afghan capital's schools and universities to protest against the Soviet military presence in the country.--APA/AFP

ZAHER SHAH MAY RESPOND TO AFGHAN MUJAHEDINS' CALL

Karachi BUSINESS RECORDER in English 28 Oct 80 p 3

[Text] Rome, Oct. 27--Afghanistan's deposed king is quietly tending his garden but some exiled Afghan leaders believe that he would answer a call to help unite resistance forces fighting to drive Soviet troops from their homeland.

King Mohammed Zaher Shah, toppled in 1973 after 40-year reign, has called for Afghan "patriots" to expel Soviet's forces and urged the squabbling opposition groups to cooperate.

Recently a wave of nostalgia for Zaher has swept the refugees' canvas tents and tea stalls in northwest Pakistan, Afghan sources say. They openly express hope that he could forge unity among the leaderless Mujahideen.

The bald, mustached 66-year-old Zaher was ousted in a July 1973 coup led by his cousin and former Prime Minister Mohammed Daud. The king was in Italy at the time, taking a rheumatism cure at the baths in Schia.

The king keeps out of the public eye. He will not talk to the press and spends most of his time cultivating flowers and reading history books at his four bedroom villa north of Rome, according to close friends.

Zaher has said repeatedly that he does not claim his former throne and would only support a restoration of the monarchy if Afghans rejected a republic in a nationwide referendum.

The King's son-in-law, first cousin and spokesman, Gen Abdul Wali, does not encourage speculation that the monarch is willing to take a new role, but he does not rule it out either. "The King is a patriot at the service of his people," Wali said in an interview. "Like anybody else, he shall serve according to his ability."

Wali said that the King enjoys prestige among many Afghans. "Some view him as a leader, some as a father figure," Wali said. "An entire generation of Afghans grew up under his rule." Some exile leaders think the King would agree to come out of retirement and this is a good time to do so.

"He does not seem ambitious to get back to his throne, but I think he would be available as a leader if the people wanted him," Jalil Shams, Secretary of the Islamic Council for the Liberation of Afghanistan, a Europe-based exile group, said in an interview.

"We are coming to a point where we should find someone and rally around him," Shams added. "The parties have failed to establish a single figure (as leader)," he said.

Nearly 11 months after the Soviet army intervened in Afghanistan, political rivalries among the five parties which comprise the Islamic Alliance resistance movement are deeper than ever according to Afghan sources.

The King meets periodically with representatives of the opposition groups and encourages them to cooperate, Wali said.

Forty-eight hours after the Soviet intervention last December, the King issued a statement condemning what he called the violation of Afghan sovereignty. He has not made any further public appeals since he sent messages to the individual resistance leaders in January, however.

"The King is not really very active. He gives advice if people approach him," Shams said.

Leftists in the army supported the 1973 coup and anti-communist exiles believe it paved the way for an openly pro-Moscow coup in April 1978.

Zaher withdrew quietly to his villa with his wife Queen Homaira, 64, and decided to stay in Italy because he likes the climate and the people. The family has one full time servant at the villa.

Many Afghan exiles remember the King's reign as a time of peace.--APA

MUJAHEDIN ATTACK FAIZABAD AIRPORT; 5 RUSSIANS KILLED

Karachi BUSINESS RECORDER in English 28 Oct 80 p 3

[Text] Peshawar, Oct. 27--According to a press release of Islamic Alliance for Liberation of Afghanistan, reports from Badakhshan province say that Mujahideen had destroyed one tank and one military jeep in a guerilla attach on Faizabad Airport.

Five Russians, including one officer were killed and two of them were wounded.

According to another report from Badakhshan, two tanks were destroyed in Qara Kamar by mine explosion.

According to a report from Takhar province, Mujahideen attacked a militia centre in Rustaq district. In this attack Mujahideen killed 20 militia and Russian soldiers. They captured 100 pieces of weapons including 303 rifles and machineguns.

Russians had tried to strengthen their positions in Rustaq to protect their agents, but they could not resist Mujahideen attack and after giving some casualties had to run away.

According to a report from Logar, Mujahideen burned down Mohammad Agha school building which had been turned into Babrak troops headquarters in the area.

According to another report from Logar, Mujahideen had called a general strike for October 13, 14 and 15. On the second day of the strike Russian agent militia started a massive attack.

Scattered fighting took place in different areas along the way between Kabul Gardez. In an attack on a caravan of trucks near Surkhab, Mujahideen destroyed 140 trucks and armoured vehicles and killed about 80 Russians and militia troops and captured ammunition from them.--PPI

GUERRILLAS DESTROY AMMUNITION CONVOY

Karachi DAWN in English 2 Nov 80 p 1

[Text] New Delhi, Nov. 1--Afghan guerillas destroyed a Soviet ammunition convoy, killed at least 45 Communist Party members and burned down a large primary school in raids north and south of Kabul the past week, a report from Afghanistan said today.

The guerilla raid last Monday night on the convoy near Sange-Niwishta pass, 37 kilometres southeast of Kabul, prompted Soviet punitive air attacks against "every moving thing" in the villages of Logar province, killing hundreds of civilians, said the report from a source that in the past has been reliable.

Several Russian soldiers were killed or injured in the raid in which guerillas, some firing rockets, destroyed 21 ammunition trucks, two armoured cars and one tank, the report added.

It said hulks of burned vehicles closed the road for two days through the narrow valley-terrain. The rebels have often turned to their advantage for attacks on government and Soviet units.

Guerilla losses were not given in the raid south of Kabul, but 15 to 17 freedom fighters were reported killed in strikes the past week against Police posts and a party office at Karte Parwan in the northern suburbs of Kabul. The report said the guerillas seized weapons and killed 30 members of the ruling People's Democratic (Communist) Party.

On Thursday night, the freedom fighters burned down the Wazir Akbar Khan Primary School in the same suburb, leaving 1,500 students without classrooms, the report continued.

Guerillas killed 15 party members attending a gathering in a private home at Charikar, the Parwan provincial capital 60 kilometres north of Kabul, during the week, the report said.

The specific raids were not independently confirmed but diplomatic reports reaching here have also mentioned fighting in the same areas.--APA

NATO EXPERT PREDICTS IRAQI VICTORY, IRANIAN COUP

Rome LA REPUBBLICA in Italian 25 Oct 80 p 11

[Interview with Gen John Hackett, former commander of British Forces in NATO by Mohammed Said Gunaidi]

[Text] [Question] Starting from the assumption that the superpowers will not intervene in the war, what are your views with regard to its results? Who will win?

[Answer] I believe Iraq will be able to attain its objectives, albeit not within the envisioned timeframe. I think Iraq will take Shatt el Arab and the islands, to the satisfaction of the Arabs. However, I would like to clarify two points: 1) The war will not last long 2) It would come as a surprise if it were to last through October with Ayatollah Khomeyni still in Qom as the leader of the Iranians.

[Question] Don't you believe that with Tehran isolated in the international scene, Iraq may be able to obtain the weaponry necessary for the continuation of the war?

[Answer] I don't believe, for example, that the United States is helping Iraq, though the Soviets would. I believe that both the Americans and the Soviets will let the two antagonists fight it out, so they can then intervene at the right moment and bring about a ceasefire.

[Question] You don't believe therefore that the war is being fought by the superpowers using surrogates?

[Answer] No. I stated that this war will not last long and I would like to predict something else: Soon we will hear more said about the Kurds. The situation at the present is very favorable for them on all fronts, in Turkey, in Iran, as in Iraq.

Who Supports the Kurds

[Question] For this to happen, it is necessary for someone from the outside to come to their aid: Among the reasons given for the signing of the 1975 Iranian-Iraqi accord was that of aid previously furnished by the shah and the Americans to Iraqi Kurds. Do you think it worthwhile for the Russians to incite the Kurds?

[Answer] The Kurds might find it to their advantage to come into the arena at a moment convenient for them and it might be known that it is the West that is encouraging them to do so.

[Question] In view of the fact that the West favors the fall of Khomeyni, why should it aid the Kurds? And why do you believe that the Kurds will go into action on all fronts?

[Answer] The Kurds have always relied on outside aid and the West will probably be interested in maintaining a means of pressure in the Gulf region. This is what the Americans, Kissinger in particular, have done in the past.

[Question] Reagan, the Republican candidate for the American presidency, in criticizing Carter's Iranian policy, sustained that the United States, in case the Straits of Hormuz were to be blocked, is not capable of intervening in a decisive manner because it does not possess sufficient forces.

[Answer] The Americans have the strength and the capacity to intervene. Actually, it is the Iranians who are not able to block the Straits of Hormuz. The only way to block the Straits is to mine them, but the Iranian Navy is not able to carry out this operation on its own and the United States has a naval force capable of making sure this does not take place. I believe what Reagan wanted to underline was the fact that the United States should not take unilateral military action, but rather cooperate with its allies.

Blocking the Straits of Hormuz Is Impossible

[Question] Isn't it possible to block the Straits by sinking some ships or some tankers as pointed out in some reports?

[Answer] No. These were not military reports. The width of the Straits does not permit this. The Straits of Hormuz are almost 60 miles wide and even at its narrowest points, it is wider than the English Channel. Thus it is impossible to block it, even by sinking 20 ships in the same spot.

[Question] You have mentioned serious gaps in the Iranian Army's weaponry, its training, spare parts and also with regard to its commanders. What is the situation with regard to the Iraqis?

[Answer] I believe that the Iraqis have better commanders. The Iranians now are fighting inspired by their fidelity to Iran and because they dislike Iraqis; however, they do not have military leadership. Khomeyni has destroyed the cadres which are indispensable to the armed forces. To that must be added the shortage of armaments, ammunition and spare parts. With his actions, however, Khomeyni has not destroyed the capability on the part of the military to grab power, and I believe this will happen. The Iranian Army will come to power. This will not be a surprise. Conversely, it would be a surprise if this did not happen.

[Question] Given the hypothesis of an Iranian Army coup, what effect would that have on the war?

[Answer] I think that if the army were to come to power, there would be peace. Iraq would annex Shatt el Arab and the other islands and thus the conflict would end. The war has been waged in order to obtain political objectives. The objectives of this war are clear to Iraq, which also has definite territorial aims. They are also clear to the West, which favors the elimination of the Khomeyni regime, with some options left open in the future for the winner.

TRAINING OF THE 'DEPRIVED' AT MILITARY CAMP DESCRIBED

Tehran JAVANAN-E EMRUZ in Persian 12 Oct 80 pp 54-55

[Interview with Hojjat ol-Eslam Amir Majd]

[Text] The natural, beautiful areas of the camp, the fields and the surroundings, were very lovely and attractive. As was mentioned earlier, the camp is built on a very large piece of land to the north of the city of Neyshabur on the slopes of the Khorasan Mountains. We should mention a beautiful, small dam built in the valley which is a place for raising trout.

The age difference between some of the participants was in itself interesting. When they walked together, one was reminded of a grandfather and his grandchildren. A common goal had gathered together 60 or 70 year old men with youths of 15 or 16.

The importance of the camp from the point of view of mercenary radio stations in the service of foreigners was quite noteworthy. During the camp activities, a false report was spread by one of these radio stations. In order to neutralize this action, the participants began a large, widespread march in the city of Neyshabur. This undertaking instigated excitement in the people who cheered the participants warmly with revolutionary slogans. Finally, together they stood at prayer in the congregational mosque of the city and neutralized any kind of rumor.

The closeness of Neyshabur to Mashhad made all the participants yearn for a pilgrimage to the tomb of his holiness Reza. After a suggestion by them to the supervisor of the camp, the camp was concluded one day early to enable them to go enthusiastically to Mashhad on a pilgrimage to the eighth imam of the Shi'ites and from there to depart for their own cities.

At the end of the camp, one M-1 rifle was given as a gift to each one of the participants by the Organization for the Mobilization of the Deprived to be taken with them to their own cities so that when needed they would not have to get weapons from military camps.

The opening day of the camp, Sep 7, coincided with the anniversary of Tehran's Black Friday. On Sep 9, ceremonies marking the anniversary of the death of the Abuzar of the time, his holiness Ayatollah Taleqani, were held simultaneously with those in other cities.

Final Section

You have read in the last two issues Parts 1 and 2 of the report of the correspondents of JAVANAN Magazine dispatched to the military camp of the Organization for the Mobilization of the Deprived in Baghrud, Neyshabur. Here you will read briefly about the events and how the camp was conducted:

The History of Mobilization

In Nov-Dec [Azar] of last year, the decree of Emam Khomeyni, the leader of the Islamic revolution of Iran, concerning the establishment of an army of 20 million was issued. This decree was based on a vital social, political, and military need. Following the imam's decree, the revolutionary people of our country went to work in various parts of the country on this important matter and began military and cultural training. But it was necessary for this training to come under an organized and controlled unit in order to yield better results. To this end, the Organization for National Mobilization was established, which overtook the management of military, political, and cultural traning of the resistance army assisted by the pasdaran and the military. Since then, because of the overwhelming welcome of the people throughout the country and present sensitive conditions, this organization reached extensive proportions. At the present time, more than hundreds of thousands of individuals throughout Iran have joined the resistance army. The activities of this organization are not limited to mere military training, but the duties of the organization extend to cultural training, reinforcement training, and medical emergency training as well.

Recently, in order not to limit the activities of this organization, the name was changed to The Organization for the Mobilization of the Deprived.

The Location of the Camp

The Baghrud camp is located 15 km north of the city of Neyshabur. Baghrud is a village in which more than 50 families live at present. The land for the camp covers more than 100 acres on which the Boy Scouts of Iran intended to build a scout camp.

Of course, what is interesting is the manner in which the camp was to be established. It was to be built not for the people, but for a small number of children, for example, the children of the royal family, in order to make Iran better known to the people of the world by inviting foreign guests and organizing scout meetings with the participation of the Pahlavi family. Since the day the construction of this camp began, strict limitations were put on the villagers. Their agricultural land was regularly taken away from them in order to provide security for the camp and the people had to leave the region. After the victory of the revolution, the camp was given to the army and the Organization for Mobilization to be used as a military camp.

The Program of the Camp

As was mentioned earlier, this camp was the military camp for the 20-million army. But ideological issues and cultural activities were also taken into consideration along with military training.

Every day, after the evening prayers, various personalities were invited to the camp to give speeches to the participants. Among these guests was Dr Ghafurifard, the governor general of Khorasan, who spoke to the participants of the camp on two nights. In one part of his speech he said:

Why does the United States warship come into the Persian Gulf but does not dare to attack? Why do American helicopters land in Tabas but run away in humiliation? Because they well know that 35 million human beings are prepared for holy war and martyrdom and if Americans set foot here, all the people will take up arms and make Iran a graveyard of Americans. America knows through its spies and experience that if there remains only one person of the 35 million Iranians, half of his heart will be full of love for the Koran, Islam, and the imam of the people and the other half full of enmity and hatred for America.

In another section of his speech, he referred to good and bad deeds in our times saying:

During certain periods of time, good deeds mean merely the understanding of the Koran and ideological issues. But when a time comes that the Koran itself and the Islamic country is in danger, when the enemy attacks from within and without, at this time good deeds do not mean sitting at home worshipping and praying. We must take up arms and defend our borders. I do not mean only geographical borders, but also ideological borders. Here, good deeds mean holy war and martyrdom. Anything but this would be evil deeds and anti-revolutionary.

The camp programs began at 0500; from then until 0700, when morning ceremonies began, individuals carried on personal things such as eating breakfast, praying, and doing morning exercises. After the conclusion of morning ceremonies, people were divided into various pre-assigned groups and went to the fields for military training. The morning military training lasted until 1230, at which time the participants returned to their tents, ate lunch, did their prayers, and rested. Afternoon military activities began at 1530 and lasted until 1830. The following are some of the areas of military training offered at the camp:

Self-defense, guerrilla and anti-guerrilla techniques, fighting with bayonets, night watching, compass, hiding, the recognition of military equipment, fighting disasters such as flood, fire, and earthquake, the treatment of prisoners of war, medical aid, ambush and anti-ambush techniques.

These are brief samples of the kinds of training which the people went through on various days at the camp.

Interview with Hojjat ol-Eslam Majd

We held an interview with Hojjat ol-Eslam Majd, the supervisor for the Mobilization of the Deprived, who was present at the gathering of brothers at the camp, which follows:

[Question] In conversations with different individuals from different cities, all spoke of the cultural poverty of the people. Would you please explain the cultural goals of the Organization for Mobilization and the steps you have taken?

[Answer] For us, Islamic culture is of primary concern in this organization. The reason is obvious. The weapon which brought victory to our revolution was the faith and the beliefs of the people and not modern weapons which had been built and given to the people. We are striving diligently to strengthen this weapon. You have noticed that military training is not our only goal. It is a means to enable us to extend cultural training. Cultural and military training are never separate. This is what the prophets did. The imam has also emphasized that we should take up arms in one hand and the Koran in the other. We emphasize both of these aspects. The creation of spiritual weapons is one of our principles. Therefore, attention is paid to cultural and ideological issues, to individuals and institutions. This training does not end with our organization. However, military training, because of present conditions and various threats, is of more immediate importance for our people and shortcomings are felt more in this area of training. But I should emphasize once more that military training is coupled with ideological training. At the present time, our ideological and cultural division is working on this problem. Since we are in a sensitive situation militarily, this division has been unable to attract the people as well as our military division has.

[Question] I would like you to speak about the sister members of the 20-million army and their programs and whether they also participate in similar camps.

[Answer] In certain areas, our sisters have been more enthusiastic than our brothers. Military, cultural, and reinforcement training, which are among the duties of the Organization for Mobilization, are provided for everybody. And our wives and mothers are actively participating. For the future, we are prepared to organize camps with instructors in conformity with the status and the personality of our women. They could not participate in this camp due to the lack of means, especially the shortage of instructors. On the whole, however, the participation of women in the mobilization is in step with that of the brothers. And our aged mothers and wives are also actively involved. Most often they support us in jobs such as food preparation, behind the front jobs, and nursing. In the future, we will have important programs in this area which we will soon carry out.

[Question] Please give us some explanation of the change of the name of the Organization for National Mobilization to the Organization for the Mobilization of the Deprived.

[Answer] Our revolution has two dimensions. First, the dimension within the borders, concerning independence and our own internal problems. Second, beyond the borders, a universal dimension.

It is our duty to help others in the world who are deprived. This help would be mostly spiritual, such as exporting revolution, providing hope, and setting them in motion. Before this name was changed, the word was "national" mobilization. We explained many times that the word "national" does not indicate limited dependencies such as tribe, race, language, or material relationships. And then, too, we meant the mobilization of a nation which included the internal dimension of our revolution. But since it did not include the external and universal aspects of the revolution, it was felt that it was necessary to choose a term which would include the universal dimension of the revolution. Hence, this term was suggested. Other terms such as sacred [qots] were suggested. We brought them to the attention of the imam and the word "deprived" [mostaz'afin] was chosen, which is an ideological and all-inclusive term. And it includes all the movements in the world which demand their rights. After completely studying other true, liberating movements, we intend to establish an office here to maintain contact with them in order to benefit from each other's experiences and possibilities.

[Question] Is this the first military camp of the Organization for Mobilization and what is your opinion concerning military camps and specifically this camp?

[Answer] No, this is not our first camp. In the past we have had other camps which were smaller in size and number of participants. This camp is our first large camp of this size and quality, which has more than 10,000 participants. In spite of the imperfections and shortcomings of this camp, because of the lack of means, on the whole, it has been satisfactory, because it was organized on the basis of goals, like in organizing a seminar.

We have daily sessions and conversations with our brothers from various cities and provinces and we hear about their problems. We have discussions and exchanges of views concerning solutions. Other brothers from each one of the provinces hear about each other's problems. From a psychological point of view, these camps can be very beneficial and can neutralize the plans of the enemy, which are to try to create enmity and separation between the people of this country.

On the whole, in spite of all the problems we have had, the camp has been satisfactory and it corresponded with our general intentions. We hope to have better camps in the future by eliminating the problems.

What you have read above was a brief report about the large military camp of the Organization for the Mobilization of the Deprived which was held last month. What has since caused us astonishment are the present situation of our country and the words of those in charge in the past. We should pay attention to the words of Dr Qafuri and Hojjat ol-Eslam Majd once more, as if those words had been spoken today, at this very moment, and before them, our imam, this superhuman of the times who has warned us again and again of such days and who for the same reason decreed the organization of the 20-million army and the mobilization of the people.

The forced and stupid war which Sadom began with the help of Western politicians and Eastern weapons shows that although they have struggled to precisely understand the Islamic revolution of Iran, they have never succeeded in this affair, because the role of the Moslem masses in protecting the revolution never played a role in the political analyses of these idiots. In the first week of this forced war between Iran and Iraq, what we saw in their analyses was a war and war strategy without consideration of the people. As for Iraq, at any rate, this assessment holds, since it has had to continue and finish a war which it started with the help of its army. But in our case, this was not so. From the beginning of the war, we witnessed the role of the mobilized people, their battle alongside the armed forces and behind the front, their faith in the revolution, the pure love of the country, and their strong belief in the ideology which caused the people of the world to awaken as the war continued and to contemplate once more on Iran, the people of Iran and their steel will, to awaken once more from their daydreaming. On this path, we contemplate what God has promised: "We have willed to favor those who have suffered deprivation and to make them the inheritors and leaders of the time."

LEFTIST, RIGHTIST FIGURES ACCUSE FOREIGN MINISTER OF FOLLOWING U.S.

Paris AL-MUSTAQBAL in Arabic 18 Oct 80 pp 30-31

/Article by Ghassan Bayram: "A Question Lebanese Raise to the Cabinet: Why Do You Only Follow Washington's Line?"/

/Text/ The chairman of the Socialist Progressive Party and the Political Council of the Lebanese National Movement, Mr Walid Jumblatt, in his private gatherings, recounts impressions of some significance which he brought back from his recent visit to the Soviet Union in the company of Mr Samir Franjiyah, nephew of former Lebanese president Sulayman Franjiyah.

These impressions concern the Soviet position on the Lebanese crisis, the current Lebanese situation, the legitimate authorities, the nature of the struggle which is still taking place on the Lebanese stage and the need to attain a settlement to this struggle which will lead to support for the legitimate authorities under the leadership of President Ilyas Sarkis.

Among these impressions, for example, was the one which was derived from a meeting Mr Jumblatt and his companion Franjiyah held with one of the most prominent Soviet leaders, Mr Kirilenko, one of the candidates to succeed the Soviet leader Leonid Brezhnev.

During this meeting Mr Kirilenko raised a question whose gist was, "Is it true that relations between Israel and the Lebanese Phalange Party are very weak these days?" Expressions of consternation immediately appeared on the faces of Messrs Jumblatt and Franjiyah, because the question itself surprised them; they had not expected that this issue would be the focus of the attention of the Soviet leadership and that a question would be raised on it by a major Soviet official.

Naturally Mr Kirilenko did not anticipate an answer from the Lebanese Socialist leader, and he did not want to obtain additional information on the new circumstances which Israeli-Phalange relations were going through.

When a Soviet official at that level asks a question of that kind, he wants in one way or another to give the leader of the Lebanese National Movement and his comrade an oral message, telling them that there is a weakness in relations between Israel and the Lebanese Phalange and that it would be best to use this weakness in the interests of the approach calling for an expansion of the gap between Israel and the Phalange and a narrowing of the gap between the Phalange and the other Lebanese parties opposed to it on the other hand.

This is the interpretation given to the major Soviet official's question, especially since this statement was made about 2 months ago, that is, at a time when repeated meetings were taking place in Beirut between the Soviet ambassador in Lebanon, Mr Soldatov, and the leader of the military wing of the Phalange Party, Shaykh Pierre al-Jumayyil, and between the latter and other officials in the Soviet Embassy.

It is stated that four meetings took place in the course of 2 months between Ambassador Soldatov and Shaykh Pierre al-Jumayyil, which were intermingled with an exchange of letters that consisted of specific written questions from the Phalange Party which the Soviet ambassador received, and to which he gave written answers in return after review by his government.

In this regard a prominent Phalange official says that "Whatever the results of this conversation with the Soviets have been, and whatever the Soviets' answers to our question have been, satisfactory or unsatisfactory, the party is not disturbed at all--to the contracy, there is satisfaction within the party and we sense a benefit, if not to the requisite degree."

The objective in reciting these facts is not just to give information, but more because these have become examples which are given, in some political symposia of different tendencies and inclinations, of the extent of the inability of Lebanese diplomacy and the failure of the foreign minister to move this diplomacy in all international directions for the sake of presenting the Lebanese problem and conscripting whatever international forces are possible in order to arrive at a solution to it.

The queries are no longer, as in the past, addressed to the reasons which cause the foreign minister to be in constant contact with the ambassador of the United States of America in Beirut; rather, they have all started to revolve about the reasons which cause the foreign minister of Lebanon, in the circumstances which his cabinet and his country are going through,to cut off all contact with the ambassador of a great power like the Soviet Union, except when the foreign minister decides to meet with the ambassadors of the major powers which have permanent membership in the international Security Council.

The complaints against Lebanese diplomacy are no longer restricted to a specific group of Lebanese politicians or people working in the general field; rather, the complaints have become general and comprehensive, now that people on the far right have started to raise the same questions as people on the far left and the center on the reasons why the foreign minister works only along the American line and keeps the road of movement in the opppsite direction, that is, the Soviet road, closed and almost unused to the point where a moderate politician, well known for his friendship with the president, has wondered on more than one occasion "What is the logical explanation why Bashir al-Jumayyil met four times with the Soviet ambassador in the course of 2 months while the foreign minister has not met with him once, realizing that Bashir al-Jumayyil is not George Hawi, chairman of the Lebanese Communist Party?"

What attracted people's attention was the fact that Minister Fu'ad Butrus tried to arrange a meeting with the American secretary of state and the French foreign minister more than a week before his trip to New York, but did not try to take advantage of his presence in the United Nations to meet with Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko to review the Lebanese situation in its real state and thereby discuss developments in the Middle East crisis and ways of limiting its effects on the Lebanese situation.

After Minister Butrus' return to Beirut, more than one friendly politician criticized him for this "failure" to try to meet with the foreign minister of a great state like the Soviet Union which has a great role and influence in various international crises, especially in the Middle East crisis--a role and an influence which are expected to grow in the foreseeable future, especially following the Iraqi-Iranian war and the Soviet-Syrian treaty.

These friends wondered what harm there was in trying to get in touch with the Soviets or at least meet the Soviet foreign minister when an opportunity arose such as Minister Butrus' presence at the United Nations.

In spite of the fact that this style (according to these sources) has stamped official Lebanese policy with the character of "total alignment with the American camp, causing this policy to lack the minimum of balance which it must show," it is only fair to state that this is not wholly what is meant and is not the objective in the Lebanese foreign minister's thinking.

On more than one occasion, the Lebanese foreign minister has taken the initiative to condemn American policy regarding the Lebanese crisis. In more than one statement, he has attacked American failure to support the Lebanese position in word and deed, stating that American support has in practice not yet emerged from the verbal context.

This is a blatant fact which has been conspicuous on more than one occasion in which Washington has striven to implicate the legitimate Lebanese authorities in bothersome positions, in the south of Lebanon or outside it, and then at the last hour relinquished support for these positions. On more than one occasion the United States of America has given the legitimate Lebanese authorities evidence of matters which it soon abandoned at the last moment. And so on. However, the problem lies in Minister Fu'ad Butrus' vision. Since the beginning Minister Butrus has been gambling on the fact that if there is a solution to the Lebanese problem it will of necessity lie in the hands of the Americans. He gambled on the fact that if there is an international body which can provide Lebanon with the aid which will enable it to transcend its trials it is America. In the worst case, he gambled that if there was an international body capable of limiting the ramifications of the Lebanese crisis it was America. Indeed, Butrus lost hope of the possibility of obtaining a European position which would support or partially save the Lebanese entity. Since the beginning, Minister Butrus has constantly believed that there is no benefit in resorting to the Soviets because Moscow could not support Lebanon at the expense of the Palestinians.

When Minister Butrus recently became persuaded that there was no hope in the Arab situation, and that the solution, or the beginning of a solution, would either lie in the hands of the Syrians or would not exist, this gamble caused him finally to determine to break off with the Arab states and gamble entirely on Syria in a manner which to some extent damaged Lebanon's relations with some Arabs who have specific touchy feelings toward Lebanon and the Arab role in Lebanon.

Perhaps there are few people who can argue with the foreign minister on principle over these gambles, but the overwhelming majority has started to hold the foreign minister to blame for his style and method in dealing with matters and handling international, regional and Arab events and variables.

There are people who state frankly, in front of the foreign minister, and perhaps the president, that to bet on the Americans, after all that Lebanon has suffered from America, does not mean and cannot mean a final break with the Soviets, considering Moscow to be in the enemy camp, and that gambling on one Arab body or another does not mean and cannot mean a final break with the other Arabs who possess Arab, international and regional weight.

In the opinion of many, the gravity of this style in the foreign minister's platform no longer lies in the fact that it has caused Lebanon's isolation on many occasions and made its issue a peripheral one in comparison with the other issues in the region. Rather, the gravity has come to lie in the fact that this style of thinking is in one way or another reflected in his platform of government and policy, and is therefore a source of permanent refusal to have President Ilyas Sarkis make permanent trips to Arab countries and major countries to present the Lebanese cause whenever ramifications appear or dangerous dimensions to it appear.

BUDGET FOR 1981 ALREADY APPROVED

Paris AN-NAHAR ARAB REPORT & MEMO in English 6 Oct 80 pp 4-5

[Text] Lebanon's caretaker government has approved a budget of LL 5.2 billion (LL 1 = $0.290) for Fiscal year 1981, despite its constitutionally disputed right to do so. The budget which has now been sent to the Chamber of Deputies for approval includes a deficit of LL 1.48 billion which, according to one local press report, is to be financed by the issue of Treasury Bills, and local and foreign loans.

The new budget shows an increase of approximately LL 800 million over that of the current year. However, this year's figure is purely theoretical, as in accordance with usual practice, allocations for infrastructural projects will probably not be fully spent. Nevertheless, according to the Minister of Finance Ali el-Khalil, the proportion of expenditures going to reconstruction has gone up this year to 37 per cent of total expenditure, against 34 per cent last year. The minister has also pointed out that this year's deficit is 2 per cent lower than last year's, at 33 per cent of the total budget figure.

No final breakdown of the figures has been given, pending parliamentary ratification of the budget later this month. However, some local press reports have indicated that the Ministry of Defence's allocation has gone up by LL 242 million over this year's figure of LL 980.48 million; the Ministry of Education is reported to be receiving LL 662.8 million, a LL 152 million increase over the current year's allocation, while the Ministry of Public Works' share is to go up by LL 76 million to LL 662.8 million. An increase in budgetary reserves of LL 124 million is reported to have been earmarked for high cost of living and wage increases.

AIRPORT EXPANSION PLAN DESCRIBED

Paris AN-NAHAR ARAB REPORT & MEMO in English 6 Oct 80 p 5

[Text]

The expansion of Beirut's international airport will cost the Lebanese government a total of LL 1 billion (LL 1 = $0.29), according to press reports last week. The Director General of Urbanism, Mohamed Fawaz also indicated that the terminal expansion project alone would cost LL 304 million. A figure of around LL 250 million was given last December, at the time when the airport authority had shortlisted 17 companies for this project (An-Nahar Arab Report & MEMO, December 10, 1979).

The airport expansion plan, designed to permit handling of 6 million passengers by 1990, is divided into three phases, according to a study by the French firm Aéroport de Paris. These are work which is currently being undertaken, work for which contracts have been awarded but where construction has not yet begun and finally, future extensions to the airport which have been given ministerial approval but have not yet been put out for tenders.

Underway already is the LL 3 million expansion of office space to be rented to the various airlines operating at the airport, and which will be operational some time in 1981. Also underway is the construction of a LL 15 million catering centre, which is to provide 10,000 meals a day by the end of next year. Furthermore, a LL 1 million building is being erected for warehouses and customs offices.

A project for which bidding has closed but for which ministerial approval for implementation is still pending, is the expansion of the airport terminal from its current area of 35,000 square metres to 135,000 square metres. The new terminal is to be equipped with two covered walkways which will enable passengers to embark directly from the terminal building, without having to be transported across the runway by bus, as is the case at present. This part of the airport expansion project was awarded last April to Caragulla-Vianini, and is estimated to cost LL 304 million. The first phase of the terminal expansion is to be completed in 26 months and the entire project to be finished by 1984.

Lastly, future plans which are yet to be offered for bidding, include a new 3,750 metre-long runway, to be built parallel to two existing runways of 3,200 metres each. A three-story parking lot at the same location as the present one, facing the entrance of the airport, is also one of the future projects, which is estimated to cost LL 75 million. Additional customs, cargo and security-related buildings to be built will cost LL 105 million.

According to Mr Fawaz, the overall cost of the expansion projects to be undertaken at the airport in the next few years, are now estimated at LL 1 billion and may rise further in case of delays in the execution of the projects. But he added: " Financing is no problem at all. That may be the most remarkable aspect of the situation in Lebanon."

NEW PASSPORTS IN WAKE OF FORGERIES

Paris AN-NAHAR ARAB REPORT & MEMO in English 6 Oct 80 p 5

[Text]

New Lebanese passports will have a different design as of December 1, it was learned in Beirut. According to the Director General of the Lebanese Sûreté Générale Farouk Abillama, the decision to issue passports of different format was taken more than three months ago, before a recent discovery of a network of forgers, who have been supplying false passports and visas to Lebanese migrants.

The new passports are being made by the English company Thomas Delarue and Co, which already prints Lebanon's banknotes. Mr Abillama said that the new passports would have a number of characteristics which would make them virtually impossible to copy. Lebanese passports in circulation since 1975 have been printed in Lebanon, and according to Mr Abillama, were relatively easy to forge.

The announcement concerning the new passports comes on the heels of the latest and largest-yet round-up of forged documents, following the expulsion by Sweden of more than 200 Lebanese citizens in the last few months. Recently, people who were either working temporarily or applying for residence in Sweden were flown back to Beirut by the Swedish authorities, who had discovered they all held false passports and/or forged visas. A few days later another four Lebanese citizens were repatriated to Beirut under the same charges.

Since then, it has been revealed that the would-be migrants obtained their documents at considerable expense from a gang of forgers, who are apparently well-protected by one of the local militias in Beirut. At the time when the 69 Lebanese were repatriated, some local newspapers carried reports linking the forgery group to prominent members of the Phalange Party. The majority of the deported migrants were reportedly from Lebanon's Syriac Christian community, who are generally seen as staunch supporters of the National Liberal Pary, led by ex-President Camille Chamoun. The Lebanese daily As-Safir claims that following a Phalangist operation to crush the NLP on July 7 (An-Nahar Arab Report & MEMO, July 14) Phalangist militia commander Bechir Gemayel threatened the Syriacs if they did not switch their support to him. As-Safir also said that Mr Gemayel summoned Syriac leaders and instructed them and their followers to leave the country, ensuring that facilities were provided for those who wished to do so.

According to the latest reports the Lebanese judicial authorities have identified the gang of forgers but cannot actually lay hands on them. It appears that the gang is being protected from police enquiries by "elements obstructing the course of justice." One Beirut daily has alleged that the authorities knew the names and addresses of the forgers, who are thought to have made some LL 14 million (about $4 million).

FLAREUP IN SYRIAN-IRAQI RELATIONS SEEN AS LIMITED IN SCOPE

London AL-HAWADITH in Arabic 29 Aug 80 p 24

[Article: "A 'Muddying Of the Waters Sketch' Between Damascus and Baghdad; a Limited Flareup In Syrian-Iraqi Relations"]

[Text] Ever since the French poet LaFontaine wrote the fable of "the wolf and the sheep" the story of "muddying the waters" has been used as an example of fabricated tension in bilateral relations between nations. Nowhere is this story more appropriate than as applied to the relations between Syria and Iraq. The story about muddying the waters between Damascus and Baghdad has reached the point that it has almost become a story of poisoning the waters. It is well known among agricultural societies that cutting off water or muddying the water, and particularly poisoning the water, is something that causes great anxiety and provokes retaliation, as is best portrayed in Lebanese musical sketches. People in power--mayors, village chiefs and governors--know just how sensitive this "water sketch" is to the people. It touches a sensitive spot in order to kindle feelings of revenge on those accused of muddying the water.

Thus, the Iraqis forgot the reason for their invasion of the Syrian embassy in Baghdad in full view of the Arab diplomats who had been summoned by the Iraqi foreign ministry for this purpose. All they could think of was the "jar of poison" which they had been told was inside the Syrian embassy to be used for poisoning the water.

The Iraqi authorities had previously accused Iran of a failed attempt to poison the water in al-Najaf and Karbala' for the purpose of arousing revenge against the government. So it happened that the Iraqi government had struck this chord to arouse the people of al-Najaf and Karbala' to vengeance against Iran.

But the "water sketch" between Syria and Iraq is not new. It has been played more than once with regard to the water of the Euphrates after Syria built a dam on the river with Soviet assistance. Al-Sadat threatened to go to war over this kind of water problem if the countries through which the Nile passes on its way to Egypt should block its waters or cut them off from the Egyptians. The Kuwaitis, too, say that they prefer to desalinate sea water than to pipe water from the Shatt al-'Arab in Iraq for fear that the Iraqis might cut off the flow one day.

The Syrians say that the invasion of their embassy in Baghdad was fabricated, and that the Iraqi authorities planned it to publicly revile Syria in full view of Arab diplomats in the strangest display of its kind in diplomatic history. Although the Iraqi government announced the expulsion of the Syrian ambassador and the embassy staff from Baghdad within 48 hours, relations between the two countries were not severed. The Syrians responded in kind, expelling the Iraqi ambassador and the embassy staff, about 20 employees. But despite what has happened, the two sides seem to prefer to keep the flareup in their relations limited. Relations were severed in fact, but not officially.

In such circumstances it is difficult to know for certain whether the episode at the Syrian embassy was real or concocted. But the event itself is of no importance to the political atmosphere in which it took place.

This atmosphere has indicated a silent tension in Syrian-Iraqi relations since the breakdown of unification talks more than a year ago. This tension, however, has not come into the open until recently.

The Syrians have their suspicions that the Iraqi authorities brought the situation to public attention at this time to block the efforts being made towards a general Arab settlement, because such a settlement under present circumstances would be in Syria's interests. This is the view held by certain European observers inasmuch as economic factors are a principal cause of Syria's current troubles, and an Arab settlement would cause an economic explosion in Syria, which would lead to a political explosion. These observers say that the economic hopes that have been held out by the Syrian government to its citizens for more than 2 years have not been realized. This has had negative political repercussions. Although the Syrian government does not deny that its economic hopes have not achieved the desired level of success, it attributes that to the negligence of the wealthy Arab countries which have given Syria only a limited amount of money, not enough to meet its needs.

It is noteworthy that until very recently the Syrian government refrained from mentioning Iraq in connection with the acts of violence that have occurred in the country of late, having been content to accuse Jordan. But it has begun to alter this course. It indicated that according to several defendants who surrendered to the Syrian authorities they had received training in Iraq. Sources close to the Syrian government have pointed to Iraqi involvement in the disturbances in Syria. These disturbances had subsided completely during the unification honeymoon between the two countries. They had begun before that, and broke out again after it ended. Other indications that are cited are the fact that Prof Akram al-Hawrani, who is currently in exile in Baghdad, broke his silence for the first time since he left Syria 15 years ago, in a statement he gave to the pro-Iraqi magazine AL-WATAN AL-'ARABI which is published in Paris. In the statement he described the Moslem Brotherhood as "fighters in a holy war." The same thing is true of Mr Hammud al-Shufi, who resigned his post as Syria's representative to the United Nations last year and sought asylum in Iraq.

The Iraqis on their part deny direct involvement in Syria's internal affairs. But they say that they cannot prevent Syrian opposition groups from carrying out their activities. They have tried in the past to check this activity with only limited success. The Iraqi authorities also cannot turn a deaf ear to the pressure exerted by these groups which are quite numerous in Iraq.

Thus, observers tend to consider the recent flareup in Syrian-Iraqi relations as a limited one. The Iraqi authorities have no desire to get deeply involved in Syrian affairs, particularly with the Moslem Brotherhood waiting in the wings. But at the same time they have succumbed to the influence of the Syrian opposition groups which have taken refuge in Iraq and which exert continual pressure for greater Iraqi involvement. Therefore, they see the recent "dose" which led to the withdrawal of ambassadors as a compromise between the two directions which affords the Iraqi government a measure of flexibility at the pan-Arab level, because it is not in its interests to be accused of breaking up the Arab ranks. It is the Iraqi government which considers one of its most important accomplishments in this area that it was able to unify these ranks at the Baghdad summit conference 2 years ago.

In the opinion of observers there are also ideological pitfalls which cannot be ignored by the Syrians or the Iraqis in the internal conflicts, not to mention party differences. These, too, are factors which encourage a limited flareup. Since it was founded, and before the differences among its members arose, the Ba'th Party has represented a third ideological line, between the communists and the Moslem Brotherhood. Those who have joined it are opponents of the communist parties and the movements of the Moslem Brotherhood. Therefore there is a fundamental obstacle to a radical alliance between any branch of the Ba'th party and the communists or Moslem Brethren. Thus, the Syrians cannot support the Iraqi communists to the point that the Iraqi government will fall to the Communist Party, and the Iraqis cannot support the Moslem Brotherhood in Syria to the point that the Syrian government will fall to the extremist religious faction. Thus, the amount of intervention of each side in the domestic affairs of the other is equal.

As far as the effect of the foreign relations of the two countries on the domestic conflicts are concerned, they are marginal. Although President Hafiz al-Asad had visited Iran during the shah's rule, that did not prevent his establishing good relations with Khomeini. Although President Saddam Husayn fought against the shah, then made peace with him in Algiers, that will probably be repeated when a clearly defined authority emerges in Iran. Before the establishment of good relations between Iraq and Jordan, Syria and Jordan were practically unified. This has also been true of the two countries' relations with Saudi Arabia, the Soviet Union and the United States.

It may be true that the waters between Baghdad and Damascus have been muddied to some extent, but the dose of poison has not reached the wells. The wolf has not died, and the sheep have not perished.

SYRIAN DIPLOMATS RECOUNT EXPULSION FROM BAGHDAD

Damascus AL-BA'TH in Arabic 22 Aug 80 pp 1,4

[Article: "Our Diplomatic Mission In Baghdad Reveal the Details about the Invasion of the Embassy; the Diplomatic Staff Were Detained; Weapons and Explosives Were Planted In the Offices; the Purpose of the Operation Was To Drag Syria Into a Marginal Conflict"]

[Text] Damascus--SANA--The Syrian Arab television system held an interview last night with our chargé d'affaires and other members of our embassy staff in Baghdad, following the invasion of the Syrian embassy there by the Iraqi authorities, in violation of all diplomatic customs and traditions observed throughout the world. A transcript of the interview follows.

[Question] We would like to ask a question of Mr Muwaffaq Junayd, the chargé d'affaires at our embassy in Baghdad, and chief of our diplomatic mission there. We would like to inform our viewers in Syria about the incident and the circumstances of the aggression you were subjected to as Syrian diplomats in Iraq.

[Answer] On Monday morning, 18 August 1980, we were summoned by the Iraqi Ministry of Foreign Affairs to meet with the minister of state for foreign affairs, Mr Hamid 'Ulwan, at 9 o'clock. When I arrived at the Iraqi Ministry of Foreign Affairs I found the heads of the other Arab diplomatic missions there. We met with the minister at about 10 o'clock, and he spoke to us. It was the practice of the foreign ministry to summon the heads of diplomatic missions whenever there are matters at hand which pertain to inter-Arab affairs, so that they may consult with each other, exchange opinions and transmit the Iraqi point of view to their governments. However, this time the minister was sorry, as he put it, that despite events of importance to the Arabs, particularly the matter of Jerusalem, the subject at hand pertained to the conduct of the Syrian authorities. He said, "We have received information from foreign sources," and added, "--from an Arab source--relating completely reliable information--that there are weapons, explosives and toxic substances inside the embassy of the Syrian Arab Republic, and that there are enough explosives and toxins to kill thousands of people. This is especially true of the toxins should they be introduced into the water supplies. Therefore, we have summoned the heads of the Arab diplomatic missions to be witnesses to this conduct which is contrary to the purposes for which embassies are established according to international customs and laws." I denied to the minister that there was anything of the sort he imagined. I asked him to please name his source. But he insisted that this information was reliable. I asked the minister whether diplomatic customs and international laws did not prohibit searching foreign embassies under any circumstances.

[Question] The intention of the Iraqi minister's preliminary remarks as well as everything else he said to you was to inform you that they wanted to search the embassy, correct?

[Answer] The minister said, "We have received reliable information. Therefore we will search the embassy. We will not accept any questions and we will not ask for anyone's permission or anything else. Everything is set and final." At this point several Arab ambassadors raised the question of whether there were any precedents for such an action. The Iraqi minister said, "I don't recall. There may be precedents, but I don't remember in detail whether or not there are."

The other Arab ambassadors asked me whether I would allow them to enter the embassy. I said, "Since it is quite clear from what the minister has said that the matter is final and everything is arranged, and that they will carry on without our permission, my opinion does not really matter." Several of the ambassadors were opposed to entering the embassy because that would be personally embarrassing for them as well as for their governments. The minister answered that it was the policy of his ministry to make tours to get generally acquainted with the Arab ambassadors and diplomatic mission chiefs in Iraq and to learn about their projects. They were now going to make their tour within Iraq, and he hoped that it would be done in a fraternal atmosphere, the way Arabs do business with each other, and that there would be witnesses to the proceedings.

The minister was quite insistent, inasmuch as one of the mission chiefs asked for a delay so that he and his colleagues could consult with their governments on the matter, but the minister refused. Then another one asked that they discuss among themselves whether or not to enter the embassy. The minister said, "We, too, are your Arab brethren, who must be present when you discuss the matter." It was evident that it had been predetermined that they would enter the embassy no matter what. They asked us to go with them, saying, "We have cars ready. The cars for the mission chiefs will follow later."

They asked me to accompany the chief of protocol in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. I actually rode in the chief of protocol's car along with a plainclothes officer in the embassy. The cars carrying the diplomatic mission chiefs preceded us. When we reached al-Hurriyah Square, which is 2 minutes by car from the embassy, I was taken out of the chief of protocol's car and put into a car equipped with a radio. I was seated between two men as if under arrest. They used the radio and said that "we now have the target"--meaning me--"and we will arrive in 2 minutes." A voice answered that everything was ready. When we reached the embassy I got out and one man held me by the left arm and the other by the right arm. They took me through the embassy's outer and inner gates. Armed surveillance troops also entered. This took place in full view of the crowds in front of the embassy, but prior to the diplomatic mission chiefs' arrival. Armed troops entered the inner gate. One of them rang the bell once. When there was no response and the door did not open, They began to kick the door with their feet and used the butts of their rifles. An employee opened the door and was slapped by one of the armed soldiers. They then rushed inside the embassy. Certain doors were locked, such as the one to my office and those to the ambassador's and consul's offices. The consul at this time had not yet arrived at work, and the ambassador was on vacation. His door was locked. There were other offices on the upper floor that were locked because some employees were also on vacation. They kicked open the doors, and brought me into the consul's room in which there were two iron safes. All this was taking place with no one present but the armed Iraqi troops. They told me to turn my face to the wall, and they opened the safes that were in the consul's room. I turned around, but one of them put his hand on my shoulder so that I could not see what was happening.

After about 10 minutes two television cameramen walked in. Ten minutes later they let me turn around. They were inspecting some explosives, about four pistols, some bombs and several bags containing a white substance which they scattered over the floor of the room. They proceeded to take pictures of these things.

When we had entered the embassy there had been two plainclothesmen carrying Samsonite luggage, one piece red and the other black. They were opened inside the room and inside them were sticks of dynamite. Meanwhile the consul entered the outer building. When he entered the room he was seized by two men and was beaten. Then the chief of protocol came and said, "I hope you will permit the Arab ambassadors to enter the embassy." I told him, "You have conducted yourselves contrary to every customary law. The matter is no longer in my hands. I have no authority now. You are going to do whatever you want anyway, so why do you ask me to permit them to enter?"

Five minutes later he said, "the ambassadors would like you to come out and meet them." I went out. The ambassadors were standing in the street, refusing to enter the embassy building. I told them directly "The embassy has been invaded. I don't know whether or not you were present during the invasion. This invasion took place without our consent, in contravention of all generally accepted diplomatic customs and laws. As you have seen, it was at the insistence of the minister. They are conducting themselves as they see fit and have not paid any attention to what we think. I leave the matter to you." I then left and went back into the embassy. At that point an officer took me to my office and asked me, "Where is your office? We want to look for weapons and poisons right now. Please open the safes in your office for us. If you don't, we will be forced to break them." I opened the strongboxes which they looked through, finding nothing, however. They then told me to remain in the office, and put two armed men at the door. I don't know what was going on in the other offices during this time. We remained for about an hour, during which time they came and negotiated with me about my making a statement to Iraqi television that the operation had been carried out with my consent and approval, and that there had not been any insults or beatings. I flatly refused to make any such statement. They wanted to take my picture, but I refused to be photographed. Then they began to make threats, saying that they would take my picture whether or not I allowed them to. I told them, "We are in Iraq. You are armed and we are unarmed. You can conduct yourselves as you wish, but without my consent."

They then consulted with one another and decided not to force me to be photographed. After a while they brought my colleagues on the embassy staff into my office and began to photograph. They tried to lure us into talking so that they could prove that the operation had been carried out with our knowledge, that they had, in fact, discovered poisons and explosives in the embassy, and that they were taking a statement to this effect, and so that during the talk we would admit that this was something natural. They spoke a great deal about Syria and the government in power there. They voiced their hostility toward the Syrian government. There were two strongboxes, one in the ambassador's office and the other in the consul's office. They asked me for the key. I told them that the ambassador had it--which was the truth--and that the ambassador was on vacation. They said, "Then we will have to break it open." I said, "Do whatever you want." They put us into another room. They brought experts to open the iron strongboxes. They opened the one in the consul's office. After they left, the door was broken. They opened the ambassador's room, then relocked it. We found it locked. Only two screws had been loosened. They then said, "You are free. We are sorry. Because we were forced to 'protect our people and our sovereignty' we did what we had to do. You can go freely. We went to our homes. In the afternoon I was summoned to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. The chief of protocol handed me a notice of expulsion of the entire embassy staff, including the ambassador, as personae non gratae. We were ordered to leave the country within 48 hours. He then said, "In view of the fact that this is a unique occurrence we will make an exception and allow two members of the embassy staff to remain for 15 days until they are replaced." I gave my name and that of a colleague. He said, "We will submit your names for approval and let you know."

The next day, on Tuesday at noon, they informed me that they had approved my colleague but not me. In the afternoon I got in touch with them. They said that my approval had still not come through. I had to leave within the specified period. When I left my house in the afternoon no one was keeping watch on me. When I returned home at about 9 o'clock I found a car with two intelligence agents in it parked in front of my house. The next morning my daughter tried to go out to get a document from the neighborhood school to transfer my children out of the schools. They prevented her from leaving. I went out to talk to them. They said, "We have instructions not to let you or your family leave the house." I said to them, "Since we are being expelled and have to leave within 48 hours, I would think we would be given freedom of movement to settle our affairs and leave the country within the designated time. Please get in touch with the competent authorities." They did, and at about 9:30 they let us leave. I went about my errands without restrictions, but I was followed around by several cars. During the second night that I spent in Baghdad the police car kept my house and the embassy under surveillance.

On Wednesday at 11 o'clock I left Baghdad in my private car and was followed out of the city by the police car. At the border they took away my car's license plates and my diplomatic identification papers.

[Question] Before we investigate this precedent which poses a danger to international and inter-Arab relations, I would like to ask the consul to give us an idea of what it was like when he arrived at the embassy on Monday morning, and how the invasion was carried out. I see the effects of the treatment, particularly under your eye and on the other side.

[Answer] As the chargé d'affaires said, I was out of the embassy. When I arrived there at about 10 o'clock I was prevented from entering the building. I found special units men surrounding the building and a large number of police cars. The men were using walkie-talkies. I tried to go in but they would not let me. I told them, "I am a diplomat and this is my embassy. I have to go in." One of them said that I could not. I said, "It's nothing serious, I hope. What's going on?" He said, "You'll find out later." They did not let me leave or enter. There were also cars belonging to several Arab diplomatic missions in front of the embassy. They were witnessing the event. After about 20 minutes a policeman with a walkie-talkie came out of the embassy. He said, "Please come along." I went with him to the main door of the embassy. Someone else was there. One of them seized me by my right arm and another by the left. They harshly forced me to enter. This was witnessed by the Arab ambassadors and diplomatic personnel because they were at the gate. They searched me thoroughly but found nothing on me. When I entered the building I went directly to my office. The chargé d'affaires was in his office. They turned my face to the wall and said, "Raise your hands." I raised them. All the while the television camera was shooting.

The situation really took me by surprise. When I entered my office I found a large table which was not mine. Both Syrian and Iraqi visitors to the Syrian embassy in Baghdad would know that.

They had brought in another table and distributed pictures of it. This table was filled with things they had put on it, including explosives and weapons. I really couldn't make out how many pistols there were--5 or 10—because the punch in the face I received had impaired my vision.

Then they told the chargé d'affaires to see the Arab ambassadors. He went out to see them, while I stayed in the office alone with 12 special units agents and policemen. They began to punch me for no reason. I did not know why, or what they wanted from the beginning, so I asked them. They said, "You must open this strongbox" which was in my room. This strongbox contained the embassy's secret code, something all embassies have. I refused to open the strongbox. I remained about an hour or maybe more discussing with them the subject of opening the strongbox. They made threats and pointed a pistol at my head. One of them said, "Either you open the strongobox or we'll open up your head," and similar statements. They made obscene, unjustified attacks against Syria. They finally gave up and said that they would break the strongbox open. I said to them, "You're in charge here while I am an unarmed man in your midst. They did not allow me to see any of my diplomatic colleagues, except that when I first entered I had seen the chargé d'affaires whom they later removed from the room while I remained by myself. About an hour later someone who seemed to be an official came. He said, "I apologize to you in the name of the Iraqi intelligence service for the beating and verbal abuse you received." He asked me, "Did they beat you?", even though the marks could be clearly seen. He told me to accompany him to the office of the chargé d'affaires. A little while later the rest of the embassy staff were brought in. They ordered us to sit in the chairs and began to talk, as the chargé d'affaires has already recounted. Their remarks included attacks against Syria in general.

Their television camera was rolling and photographs of the people were taken. During this time the subject of opening the ambassador's strongbox came up. I had a strongbox and the ambassador had one. The chargé d'affaires was told, "We will break open the strongboxes if there are no keys to them." They actually proceeded to break it open, and finished after about an hour of work. At that point someone came and said, "You can leave now." Naturally, I went to my office with the chargé d'affaires and other members of the embassy staff. I found the strongbox open and the papers it had held scattered about. They had been violated and some had been stolen. Then we went home. At 5 o'clock in the evening the chargé d'affaires was summoned. At 5:30 the chargé d'affaires asked us to meet at the embassy. He told us about the expulsion order from the Iraqi government which called for the entire staff of the Syrian diplomatic mission to leave the country within 48 hours. We left, leaving behind our furniture and personal belongings in our houses. Because of the pressure and fear, our thoughts only concerned leaving by any means; the subject of furniture was not important.

[Question] Among the bruises on your face I see a very pronounced one in the corner of your eye. These are facts that no one can deny.

[Answer] I was also beaten on my torso.

[Question] (To the cultural attache): What would you like to say about the incident? What can you tell us about what happened to you?

[Answer] I was in my office with several female Iraqi visitors who were inquiring about study in Syria. All of a sudden I heard noises. I tried to listen from the door and was surprised to find people trying to force their way through the door, using the butts of their rifles. With threats, they angrily told me to raise my hands. They crowded a group of embassy staff members and visitors into a small room and told us to raise our hands and place them on the walls like prisoners. They hurled insults and abuse at us personally as well as at Syria. After a while they took us to another room with embassy personnel in it. Then they told me to go to my office for a search. They asked me for the keys and I opened the office for them. They searched it but did not find anything. Then they said, "We want to search another office." I told them that the occupant of the other office was on vacation and had the keys with him. They said, "That's impossible. The room must be opened." They proceeded to break open the door, and search the cabinets and tables. They invaded the cabinets, a violation of privacy and proceeded to break them apart. Some of them tried to lift the floor tiles, in an act of sheer vandalism. They were men, the least that can be said about whom is that they carried out their operation more effectively than would a barbarian. After they had searched everything, we went to the chargé d'affaires' room, where I was beaten in the abdomen and back, and received blows to several parts of my body.

The interesting thing is that after they had taken pictures of everything, they put back the chairs and tables and cabinets, and cleaned the rooms. It was as though nothing had ever happened. If someone were to have entered the embassy, nothing would appear to have been amiss. Even if the diplomats had been able to see for themselves, they would not have suspected anything. However, the fact remains that there is nothing left of the doors.

[Question] (To the vice consul): Tell us about the incident.

[Answer] On that day I went to my office at the consulate and the visitors, foreigners, began to enter to apply for visas. I was working when I heard a loud noise coming from the rear door. The consulate has a door separate from that of the embassy, I was alone and I had visitors waiting. Suddenly, I heard a noise. They entered the visitors' room opposite my room--there is a window between my room and the visitors' waiting room. I heard loud screaming.

I found armed men dressed in special units uniforms. They seized the visitors. At the same moment the door was pushed open and five armed men entered. They told me to raise my hands and they forcibly dragged me out, beating me, of course. They did not know where exactly to take me, so first they pushed me into a small corridor. There were others there who beat me and pushed me somewhere else, to a small room. At that moment they brought in several colleagues and visitors. At the same time they made us stand next to the wall and told us to raise our hands. If any of us moved he was kicked and verbally abused, as is the case when one is being beaten. We remained for about one half-hour or 45 minutes standing with our hands raised. Then they released the visitors.

This was done in the presence of the visitors up to this point. They received punches and were beaten a little. However, they called us "you so-and-so" while they beat us. Then they took us to the visitors' waiting room. There was no one there but us. They told us to sit on the chairs. After 45 minutes they began to take each one of us alone. This was after they had searched the offices. They beat us, verbally abused us, and broke a few doors. Then they began taking each employee to his office in order to search it in his presence. However, this operation took place after they had ended the search operation. This search was a sham. They had planted everything so that whenever they brought someone they would say to him, "We have found explosives."

All the employees knew instantly that there was nothing in their offices. The safes had been broken into, and they had planted the explosives. A television cameraman was present and they recreated these scenes and circumstances. At that moment the visitors left. Some women began to scream loudly. One of them had been seized by armed men, and as they brutally beat her she screamed. This is natural. We remained about an hour. After a while someone said, "Please go to the charge d'affaires' office. We want under heavy guard by the fully armed special units--not the police. They began to try to lure us [into talking]. Meanwhile an officer in a special units uniform with the rank of first lieutenant fired a shot with his pistol. I do not know whether he did it intentionally or unintentionally. We were there and they were there. They were policemen. No one was hit by the shot, and it did not cause any argument. I do not know whether they meant to frighten us with it. Then they left, but we remained. In the evening we were informed of the decision to expel us. We got right into our cars and left.

[Question] (To the chargé d'affaires): As one who works in the diplomatic corps, I have a question for you. Any viewer or any person who heard this strange story will know that for the most trivial matters there is diplomatic immunity, and that the diplomatic corps enjoys diplomatic immunity inasmuch as the Syrian embassy in Baghdad represents Syrian territory within Iraq, and the Iraqi embassy in Syria represents Iraqi territory. There is something called immunity. What you have reported is astonishing. The question comes to mind: What happened to this immunity? Does what happened to you, Syrian embassy personnel, have any precedent in international affairs, or has anything like it happened in the last hundred years?

[Answer] From what I have learned over a long period--20 years--in the Syrian foreign ministry,I have never heard or read about any similar incident. On the contrary, during wars embassies have been protected from invasion. I recall some incidents in modern and early history. For example, during the events in Hungary in 1956 a cardinal or an archbishop sought asylum in, I believe, the U.S. embassy. I think his name was (Krazuli). He remained there until 1973, when an agreement was reached and the government granted him amnesty and allowed him to go to Rome--to the Vatican. In 1963 the Syrian prime minister, Khalid al-'Azm, sought asylum in the Turkish embassy, where he remained for a while. He was later allowed to leave the country and go to Beirut.

[Question] I would like to explain something to our viewers. When the March 1963 revolution against the separatist government took place, the separatist primeminister, Khalid al-'Azm, sought asylum inside Syria in the Turkish embassy in Damascus. He remained thereabout 2 months, wanted by the revolutionary government, but no one at all could get hold of him. He was then given permission to leave the country.

There is a more recent example. When the revolution broke out in Bolivia its president sought asylum in the embassy of the Vatican. Despite the fact that the revolution was against her, the embassy was not invaded, and she was not forcibly taken from it, because embassies are sacrosanct. I have really never heard of anything happening in any country that resembles what happened, or the violation of an embassy's sacrosanctity, however bad relations between the countries may have been.

[Question] To what do you attribute it? You say that this is a unique, unprecedented event that has not happened in the past and cannot happen in the future, as the examples you kindly gave clearly demonstrate. What purpose did the Iraqi authorities have in carrying out their invasion of the Syrian embassy in such a manner?

[Answer] In my opinion, in recent years, particularly since al-Sadat's visit to Jerusalem and the signing of the Camp David accords, Syria's position has been noted for its opposition to these agreements and its efforts to torpedo them and expunge all that they have accomplished. Syria's steadfastness is common knowledge, as is the fact that Syria is the only country that is in an active state of confrontation with the enemy. I think that the purpose of this operation was simply to create secondary factors to divert Syria's attention from resisting the Zionist schemes.

[Question] Can we say that the operation was prearranged?

[Answer] From the statements made by the Iraqi minister of state for foreign affairs it is obvious that everything had been decided and prearranged. The Arab ambassadors had been summoned to a manufactured expulsion operation. There is nothing more than that.

PLO SPOKESMAN LAUDS SYRIAN-SOVIET TREATY

LD031555 Damascus AL-BA'TH in Arabic 26 Oct 80 p 3

[Report by AL-BA'TH correspondent Abu Munir: "DPFLP Deputy General Secretary Yasir 'Abd Rabbuh: Soviet Treaty Important Event and True Expression of Stand of all Nationalist and Progressive Forces in Area"]

[Excerpts] Beirut--Yasir 'Abd Rabbuh, deputy general secretary of the Democratic Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine [DPFLP], PLO Executive Committee member and head of the PLO Information Department, has said that the Syrian-Soviet treaty is an event of historic significance for all nationalist and progressive forces in the area. First because it is a true expression of the attitude of all progressive and nationalist forces in the area, which have always affirmed that the development of relations with the socialist camp, headed by the Soviet Union, is a basic condition for successfully confronting Zionism and imperialism and their agents in the area. Second because it comes at a time when those hostile forces have been trying to isolate Syria and seeking to pick on it because it is the main bulwark of Arab steadfastness in the face of Camp David. The treaty has proved that the friendly Soviet Union will not hesitate for a moment to take a firm and decisive stand in favor of boosting Syria's capability to resist and defeat those conspiracies.

Yasir 'Abd Rabbuh added: The treaty comes during international conditions in which the supremacy of the forces of liberation and socialism is confirmed and the forces of imperialism and world capitalism are retreating in more than one area. Thus it becomes clearer that the characteristic of our era is that it is the era of the triumph of socialism and the defeat of imperialism. Events in our contemporary world have proved that it is impossible for any of the national liberation movements or the progressive developing countries to achieve a decisive victory against imperialism that secures their national independence and opens the road of progress for them unless they rely on the characteristic of the age: that is, ally themselves with the principal power--namely, the socialist camp--against the imperialist camp of darkness and all its networks of exploitation, its fleets, its aggressive bases and its social mainstays, particularly in the Third World countries.

Within this framework, the Syrian-Soviet treaty puts all the weight of the favorable world situation behind Arab Syria and all the forces of steadfastness in their current battle, which is becoming more ferocious with the expansion of the imperialist onslaught--which now includes Iran and the Gulf, in addition to the Arab East. Obviously, the achievement of the treaty's objectives of supporting Syria's steadfastness in all the areas and fields will ensure that the necessary conditions are created for curbing this onslaught and the repeated Zionist aggression. Also it would be the necessary prelude to achieving in the area a new balance of power that would give the initiative to the forces of national steadfastness and pave the way for achieving the national objectives, particularly our Palestinian people's right to return, to self-determination, and to build their own independent state.

Our people have greeted with enthusiasm and satisfaction the Soviet-Syrian statement attached to the treaty which places in the forefront of both countries' objectives support for the Palestinian people's struggle and commitment to our people's rights as a principal condition for peace. All our people under the PLO's leadership, realize that the protection of Syria and strengthening of its steadfastness serve the struggle against imperialism throughout the area in general, and our people's struggle in particular. The Soviet-Syrian treaty is at the same time a treaty with all the Arab forces of liberation and progress and with our Palestinian people, who are fighting in forward positions extending from Arnun Castle to the borders of the Gaza Strip.

Yasir 'Abd Rabbuh added: This treaty comes at a time when the Arab reactionary forces, backed by U.S. imperialism, are attacking all the positions of revolution and liberation and one link in the imperialist plan is following another. The plan includes: Stepping up internal conspiracies in order to strike at the unity of several Arab countries; supporting the reactionary gangs such as the Muslim Brotherhood in Syria; blatant and open U.S. interference in order to create a colonialist military entity with the help of the bases which are now spreading in Egypt, Oman, Somalia, the Gulf and the Arabian peninsula; finally, it includes provoking wars such as the war of Saddam Husayn's regime against the Iranian revolution, which aims at exhausting Arab and Iranian resources, diverting the battle from its main course of struggle against Camp David and the imperialist presence and giving the necessary justification for the U.S. military presence--the excuse being that it is protecting oil resources and safeguarding the world economy.

Syria, all the steadfastness countries and progressive forces are basically responsible for resisting this plan since all the reactionary forces, particuarly the Jordanian regime, have begun facilitating the implementation of the U.S. objectives, are openly defiant and are conniving at the achievement of these objectives. Syria, before which the treaty opens new horizons, along with the declaration of unity with Libya and the solidarity of all progressive Arab forces, is now capable of becoming a major launchpad in deterring this imperialist and reactionary onslaught and protecting the front of steadfastness and confrontation in southern Lebanon and the occupied Palestinian territories.

BRIEFS

MUSLIM BROTHERHOOD BRANCH--The first branch of the "Muslim brotherhood," considered the most fanatic movement in the Arab world, has recently been established in the Galilee town of Shefar'am. Residents of Shefar'am have told our correspondent that in the last few weeks Muslim citizens preaching a return to the faith and shunning of all foreign influence have appeared in town. One of the leaders of that movement is a religious figure from Shefar'am. The number of members in the new movement has been estimated to reach several dozen, but according to the local residents they are gaining power day by day. COUNTRY SHOULD RETHINK ITS INDUSTRIALIZATION

London 8 DAYS in English 27 Sep 80 pp 43-45

[Text] IN ALGERIA's headlong rush during the past decade under the aegis of former minister of heavy industry, Belaid Abdessalam, to rapidly raise itself into the exclusive league of industrial powers, the guiding principles of its economic planners — self-reliant development and national economic independence — have seemed to have turned out to be more theoretical, than practical, goals.

The National Charter, Algeria's official blueprint for socialism adopted in 1976, spelt out this philosophy: 'Basic industries, such as metallurgical, mechanical, electric and electronic, petrochemical and chemical, as well as shipbuilding will play a decisive role since they assure the independence of national industry, and more directly, of the country itself.' These 'industrialising industries' would lead to the formation of an integrated industrial structure.

This development approach has been seriously called into question. In the latest government shake up announced in June by President Chadli Benjedid, the group of 'industrialists' around Abdessalam has seen its influence plummet. They were practically eliminated from key posts in the government and ruling party, the National Liberation Front (FLN), as well as from the commanding heights of the public sector of the economy.

The new five year development plan, covering the 1980-84 period, places emphasis on light and consumer industries, housing and infrastructure and social services. The announcement in September of the abandonment of the LNG-3 complex at Arzew was only the latest indication of this switch.

Criticism was mounting, even before the death of President Houari Boumedienne, that Algeria's singleminded thrust towards an industrial society was engendering as many new problems as it was solving. The choice of ultra-modern technology for the Arzew or Skidda LNG plants may have been appealing on glossy Sonatrach brochures, critics said, but in the field it proved tricky to master, provoking costly delays and extensive cost overruns. In addition, the emphasis on capital intensive plant was viewed as an aberration for a country facing both massive unemployment and under-employment.

Algerian officials admit that most of the expensive new factories operate well under design capacity and continue to survive thanks to generous subsidies and a 'captive local market'. For example, the $25m American built electronic equipment plant at Sidi-bel-Abbes is known to produce at only a quarter of its capacity. Colour television sets produced at this plant cost more than a third more than, for example, Japanese imports.

The local press has begun to cast an inquisitive eye at the activities of western multinationals, blaming some of them for the poor performance of Algerian industry. The role of technical cooperation has been often criticised for its supposed reinforcing of Algeria's economic and technological dependence. According to the French-language daily El Moudjadid, some 5,000 contracts for technical assistance were initialled by state companies and the administration between 1973 and 1978: just under 80 per cent of these were with Western European states (with France in top position) and 9 per cent with the US.

The cost of expatriate personnel provided under these accords has grown from 27 per cent in 1973 to about 40 per cent in 1978. Does their presence aid the transfer of technology? The French-language weekly, Algerie Actualites, thinks not. A recently published analysis of the experience at the 'model' industrial vehicle complex in Rouiba, 25km from Algiers, strikingly underscores the paper's conclusion.

Under the control of the state firm, Sonacome, the Rouiba plant has been able to surpass its initial production aims by increasing its output from 3,850 vehicles in 1977 to 6,000 in both 1978 and 1979. But this impressive showing was realised at the expense of increased dependence on foreign parts and labour.

The 'product in hand' contract signed in July 1970 with the French firm, Berliet (now part of the state-controlled Renault group), called for the production at Rouiba of ten different models including lorries, coaches and city buses, making a total projected output of 4,550 vehicles per year. The plant was to supply about 59 per cent of each vehicle's components, with the total Algerian-made content of between 75 and 80 per cent.

The French firm was to provide the management for start up and supervise operations while training Algerians. The handing over of the plant, originally set for 1976, has been constantly deferred. The Algerian factory director explained this by the lack of trained local executives, supervisory personnel and skilled workers.

Workers, for their part, question Berliet's in-plant training programme, claiming that it is not fully adapted to Algerian realities. They point out that the department in charge of recruiting and training Algerians was only created in June 1978, four years after the first vehicle rolled off the Rouiba assembly line.

The Rouiba complex began production in 1974 with 210 expatriate personnel. By 1978 this figure had risen to 232. In 1979 it reached 267. The need to expand output was the main reason for the increase in the number of highly paid foreign technicians. In order to take advantage of the plant's extra production capacity and notch up a greater share of the local market for heavy vehicles, estimated at around 20,000 a year, the Rouiba plant management decided to pull out all stops.

But of the 6,000 vehicles produced at Rouiba last year, only 3,850 were fitted with 75 per cent of locally manufactured parts. In the remaining 2,150 vehicles, the local content slid to a mere 33 per cent. Expanded production also was achieved by cutting corners and reducing the number of different models offered.

The jump in production markedly increased the amount of French-made parts imported from Berliet. From Ffr117m ($28.32m) in 1976, Sonacome spent Ffr231m ($56m) in 1978 and more in 1979. 'By letting themselves be blinded by short-term objectives,' wrote Algerie Actualites, 'plant management relegated to second place essential considerations: the gradual achievement of control over the technological process and the capacity to locally produce finished products.'

Another example put forward by the Algerian weekly is the case of the LNG-1 complex at Arzew. El Paso of the US has the management contract and is in charge of the 1,600 workers, 500 of whom are Europeans. Thus, the complex's two crucial sectors, production and maintenance, are in the hands of expatriates, while the supply and security departments are shared by Algerians and expatriates. Only the personnel and general affairs departments are totally controlled by Algerian nationals.

Algerie Actualites claims that the US firm has dragged its feet in pushing the 'Algerianisation' of senior and middle level management posts. Skilled Algerian executives are not lacking in this domain because Folpetrol, a subsidiary of the French multinational Schlumberger, has hired a number of them for its international operations from a Sonatrach affiliate, Altest. Strangely enough, Algerian executives must often go abroad to get top positions.

Does Algeria have the capacity to fulfil a greater share of its needs for modern technology? The weekly advances the case of two local companies: Altra, an affiliate of Sonatrach, and SN Metal, which were able to manufacture a torch burner for Arzew's LPG unit. Previously, a French firm had refused to honour its guarantee and replace a defective one which was playing havoc with plant operations. Likewise, when another French firm pulled out of the Annaba fertiliser plant the 1,470 Algerian employees not only maintained output, but also improved the quality.

EEC Boost for Worker Training

Algeria's efforts to upgrade and expand existing facilities for the training of skilled workers, essential for the country's booming industrial and construction sectors, are to receive a boost from the European Community which is to grant 20m European Units of Account (1 EUA = $1.3) to the Algerian government for the development of the country's technical training facilities.

The EEC assistance will be given under the terms of the EEC-Algeria cooperation agreement which was signed in 1976 and which, in addition to giving Algeria certain concessions in the trade sector, provides for EEC financial assistance totalling 114m EUA to be given to the country for a five year period.

The Community will focus its aid on the setting up of six new technical training centres in Skikda, Batna, Bejaia, Djelfa, Tiaret and Sidi bel Abbes.

EEC officials estimate that the community's assistance would allow up to 3,200 workers to acquire professional skills required by the country's industries and the building sector. The lack of skilled technicians is a major obstacle in Algeria's plans to industrialise. While the EEC aid is hardly expected to meet all of the country's requirements for skilled workers, EEC officials hope that it will contribute to the successful implementation of the new five year development plan (1980/1984) launched recently by the Algerian government.

The new plan gives special attention to the development of technical training, both for economic reasons, and to solve social problems created by an increasing number of young people who are dropping out of the country's educational system yet could be integrated into the technical training network.

The community assistance will be used for the construction of new buildings, the supply of technical training equipment, and for the training of teachers.

INTERIOR MINISTER DESCRIBES SECURITY PROBLEMS AT PARTY CONGRESS

Cairo AL-AHRAM in Arabic 30 Sep 80 p 11

/Article: "Muhammad Nabawi Isma'il: The Continuous Successes Egypt Has Realized Have Unmasked the Agents and Parasites and the Vindictive"/

/Text/ Mr Muhammad Nabawi Isma'il, deputy prime minister and minister of the interior, made a statement at the conference yesterday in which he said:

"At a time when factors for disturbance and tension are multiplying in our modern world in general, when the features of dissension, violence, terror and instability are spreading out in most of the countries surrounding us, when bloody phenomena, assassinations, and civil war are manifesting themselves among the proponents of perseverance, struggle and progressivism, and when personal disputes, wars and destruction are breaking out, al-Sadat's Egypt, the greatly growing Egypt, is standing in the midst of this crashing sea with the utmost pride as a haven of peace, security and stability, with its values, its civilization, its leadership and its command, with the consciousness of its people and their genuine nature.

"It is obvious that the great and continuous successes which Egypt has achieved in every sphere since the Corrective Revolution have destroyed the strategies and the designs of international and Arab forces and leaders and have unmasked the agents and the parasites, the vindictive and those with designs, constituting an infringement on their entities and their personal interests. Therefore their schemes and their hostile movements have been directed against our domestic front, which the government is forming from within, with all the humanity it possesses, all the installations it has, the organizations it dominates, and the cultural legacy and spiritual values that lie in its conscience.

"Therefore the safety and security of our domestic front has become the issue of issues in national action and the first thing we must be confident about as we embark on the battle of life for the sake of construction. This is not a subject of dispute. The realization of great miracles is dependent on the establishment of a firm domestic front in the context of cohesive secure national unity and the content of social peace which is mutually agreed as to its national goals and national leaders."

The minister of the interior added, "It is recognized that the ingredients of the stability of the domestic front may basically be defined by three focal points:

"1. National leadership and command represented by the leader and commander Muhammad Anwar al-Sadat, to whom the masses have pledged loyalty and whom they have rallied around with a solidarity whose likes are unprecedented, out of loyalty to the victories he has achieved and belief in his renewed ability to sacrifice.

"2. Unity of national thought and goals. The masses in Egypt have rallied behind their leadership in a categorical definition of our national goals and have embodied them in the construction of peace, democracy and welfare.

"3. A cultural and human legacy and spiritual values. That is the element whose roots within us extend 7,000 years back, when the first unified state known to human history was established."

He then said, "Thus we praise God for the existence of these ingredients in our country. Thus this stability which we are experiencing came not from a void but rather from the liberation of the citizen's will, the liberation of the will of the nation, the restoration of Egyptian and Arab dignity, and the civilized historic peace initiative."

He went on to say "The rejection front, and after that the perseverance front, have hatched plots in full coordination with the soviet Union; meetings, conferences and resolutions to isolate Egypt, besiege it politically and economically, and starve out the Egyptian people; accusations of treason, of acting as agents, of personal arrogation of power, liquidation, and alienation; trumpets of their propaganda; their press; secret broadcasts directed to the young; curses; the spreading of rumors; training camps to give mercenaries and agents skills in acts of sabotage within; and constant attempts to attract and mobilize, in exploitation of the circumstances of Egyptian workers in some of these countries--put simply, they have used all possible forms of material and moral sabotage against Egypt; their movements, their schemes, their camps and their agents are observed and unmasked, and we are always in watch for them. Their means of contact and financing are in our grasp, thanks to the alertness of the men and the integrity of the noble. Their infiltrated agents are falling like bats, one after the other, with their destructive equipment, and give detailed confessions of their conspiracy. Those noble citizens who are exposed to their mobilization pressures hasten to the security agencies to expose their schemes. They make cheap use of vindictive hired agent writers whom they cause to write in their papers to defame the dignity and reputation of Egypt, at the hands of those who claim that they belong to Egypt, though Egypt and its people are innocent of them.

"Unflagging efforts to embody illusory bodies with the brilliant names of fraudulent fronts, sometimes through some possessors of pens for hire in some European capitals, at other times in the embrace of the ludicrous leadership in Libya, and sometimes under the aegis of the bloody Takriti Ba'th in Iraq.

In the Domestic Context

"Elements of the opposition forces whose political and intellectual affiliations differ and whose designs and purposes are different still agree on a basic factor which moves them, and that is blind vengeance and mercenary thinking. If we examine closely, we will find that they rely on the same propagandistic thinking as the foreign opposition forces under the leadership of Moscow and the Arab rejection front.

"They have thus determined their position, chosen to align themselves with the enemies, and have become tools in the service of the conspiratorial scheme against the homeland. Local communist agents are also a tool mobilized in the service of the international communist movement's scheme on behalf of the Soviet Union.

"The same propaganda, charges, rumors, publications, attempts at provocation and casting of doubts are quoted from Radio Moscow and the rejection radio and press.

"They concentrate on moving among groups of students and workers, and nationalist elements in both groups; those are the ones who represent the noble broad base which stands up to them spontaneously, makes them stop at their limits, brushes them aside and gives information about them and their methods. I salute them for this national spirit and positive attitude.

"These communist elements have totally dominated the Grouping Party and turned it into a tool to serve the local communist movement and a trumpet for Soviet and Arab rejectionist propaganda.

"The statement or publication the party issues is broadcast by Radio Moscow and the rejection stations and published by their newspapers on the same day. Conversely, the propaganda and analyses issued by them are expressed in the party's publications and propaganda and communist elements domestically."

Mr Muhammad Nabawi Isma'il went on to say, "Most loyally, with integration /sic/ and self-sacrifice, their thinking is wrong and twisted, and it has been exposed, but there is no shame for those who have no religion. Their communist elements, with their hired foreign pens, are strengthening the chain of conspiracy and vileness at the expense of Egypt's reputation with total coordination. Their failure has caused them to work tirelessly to raise slogans of prostration among their various organizational wings and the alliance against the national regime in Egypt with the far right and scattered reactionary party remnants.

"Through claims of Nasirism, they ignore their positions of hostility to 'Abd-al-Nasir and what they say against him and vie with one another today to celebrate the anniversary of his departure to the same end.

"Even the religious current has not been safe from their maneuvers to attract what they describe as the progressive religious current. Okay, how can that be? Through an attempt to infiltrate some of their elements into the circles of this current, 'some of whom grow beards and make a show of religiosity,' while practicing provocation and agitation at the appropriate time.

"The latest outcry in their dramatic productions has been the call for an alliance with those they call the oppressed, so that they can play on the chord of factional dissension."

He then said, "With respect to the movement of religious currents, I would like to stress at the outset that the broad base of student, youth and labor religiosity is sound, their orientations are healthy, their nationalism, pride and commitment are remote from any sinister implications, and their firmness represents the rock against which attempts by suspect elements are dashed; however, that does not prevent there from being a few Moslems and Christians who depart from the true essence of religion to a fanaticism which is totally at variance with the tolerant principles of religion.

"Religiosity and lofty religious values are the foundation which we are striving to reaffirm in the spirits of our young people, but the use of religion as a ruse, for personal and political designs or on the part of certain fanatics is rejected and prohibited in accordance with the premises of the existing legitimate order and we will, in implementation of the sovereignty of the law repel all attempts to violate this legitimacy.

"Egypt, throughout its genuine civilized history, has not known positions of fanatacism or extremism. Unity between the two elements of the nation is a firm fact which has remained and will remain far removed from attempts to sow doubts with God's permission.

"There is another pattern of hostile movement which takes the ludicrous form of a alliance on the part of those whom the Communist alliances are appealing to. A strange mixture of the vengeful and the vindictive--a group of communists inside and outside the Grouping Party, some reactionary party elements, some people trying to form a party by name of the National Front, some people who pretend to revolutionary attitudes, people who revive appearances, and others of their ilk who have given themselves the names of a national coalition and have issued a statement which is suspect in its content and its objectives titled 'statement by the Egyptians' claiming that they have acted through inspiration from the call of national conscience.

"The statement contains a collection of falsehoods and erroneous thinking which reiterates the same hostile propaganda. They have not presented it to the masses--no, they have translated it into English and French and presented it to foreign news agencies, the press of Moscow and the rejection front, which have taken its contents as an instrument for defaming their country, and their conscience relaxed and their mission ended.

"Now if we try to deduce the bases of the thinking behind the hostile propaganda, domestically and abroad, in order to set it out for discussion, far removed from labyrinths of falsification, it will be possible to attribute it to the following main points:

"An attack on the peace initiative and affirmation of its failure--a way of thinking which feigns ignorance of all the objective, historical and political facts which surround the problem and the historic and civilized initiative which political observers in the whole world consider to be the greatest wisest and boldest event of our modern history.

"The initiative, which occurred as an expression of a conscious perception by some masses, an exploitation of the glorious October victory, and a sophisticated political development in its conclusions, which groups of people came out to support in a historic reception before voting for it in a referendum with an overwhelming majority which exceeded all expectations.

"According to this suspect thinking, as they claimed, the initiative was an individual act--the opening of the Suez Canal, restoration of the beloved land of Sinai with its resources in the form of mines and oil, the reconstruction of Sinai, the construction of tunnels to link it up as a strategic national goal,are a total failure, as they claim.

"Snatching the problem of the Middle East from the labyrinths of struggles and gropings and causing it to burst forth on the international stage in accordance with specific realistic processes, making Israel face its responsibilities, crushing its propaganda, and internationally condemning its obstinacy are a total failure, in their view. Winning over world opinion and convincing it of the Palestinian presence and logitimacy and Egyptian firmness in the face of Israeli maneuvers during the autonomy negotiations has caused the loss of the Palestinian cause, as they vie with one another in saying.

"We have proved our ability to deal with reality in deed, not through slogans and statements. We have not closed doors but have left all roads open wide to every constructive effort which will realize a comprehensive, just, permanent peace.

"The issue of democracy: they claim that Egypt is suffering from a renunciation of democracy, the suppression of freedoms, laws restricting freedoms, and control by iron and fire.

"Concentration camps bursting with thousands of detainees and fighting men! I challenge them to declare the name of one concentration camp.

"Restrictions fettering the press and freedom of opinion, and the quarantining of freedom and opposition views.

"As for the democracy which deprives them of their sleep in Egypt, they criticise it on grounds that it has eliminated the concentration camps, liquidated the sequestrations and freed the citizen from various forms of torture and the destruction of dignity and humanity, and has restored the dignity of Egyptians and liberated their will.

"The assertion of freedom, formation of parties, elimination of press censorship, and elimination of arbitrary verdicts.

"Respect and solicitude for the opinions of others and their appearance in the light of day for the first time after a long period, and repression of the opposition press and publications, symposiums, speeches and statements by local, Arab and foreign agencies under a single party.

"National newspapers embracing campaigns and issues, discussing faults, exercising criticism, and presenting studies and recommendations.

"Independence of the judiciary, and reverence for its statements and just verdicts, which we are proud of.

"The opposition papers have not failed to express their opinion or present a criticism in regard to any issue, problem or decision related to domestic or foreign policy, however much the severity of tone or extent of commitment may differ.

Political, legal, trade union and vocational dialogues at all levels in which the leader participates with a generosity which gives a model and example.

"Referral to the people to seek their opinion on any issue related to their concerns or destiny.

"The claim that Egypt is aligned toward America:

"It is true that it is hard for agents and people of weak will to understand the meaning of independence of positions and will, or the concept that the loftiness of national and domestic interests is above all ideological or intellectual affiliation. The Soviet positions have been recorded by history and their bitterness has been recounted by the heroic leader Muhammad Anwar al-Sadat. Moscow's position on arming us, Moscow's position on preparing for the battle and the decision on it, calculations of dominance, influence, and schemes to exhaust the capabilities and powers of peoples in the name of friendship--that is what we have rejected. We reject their progressivism and revolutionariness in Afghanistan. The friendship of peoples does not justify the killing of children, women and old men in Afghanistan, and international legitimacy is not of no use. We have established free balanced relations for the sake of our national interests, and the leader has repeated them explicitly and in a loud voice. No to defeat, no to communism, no to hegemony, no to Soviet dominance, greetings to balanced relations.

"Speaking ill of economic conditions, policies which have been carried out and intrinsic efforts:

"It is this matter, specifically, that receives the major portion of their attention and propaganda. The reason is obvious. It is to attempt to exploit the sufferings of the masses and bid over them as a prelude to provocation and agitation, before welfare is achieved and they lose one of the props of their movement. Their way of thinking, by casting doubts has left no field in which they have not cast doubts. Hostile forces abroad, elements of the Grouping Party, statements by their leaders, and hireling writers abroad have participated in it. The policy of economic liberalization is apostasy and a sacrifice of socialist achievements, they assert. The government has illusory plans to liquidate the public sector and sell it to investors, they claim. Egypt is passing through the worst stage of deterioration and experiencing total economic collapse, they hope. Even expanding distribution outlets by establishing group consumer societites in workers' and white collar employees' sections is in their view a means for the government to control the sustenance of these groups."

ISRAEL SEEN CHANGING VIEW ON AUTONOMY--PEACE TREATY LINKAGE

Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 24 Sep 80 p 11

[Article by Uzi Benziman: "The Haman Syndrome"]

[Text] Without saying so, Israel is striving to create a linkage between the development of its relations with Egypt and the extent of progress in the autonomy negotiations, and it hopes to set a target date. In this way Israel is displaying the syndrome of Haman the Agagite about whom it was said in the Book of Esther that "his wicked device, which he had devised against the Jews, should return upon his own head."

The "linkage" and "target date" were common idioms at the height of the negotiations on the Israeli-Egyptian peace treaty. During the 6 months in which the text of the peace treaty was being discussed (after the Camp David Agreements), Israel struggled against the creation of a linkage between the treaty's going into effect and the anticipated developments in the autonomy negotiations and against the setting of a target date for its conclusion.

It is perhaps worthwhile to mention that which has been forgotten. In September 1978 two agreements were signed at Camp David: One established the principal conditions for an Israeli-Egyptian peace agreement and the second laid the foundations for a new order in Judea, Samaria, and Gaza. When the United States, Israel, and Egypt came to give these agreements real content, they encountered two key problems: a target date and linkage.

These two terms actually reflected two sides of the same coin: Egypt sought to link the development of future contacts between Israel and it on the establishment of the autonomy and the rate of implementation of the Israeli-Egyptian peace treaty whereas Israel strove to frustrate this Egyptian plan. Behind this struggle were two contradictory tensions: Egypt wanted the rate of the implementation of the peace with Israel to be influenced first and foremost by the extent of progress in the autonomy negotiations. Israel hoped to sever the process of applying the peace with Egypt from the extent of progress in the implementation of autonomy. The basic assumption of both countries was that there was not in actuality any great prospect for implementing the autonomy plan. Israel, which paid the price of peace in the Sinai, wanted the quid pro quo to be in the form of normal relations with Egypt while maintaining its hold in Judea, Samaria, and Gaza. Egypt which paid, according to its understanding, the price for receiving the Sinai by its very readiness to recognize Israel refused to pay an additional tariff in the form of a concession on the linkage between this development and future events in the West Bank and Gaza.

There were several stages in the Egyptian approach to linkage. The Egyptians first tried to give it a formal character. For this reason they argued for the inclusion of various Palestinian formulations in the documents which were being discussed between the two countries and on their inclusion in a condition for implementing the peace treaty. In a later stage the Egyptians moved to an effort designed to create a legal linkage between the two subjects by including sections from the introduction to the Camp David Agreements in the Israeli-Egyptian peace treaty. They finally completed their approach and demanded the creation of an actual linkage between the two issues by limiting the autonomy negotiations to 5 months so that it would end before the Egyptians would be obligated, in accordance with the peace treaty, to exchange ambassadors with Israel.

Menahem Begin considered it a great accomplishment when he managed to convince President Carter to change the American compromise formulations on the linkage between the two issues and on the target date. The compromise which was acheived was the version that the autonomy negotiations would not be limited by a specific date but rather by establishing an objective of completing them within 1 year so that the elections to the autonomy council would be held "with all possible speed" after the agreement. Also agreed upon was the weakening of one of the articles of the peace treaty (Article VI, paragraph 2) which states that "the Parties undertake to fulfill in good faith their obligations under this Treaty, without regard to action or inaction of any other party and independently of any instrument external to this Treaty" (that is to say, an agreement on the structure for establishing the autonomy). This article was accompanied by a vague explanatory memorandum designed on the one hand to assure the effectiveness of the problem article (which is what Israel wanted) and at the same time the effectiveness of the Camp David Agreement for establishing the autonomy (which is what Egypt wanted).

Now the wheel has turned and Begin's success appears increasingly as a clear Pyrrhic victory. Israel finds itself in a situation in which it requires linkage and the target date. It will not be long before the representatives of the government will use the same arguments which the Egyptians used in the past in order to support their interpretation of the final versions of the linkage and the target date.

One and one-half years after the signing of the peace treaty, it seems that al-Sadat has accepted without any problems the opening of the autonomy negotiations beyond the 1-year target date. The vagueness of the linkage between the implementation of the peace treaty and the autonomy negotiations also does not bother the Egyptian president. On the other hand, it troubles the Israelis.

It seems to Israel that it is facing a concrete danger that the autonomy negotiations will slip not only past the target year but will extend for 2 or 3 years extending to beyond May 1982, the date set in the peace treaty for the IDF to complete its withdrawal from the Sinai. Jerusalem is concerned about the danger that the autonomy negotiations will drag on and on--even after the return of the entire Sinai to Egypt and that Cairo's desire to reach an agreement on the autonomy will weaken, and as a result of the failure of the effort to install a new order in the West Bank, Egypt is likely to attack the peace treaty with Israel. On the other hand, Israel is commited to reach an agreement on autonomy with Egypt in order to block the intervention of a hostile Arab entity or substitute international initiatives for solving the Palestinian problem.

Israel finds itself, therefore, in a situation in which it is interested in setting a specific target date for concluding the autonomy negotiations and creating a linkage between it and the implementation of the peace treaty with Egypt (read: completing the withdrawal from the Sinai). It is only because of this compelling factor that Israel has a chance of moving Cairo to compromise on the nature of the autonomy arrangement. Without the interdependence between the two issues and without setting a date for completing the negotiations, a reality is developing in which it is in Egypt's interest to extend them beyond May 1982, without being compelled to conclude them in a way which will be acceptable also to Israel.

We should not wonder if it appears then in the not too distant future, the jurists in the ministry of foreign affairs in Jerusalem will pull out the arguments of 'Ussama al-Baz and Butrus Ghali of Egypt on the validity of the target date and the linkage in the peace treaty and its annexes. Although with this they will be obscuring the bargaining success of Menahem Begin and his government between October 1978 and March 1979, they will succeed perhaps in securing the Israeli interests for the period between September 1980 and May 1982.

SOVIET GROUP ON CONDITIONS FOR RESUMING RELATIONS WITH ISRAEL

TA100934 Jerusalem JERUSALEM POST in English 10 Nov 80 p 3

[Report by Mary Hirschfeld: "Russian Delegation Here on 'Fact-Finding Mission'"]

[Text] Haifa--Moscow University Professor Oleg Roitov said yesterday that if Israel wishes to resume diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union it must first comply with two pre-conditions: to withdraw its army "from all occupied territories and to recognize the natural rights of the Palestinian Arabs, including that of self-determination."

Roitov, a prominent nuclear chemist and a veteran member of their National Academy of Science, heads a group of Russian scholars now on a "fact-finding mission" in Israel on behalf of the Soviet committee of peace.

Four of them were guests yesterday of the Haifa University's political sciences department: Roitov; sculptor Yuriy Chernov, secretary of the National Association of Soviet Artists; Professor Andrey Sakharov, a specialist in oriental studies (not to be confused with the Nobel Prize winner) and Robert Markarian, senior official of the peace committee.

"The Soviet Union is not prejudiced against any Middle East country," Sakharov said. "In fact, we enjoyed perfectly normal and friendly relations with Israel from 1948 until your 1967 war. If the ties were severed then, it was not because of us but because of you. If you desire to go back to the old status quo, the ball is in your court--if you move, we will follow suit."

Although refraining from commenting on Ronald Reagan's victory in the U.S. Presidential election because "It's still too soon," Sakharov had sharp words for America's present military policies. He said:

"Many positive steps towards peace and disarmament were achieved in the early 1970's but America's leaders managed to put them all in jeopardy. Then we had the Helsinki agreement, the first SALT agreement and many others and it seemed the winds of war had definitely stopped blowing. Now, we feel them again on the back of our neck. The United States has taken a number of very dangerous steps which cannot lead to peace and coexistence."

The Soviet visitors said their peace committee was the "biggest nongovernmental pressure group in Russia."

When asked about Sakharov, the Nobel Prize winner, Roitov was emphatic: "All he wants is to make money. He seeks publicity and to become famous at our country's expense."

INFORMATION FACILITY NEEDED TO BLOCK EXPULSION FROM UNITED NATIONS

Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew 24 Sep 80 p 21

[Article by Hayim Herzog: "Alone On The Fire"]

[Text] The annual news to the Israeli public that the next session of the UN General Assembly will be the most difficult one that Israel ever had to face has become a daily or annual event. These predictions are generally accurate, and there is no reason to doubt them about the current General Assembly.

This is not the first time that they have threatened us with expulsion from the United Nations and it certainly will not be the last. However, it seems that much of the talk and conjecture about this matter completely ignore certain basic facts. There is no reason to talk about the expulsion of Israel from the United Nations in that admission to the UN or expulsion from the UN is not possible without a vote of the Security Council, and the permanent western members of the Security Council have declared on more than one occasion that they will veto any action which has as its objective the expulsion of a member from the United Nations, and certainly Israel. They did not even succeed on South Africa. What is possible is that the General Assembly will refuse to accept the credentials of any state for its seat.

In order for this matter to be understood correctly, it is worthwhile to mention the procedure. Before the convening of the General Assembly, every nation which intends to participate presents credentials to the UN Secretary General, signed by the foreign minister of that nation and listing the names of the five members of the delegation, five alternates, five advisors, and attaches. Every year the outgoing president of the General Assembly (this year it is Salim Salim, the ambassador of Tanzania) appoints the members of the credentials committee. From Israel's point of view, the composition of this year's committee is one of the best ever. Besides the United States, the Soviet Union, and China, the members of the committee are Spain, Kenya, Costa Rica, Singapore, Angola, and Haiti. With this composition, it is reasonable to assume that Israel will not encounter any special problems in the deliberations of the committee. In addition is the fact that the permanent members, primarily the superpowers including the Soviet Union, are essentially opposed to suspension.

The committee will consider, among other things, complex problems such as determining the validity of the representation of the government of Kampuchea (Cambodia). It generally submits its report in the middle of the deliberations of the General Assembly. The custom until now has been that after the submission of the report to the General Assembly, which states that all the credentials have been approved, the Libyan and/or the Syrian representative expresses reservations in regard to Israel--and this completes the matter for another year. In practice, however, any nation can propose to the General Assembly that it not accept the recommendation of the credentials committee in regard to a certain nation.

The worrisome thing about Israel's approach this year is the tendency to passivity in light of possible developments. This does not mean that diplomatic measures have not been taken by Israel, and that the foreign minister has not raised the issue in his discussions in Washington and the United Nations. The opposite is true, however, it seems to me that in light of the serious deterioration which has taken place this year in Israel's international situation, customary diplomatic measures are insufficient.

I remember that in 1975 when I arrived at the United Nations to take up my position, the primary issue on the agenda was the decision to suspend Israel from the General Assembly. This action was the result of a decision of the president of the General Assembly, Bouteflika, the foreign minister of Algeria, on South Africa, which nullified a previous decision by the president of the General Assembly 4 years ago (Mr Hambro of Norway) on the same subject which was that the fact that the credentials committee does not approve the credentials of a nation does not prevent that nation from taking its seat in the General Assembly. After Bouteflika nullified Hambro's decision (which resulted in South Africa's taking its seat every year), the Arabs decided that the opportunity had come to expel Israel from the General Assembly.

Israel's reaction, however, at that time was not passive. Israel launched an offensive and even issued a threat. Two members of the delegation to the United Nations, who were responsible for South America, Africa, and Asia, left immediately for a conference of the foreign ministers of "the nonaligned" nations which was being held then in Lima. Their action was successful. Israel's diplomatic network in all the world capitals was also activated with an appeal to public opinion in those countries. It became a key issue in the communications media in the United States, and it triggered a series of attacks and criticism of the United Nations by American organizations. This and more. Foreign Minister Yigael Allon solemnly announced then that if Israel is suspended from the deliberations of the General Assembly, he would recommend to the Government of Israel the expulsion of all the UN elements in Israel and the territories, including the UNRWA (the agency for aid to refugees), and the UNEF forces in the Sinai and the UNDOF in the Golan, the UNTSO observers organization, and the UN headquarters in Jerusalem.

While it is true that in the final analysis, the United Nations is only a function of the member countries, the UN secretariat and the permanent administration have a self-interest, and they are capable of exerting considerable influence for the benefit of that interest. The UN secretariat faced the possibility of self-damage--and reacted accordingly.

It seems that this year there is reason for a supreme and appropriate effort. The conference of the foreign ministers of the "nonaligned nations" will take place this year in New York at the end of this month in the shadow of the decision of the conference of the Islamic foreign ministers in Morocco to recommend the suspension of Israel from the General Assembly. It is vital, therefore, that Israel declare at the outset the sanctions which threaten the United Nations in the event that it acts against her in accordance with the recommendations of the conference of the Islamic foreign ministers.

The meeting of the foreign ministers of the "nonaligned" countries in New York is at a time which requires a supreme and concentrated effort by Israel, the American Jewish community, and Israel's supporters in the American congress in which the United Nations must be told unequivocally of the damage it will cause itself in the wake of rash action against Israel.

There are no partisan differences on this issue, and there is a national consensus. It is desirable now to push aside all partisan considerations and to mobilize everyone who can help in this project. We must rise above and ignore considerations of party, status, and prestige. We must mobilize American Jewry for the purpose of influencing the American congress to declare that the suspension of Israel's delegation from the General Assembly will mean the withdrawal of the United States delegation from the General Assembly and also the suspension of American payments to the United Nations. The United States' resignation from the International Labor Organization for 2 years and the effect of this action on the organization's budget and deliberations were sufficient to return the deliberations of this organization to a basis of normalcy, and as such, it permitted the United States to resume its membership in the organization. The United States' share of the UN budget is 25 percent, and the democratic and free world's participation in the UN budget is about 60 percent. In contrast, the share of the Arab oil-producing countries in this budget is about 1 percent. Therefore, the United States has the right and the obligation to make its voice heard and to warn the United Nations unequivocally regarding the results of such an action against Israel.

For the purpose of such an Israeli effort, it is necessary to mobilize public opinion in the United States. If the State of Israel had an information organization worthy of its name, with the requisite means, then right from the opening of the General Assembly session a week ago, large advertisements explaining the issue to the American people should have appeared in the major newspapers of the United States so that psychologically and naturally the United Nations and its supporters in the United States would have been thrown on the defensive instead of the opposite situation which exists today. If the American taxpayer knew that about one-half million dollars (in 1977 the sum was 350 thousand dollars), is spent solely for the purpose of publishing in the protocols of the General Assembly anti-Israel slander which is repeated by the Arabs, the Third World nations, and the communist nations, it would arouse second thoughts about the American contribution to the UN budget.

Furthermore, the Government of Israel must inform at the outset all the UN organizations in Israel that if the State of Israel is suspended from the deliberations of the General Assembly, they must know while there is still time that they will be forced to leave Israel and the territories. This year the time has already passed for polite diplomatic talk; the time is for sharp talk.

[illegible] appear today, the Arabs will avoid launching a major offensive until [illegible] the elections in the United States. Afterwards, on 15 November, when the [illegible]ary-general is to report in accordance with the last resolution adopted as to whether or not Israel has withdrawn from the territories and East Jerusalem, [illegible] will launch a new attack which is likely to include a draft resolution to [illegible] Israel from the General Assembly. The extremist resolution will also [illegible] proposed sanctions against Israel. The Arabs drew encouragement for such [illegible] resolution from the weakening of the United States in the Security Council which was evident several months ago at the time when it abstained on the Jerusalem [illegible] The number of anti-Israel votes in the General Assembly will be impressive, [illegible] the issue will revert to the Security Council.

It is therefore vital that Israel today launch a major offensive on public opinion in the United States before the elections, in order to obtain a commitment by Congress in the form of "a sense-of-congress resolution" which would commit the administration even after the elections. Above all, it is vital that Israel state its position regarding the presence of the UN institutions in Israel so that at the outset there will be no misunderstandings or delusions.

If there ever was a time when it was vital for Israel to launch an international political offensive, it is now. However, such an offensive requires the establishment of an information organization worthy of its name and capable of fulfilling its mission. Unfortunately for us and for the entire Jewish people, such a possibility appears to be a castle in the air.

'JERUSALEM POST' VIEWS COUNTRY'S RECESSION

TA240831 Jerusalem JERUSALEM POST in English 24 Oct 80 pp 1, 15

[Report by Economic Correspondent Shlomo Maoz: "Jobs, Exports, Wages Hit as Recession Deepens"]

[Text] Unemployment has reached its highest rate in years during the past few months, real wages have dropped, exports have declined, and fewer building starts are reported as the economy continues its downward trend, according to government economists.

The recession is continuing to deepen, despite a brief respite during the second quarter of the year. Industrial production is still much lower than in 1979 and inflation has stabilized at 132 percent. Economists believe that the recession might be eased in a few months' time when demand grows as a result of the massive printing of money by the government.

The unemployed registered in the labor exchanges reached 11,150 in September, compared with 3,958 in September 1979. There has also been a rise in the number of men registered as seeking work. There has been no comparable rise among women, probably because many more women don't bother to register when they lose or leave their jobs.

The number of those unemployed for more than two weeks is climbing steadily.

The number of building starts has continued its downward trend, after a brief rise in the second quarter of the year. The number of flats started by private enterprise fell to 660 a month in July-August, compared with 857 in the second quarter of the year and 1,143 in the third quarter of 1979. Government-sponsored building reached its lowest rate in September, with only 43 flats started.

The average number of government flats started during the third quarter is 414 a month, compared with 767 during the second quarter and 8,843 a month during the third a quarter of last year.[as published]

Industrial production improved during the second quarter but there are no figures yet for the third. It was still lower during the first six months of the year than it was during the first half of 1979, and there are no signs of more work vacancies which would indicate a possible growth.

Exports, which rose steadily during the beginning of the year, are showing signs of slowing down, dropping by 8-9 percent during July-September compared with the first half of the year.

Imports increased by 11 percent during the third quarter of the year compared with the second, but this may be because of depleted raw material supplies which are now being replenished.

The general recession has resulted in a 9 percent drop in real wages during the first half of the year compared with the first half of 1979. Although real wages have steadied during the past few months, the rise in inflation and growing unemployment have made it impossible for wage earners to improve their real wages. Private demand also dropped by 9 percent.

According to government statistics inflation has levelled during the past few months, but may rise shortly as a joint result of the massive printing of money by the government, on the one hand, and the rise in costs, on the other.

The rise in uncontrolled prices appears to follow the trend set by the price hikes initiated by the government.

OFFICIAL DATA SHOWS DROP IN WAGES, CONSUMPTION

TA051222 Jerusalem JERUSALEM POST in English 5 Nov 80 pp 1, 2

[Report by POST economic reporter Shlomo Ma'oz: "Net Wages Dropped by 14 Percent in 6 Months"]

[Excerpts] The real value of salaried workers' net wages dropped by 14 percent in the first half of this year, according to the Central Bureau of Statistics. During the same period, private consumption dropped by 8 percent--the largest drop in this economic indicator since 1950 when measurements began.

The 14 percent drop in the real value of wages is apparently the largest such drop since the creation of the state, although there are no authoritative figures until 1960.

According to the Central Bureau of Statistics figures first published yesterday, gross wages also dropped during the first half of 1980, but only by 8.8 percent in real money terms. The difference between the 8.8 percent drop in gross wages and the 14 percent drop in wages after income tax and payments to the National Insurance Institute was caused by three factors: only moderate rises in wages; the system whereby cost-of-living increments--which are supposed to compensate for higher prices--are paid with up to three-month delays; and the government's refusal to update both the income tax credit points and National Insurance Institute (NII) child allowances.

In the first half of 1980, gross wages in pounds or shekels rose by 106 percent and net wages rose by 94 percent measured in annual rates. At the same time prices rose at an annual rate of 125.8 percent.

The 8 percent drop in private consumption was accompanied by an 11 percent drop in investments in durable goods during the same period.

Other Central Bureau of Statistics figures show that the Gross National Product went down by 1 percent during the first half of the year, compared to the second half of 1979. But it is still 2 percent higher than the GNP for the first half of 1979.

Exports grew by 11 percent in the first half of the year and imports went down by 9 percent.

Israel's balance of trade deficit including import and export of services did not change in the first half of this year even though in terms of quantities of goods and services imported compared to those exported the deficit went down by 40 percent. The high prices of imported fuel stopped the deficit from contracting.

Expenditure on defence rose by 4 percent in the first half of last year mainly because of expenses involved in building the two new air force bases in the Negev.

PROPOSAL TO ANNEX GOLAN HEIGHTS DISCUSSED

TA261303 Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew 26 Oct 80 p 5

[Commentary by Moshe Zaq: "The Golan Heights--A Standing Proposal"]

[Excerpt] In the days when the Soviet Union maintained relations with Israel it used to write us official messages full of warnings "that we do not harm Syria which is located on the Soviet southern border."

One can, of course, question this "flexible" southern border of the Soviet Union but one cannot ignore the great interest the Soviet Union has revealed in Syrian-Israeli relations in the past and all the more so today, after the signing of the Soviet-Syrian friendship agreement.

In the current public debate about the Knesset draft resolution about applying Israeli law to the Golan Heights one should take into consideration the possible Soviet reaction to such an Israeli move although it is not absolutely necessary to make a decision only according to this consideration. When we climbed the Golan Heights, too, a Soviet threat existed and was sharply conveyed via President Johnson but Israel acted according to its own needs. Likewise, now it is not the Soviet ire that can guide Israel in its considerations about this fateful decision on the future of the Golan Heights.

Nevertheless, it is precisely the parliamentary initiative and the very existence of a Knesset draft resolution that opens the way for the beginning of a dialogue with the Soviet Union. As long as the Soviets and the Syrians were sure that nothing would happen regarding the Golan Heights there was no motive to urge them to open talks with Israel. The Israeli legislative initiative which followed the pioneering act of settling the Golan may prove to them there is a reason to rush and look for a way for negotiations.

Now, as far as the relations with the Americans are concerned, there are no grounds for the fear and tremor that has seized some of those concerned about relations with Washington in view of the draft resolution on extending Israeli law to the Golan Heights.

A political benefit is inherent in raising the proposal in the Knesset and, paradoxically, this benefit may be lost precisely the moment this proposal is endorsed by the Knesset.

One should certainly understand and sympathize with the Golan Heights settlers who fear that the model of the Rafah approaches settlements fated to be removed by the Camp David accords will be repeated in their case. Extending Israel's law to the Golan Heights serves for them as guarantees and collaterals that they will not be deserted during possible negotiations with Syria.

However, so long as the draft resolution exists as a proposal it serves as a means of pressure for the defense of both the Golan Heights and Jerusalem. As long as this proposal has not been struck off the agenda and has not been endorsed either, the United States knows it should prevent UN resolutions that enhance Israel's feelings of isolation and push it "to spiteful reactions."

The month of November, immediately after the U.S. election, will be a month of confrontation between Israel and its opponents in the United Nations. In this month we shall direly need U.S. help. The existence of a draft resolution may aid the United States in arguing with its allies that an abundance of UN anti-Israeli resolutions will lead to sharp Israeli reactions. The feeling of isolation will push Israel into defensive moves of its own and the United States is experienced on this matter. It was the U.S. UN Security Council vote on the Jerusalem issue that prompted the Israeli Knesset to pass the Jerusalem law.

The power of the standing draft resolution on extending the Israeli law to the Golan Heights much outweighs the power of the possible law to this effect.

The draft resolution prompts the United States and many other countries which maintain relations with us to persuade Israel not to lead itself to political isolation, while a law, if and when it is passed, will put Israel in a defensive position--why we did what we did and why we decided the way we decided. So long as the draft resolution is pending the United States is trying to persuade us [against converting it into a resolution] and to promise us support in a UN confrontation. When the law is passed in the Knesset it will be we who will have to coax the United States into rescuing us from a UN Security Council operational resolution.

If the law had been endorsed a week or 2 weeks ago and the UN Security Council debate had taken place prior to the U.S. election, there could have been some chance for a U.S. vote, but if the law is passed this week, the UN Security Council debate will be held after the election with all the attendant implications.

Therefore, one should not urge the government to lift the glove thrown to it by the Knesset coalition. The government had better not hurry to resolve how the coalition parties should vote on the Golan Heights issue.

The government must prevent the removal of the proposal from the Knesset's agenda. The proposal should continue to stand on the agenda of all of us, not only on the Golan Heights settlers' agenda. However, on behalf of both Jerusalem and the Golan, the power of the draft resolution as a proposal pending discussion, is far greater than the resolution or the law itself.

'SOURCE CLOSE TO BEGIN' PREDICTS DELAYS ON GOLAN HEIGHTS LAW

TA311849 Tel Aviv 'AL HAMISHMAR in Hebrew 31 Oct 80 p 3

[Commentary by Dalya Shehori: "The Golan Law, Early Elections, What Dayan Meant and All the Rest"]

[Excerpts] Even though most ministers and most Knesset members are very unenthusiastic about annexing the Golan Heights through legislation at this time, the danger still exists that they will find themselves raising their hands in favor of such legislation if they are cleverly maneuvered into doing so, as Ge'ula Kohen did with the Jerusalem law. The source of their weakness lies in their ideological or other commitment (the Likud--loyalty to every inch; the NRP--the same; the Labor Party--strategic-security reasons) which will force them to vote in favor, should matters reach the stage of an open vote.

The reasons for not annexing the Golan are more or less known. What is surprising is that I heard a considerable and significant part of these reasons this week from a source close to Begin. To my delight, this source said that such legislation would cause complications for Israel with world public opinion, without our gaining anything, and this we can do without. It was to my delight, because at last a refreshing breeze of responsible, realpolitik thinking blowing out of the corridors of power after 3 years of oppressive pathos lacking any links to reality.

This source also noted that Israeli law is being applied on the Golan Heights, so that any annexation legislation would be provocation per se. He noted also that if the Knesset explicitly annexes the Golan, in addition to the annexation of Jerusalem, this will be taken as readiness to make concessions in territories that were not being annexed: Judaea and Samaria, the dear sons of Herut. In a moment of frankness, the source even asked rhetorically why a law should be passed that the alignment will have abolished when it takes power.

In any event, the source continued, even if the subject comes before the cabinet--and it is far from certain, in his view, that Begin will not vote against it, if he is compelled to vote--it will not happen at this time, which means that it will not be in the near future. On 8 November Begin leaves for a 10-day visit to the United States. Then, if Carter is re-elected, there will be a Carter-al-Sadat-Begin summit meeting in Washington some time in December, and obviously the cabinet will not initiate a discussion on such a sensitive matter before a summit meeting. When will the issue come before the cabinet? This week I asked a minister, known as a hawk among hawks. What is the hurry, he replied. The prime minister is not raising this yet....

According to the prediction of another confidant, one who is well-versed in the internal politics involved, Begin will raise the matter in the cabinet sometime--as far in the future as possible--but will see to it that the continuation and completion of the discussion are postponed until an even later session, on the grounds of a crowded cabinet agenda, in order to cool the issue. He will do this because if the subject comes up for a vote--according to this confidant--there will be a cabinet majority for annexation legislation. Noblesse oblige.

PROBLEMS OF ISRAELI ARMS MANUFACTURE DISCUSSED

TA021120 Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew 2 Nov 80 p 5

[Commentary by Yuval Elitzur: "The License for the Kfir Planes"]

[Text] The report published at the end of last week in the WALL STREET JOURNAL about the permission the U.S. administration gave the Israeli aircraft industry to offer Mexico Kfir planes did not please the staff of our defense industry.

First, any publicity about a deal of this sort, especially when it appears at a stage when the deal is far from being finalized, may cause it to fail.

Second, the report again exposes the great dependence of Israel's security exports on foreign elements.

On the surface, we should have known about this weakness a long time ago. Any export of weapons--from the 'Uzi submachine guns to the Gavri'el missile--is not a purely commercial deal, but also a political act. The political nature of the arms deal has recently assumed more complicated and dangerous forms. On the one hand, there is a threat to one of Israel's most flourishing export fields, but, on the other, this is an important, promising opening for the broadening of these exports, a hint at a "reversal" that will lead to a new vitality in the entire Israeli economy.

Hostile journals (such as LE MONDE DIPLOMATIQUE which published an expanded commentary on this issue about 2 months ago) have often, over recent years, "exposed" Israeli arms exports. These journals have presented Israel as a country lacking any other economic basis and without any moral inhibitions, as a country which has established an industry of destructive arms based on the theft of technology from others and which is trying, with the aid of this industry, to balance its budget. Israel, according to these descriptions, does not hesitate to sell weapons to anyone, including, in this context, tyrants and national oppressors.

The truth is different. Israel began to lay the foundations for its security industry even before the establishment of the state, because it was unable to buy the few defense weapons then needed from any other source.

The export of weapons has never been an objective per se. In nearly every case we chose production lines of the same type of weapons developed in Israel for the IDF. The sale of arms to foreign countries was always explained as an unfortunate necessity, to compensate ourselves for the enormous investments in the development of these weapons systems and the establishment of production lines capable of producing, out of all the weapons, larger quantities than those required for Israel. Because of this, because the prime objective was a defensive one, it was also not hard to find moral justification for the sale of arms, even to countries unable to boast about their democratic regimes. We could with justification point to the great hypocrisy prevalent in the world in everything involving the sale of arms and to the unclean hands of those who have pointed accusing fingers to us in the United Nations, in leftist circles and sometimes even from among our friends.

However, we would do well not to delude ourselves and to recognize the political consequences of Israel's flourishing arms exports. This has affected Israel's image and also its political maneuvering ability. But this danger to Israel's image is only one side, and actually the less grave side of the influence of the defense industry and defense exports on Israel's political status. The other side has been revealed in the publication of the WALL STREET JOURNAL report. Israel is being forced to make decisions in this field, not only from security and economic considerations. It is now subservient to decisions made at times out of a surrender to certain U.S. slogans ("the desire to prevent the infiltration of modern weapons into Latin America"), either as a surrender to the pressure put by U.S. commercial companies that fear competition by the Israeli industry or from considerations of the eve of the U.S. presidential election. This is because the Israeli defense industry can no longer be entirely independent. Unlike the "Uzi, a jet plane cannot be produced as purely "made in Israel." We require the import of technology and systems and, first and foremost, a jet engine. We can only buy this under certain conditions and, in this context, the agreement of the U.S. Government is the prior condition for the plane to be marketed to a third country.

This dependence on foreign elements originates in technological limitations (our inability to develop certain systems) but mainly in economic limitations. The investment required today for the development of weapons systems is so large that, with all Israel's willingness to allocate quite a considerable portion of its resources to the defense budget, we cannot maintain this "war of independence." It is because the IDF cannot permit itself to use second-rate weapons systems, because we need the best and most modern weapons found in any army's possession for our existence, that the investment required of us for the development of these weapons is the largest.

Until recently Israel, for some reason, believed that it would be able to overcome the economic limitations of the development of sophisticated weapons. When the decision was made to develop the Merkava tank, it was made with the knowledge that we might be able to sell it to a foreign element and thus lessen the investment the Israeli economy would have to bear. This was also the case when the decision was made to develop the Kfir plane, with the knowledge that our need for the general dynamic engine could very much restrict our ability to offer this plane to others. This was also the approach last February when the decision was made to build the Lavi plane; but the last few months have brought about disillusion.

Repeatedly it emerged that we must rid ourselves of illusions concerning the security burden the Israeli economy is capable of bearing. For example, it emerged that Israel would not be able to withstand the investment of about $800 million or more required before we could see the new Lavi plane. It was not with a light heart that the aircraft industry staff began to propose the plane as a "joint production" project to four U.S. companies, and, according to the rumor, also to a Swedish company. It is now clear, beyond any doubt, that only a joint effort with foreign companies, a joint investment and the advance knowledge that it will also be possible to market this plane outside Israel, will permit the completion of the construction of the Lavi.

U.S. agreement on the sale of the Kfir to Mexico is a turning point. It transpires that if we know how to plan our moves wisely, we will thus develop an opening for joint production of weapons systems with the United States and, in the future, with other countries as well. This may be seen as a paring down of Israel's nondependence, but the weapons industry and exports have also restricted Israel's political freedom of maneuvering in the past. It is beneficial for us to know that in the future we will also have to incorporate the defense industry--almost like any enriched-technology industry--in the export establishments of other countries.

CRISIS IN LIKUD OVER RAFI THREATS VIEWED

TA021023 Tel Aviv DAVAR in Hebrew 2 Nov 80 pp 1, 2

[Report by Arye Kinarti: "Crisis in the Likud Following Rafi's Resignation Threats"]

[Excerpts] A serious crisis erupted in relations between the Herut executive, the leaders of Rafi and Finance Minister Yiga'el Hurvitz when the Herut movement's secretariat met on 31 October for an urgent debate on the Rafi leaders' threats to resign from the Likud and run for the Knesset elections on a separate list. At the meeting, which had been convened in a panic with the agreement of Prime Minister Menahem Begin, a demand was made to present an ultimatum to Rafi and demand a reply: "Where is it going, to the Likud or outside it."

Grave attacks were made at the meeting against Hurvitz and MK Zalman Shoval. Hurvitz' personal attacks against Minister David Levi, for whom the Herut movement's support has recently been increasing, were recalled.

Although Hurvitz speaks about "his popularity among the public" because of his economic policy, severe criticism of this policy was expressed at the meeting, particularly by MK Moshe Qatzav, the spokesman of faction members from the Knesset and the councils of development towns.

It appears that chairman of the secretariat Deputy Minister Yoram Aridor, will meet tomorrow with the leaders of the Likud's liberal faction in order to coordinate positions in face of Rafi's threats. The meeting will be held in the Knesset building.

Yoram Aridor, who opened the discussion--as is known, after a talk with Begin--severely criticized the remarks by Hurvitz and the Rafi leaders, saying: "The Rafi leaders threaten to resign every other day." Without mentioning Moshe Dayan's name, Aridor spoke in condemnation of the Rafi method of "grabbing temporary rides on personalities and bodies"--this in reference to Zalman Shoval's "forum." "The Likud is not a hitchlike stop" Aridor warned the Rafi members.

Members of the secretariat said that the Rafi members' behavior in the Likud institutions was insufferable, both among friends and in public. "It is inconceivable that Rafi should behave in the Likud as though it was outside it."

The speakers spoke scornfully about the Rafi leaders' pretentious remarks to the media on the issue of the many seats they would collect "with or without Dayan" in their independent list. Moshe Qatzav said: "Rafi and its leaders have no weight among the public." Qatzav favors Rafi's resignation from the Likud. When Rafi stands up on its own before the voters, everyone will know what its weight is. Chairman of the Herut Knesset faction MK Hayim Kaufman also said: "Perhaps it would really be worthwhile for the Likud and Herut to go to the elections without Yiga'el Hurvitz as finance minister."

Because of the "gravity of the situation" in the developments in the Likud and the relations with Rafi, the Herut movement's secretariat is to meet this week for a continuation of the debate, after Aridor holds contacts with the liberal leaders.

LABOR PARTY CHANGES INTERNAL ELECTION SYSTEM

TA301700 Tel Aviv IDF Radio in Hebrew 1510 GMT 30 Oct 80

[Text] By a large majority, the Labor Party Center has decided to change the system of elections for the party convention. According to the new system, party members will be able to elect 75 percent of the candidates, instead of the previous 60 percent. Members of the Rabin camp left the hall in protest and did not participate in the vote. Yitzhaq Rabin also did not vote and angrily left the hall.

Our correspondent Pe'erli Shahar interviewed Yitzhaq Rabin upon his departure:

[Begin recording] [Shahar] Mr Rabin, why did you decide not to vote and why did you leave the room?

[Rabin] Because, in my opinion, this entire vote is manipulative, contradicts the party spirit and is disgraceful to the Labor Party.

[Question] After you have said all this, now what?

[Answer I will remain in the Labor Party even in these difficult circumstances, and I will fight. I believe that the majority of the Labor Party members support me. Had the members of the Labor Party been allowed to take a personal vote and elect one of the two candidates directly on election day, there is no doubt in my mind as to whom they would have elected.

[Question] Do you plan to request that each member of the Labor Party be allowed to elect the party candidate for the premiership?

[Answer] I will consider it.

[Shahar] Thank you very much. [end recording]

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE ON NEGEV REDEPLOYMENT VIEWED

TA031510 Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 3 Nov 80 p 1

[Report by Aqiva Eldar: "The Executive Committee on Planning the Negev Redeployment Has Been Paralyzed for Four Months"]

[Text] The coordinator of the Director General's Committee on the Negev Redeployment in the framework of the Camp David agreements, Mr Efrayim Shilo, resigned from his office. According to Shilo it was impossible to bring about cooperation between the government offices dealing with this issue.

A few weeks ago Mr Shilo met Finance Minister Yiga'el Hurvitz and Deputy Defense Minister Mordekhay Tzipori--who chairs the committee--and gave his reasons for resigning. Shilo, who was appointed to this job by the director general of the Ministry of the Interior, will continue functioning as the coordinator of the ministerial committee on Jerusalem. Since Shilo's resignation no new coordinator has been appointed to replace him. All regular contacts have stopped between the ministries in charge of the civilian redeployment in the Negev planning, the Defense Ministry and the IDF which are responsible for the military redeployment.

Mr Shilo told the HA'ARETZ correspondent that the Executive Committee has not convened in over 4 months, adding: "It was impossible to make different views coincide for the advancement of the issue. I am used to being busy with matters of implementation, I am not used to wasting my time." Mr Shilo noted that he was unable to prove "that something is being done in the area and that there is an intention to carry out projects."

According to Shilo, the lack of cooperation between the various military and civilian factors caused unnecessary roads to be paved in the Negev and a waste of funds.

A senior source dealing with the Negev redeployment told the HA'ARETZ correspondent that the Defense Ministry is encountering many difficulties in coordinating the different issues with planning components and the IDF branches.

According to that source the Defense Ministry does not receive data from the IDF which would make it possible to plan the civilian services and their deployment in the Negev, rendered necessary by the transfer of thousands of military personnal to the region.

The HA'ARETZ correspondent notes that in the recent state comptroller report, issue of coordination between the different branches in charge of the planning of the Negev redeployment was criticized. The report said that the committee did not meet often enough and that too few director generals participated in the meetings.

JERUSALEM 'AL-SHA'B' CRITICIZES SAUDI 'SUBSERVIENCE' TO U.S.

JN031551 Jerusalem AL-SHA'B in Arabic 31 Oct 80 pp 1, 5

[Editorial: "The Saudi Wagon and the U.S. Station"]

[Text] It is nice to hear Saudi Arabia criticize a U.S. decision with the tone and expressions used in the statement issued by Riyadh yesterday criticizing Carter's decision to stop implementing some of the arms deals agreed on previously by the two states.

It is interesting to hear the Saudi rulers remind Washington that Saudi-U.S. friendship is not to be taken for granted, that this friendship can be reconsidered, and that Riyadh will not allow U.S. Presidential election considerations to be used to interfere in its relations with the United States.

All this is noteworthy and interesting but, unfortunately, incredible. The reason for this lies not only in the nature of the ruling family in Saudi Arabia. Indeed, the past few days have provided additional proof that the family of the sons of 'Abd al-'Aziz al Sa'ud are continuing to bolster their subservience to the United States.

Recently, four sophisticated U.S. radar planes were brought [to Saudi Arabia] to carry out acts of espionage against the region's states. Saudi Arabia also announced that it would increase oil production at U.S. behest and fought to prevent a big increase in oil prices. Furthermore, only 3 days ago Saudi Arabia severed its relations with Libya in protest against Tripoli's stand on Saudi-U.S. relations, which, according to current intimations by Riyadh, are supposedly being reconsidered.

We have had enough of the political lies and falsehoods which some Arab regimes are circulating. Indeed, we feel that mere discussion of this issue is a waste of time.

However, we would like to repeat that the arena is open for the Saudi rulers to prove their stand and wrath. On the other hand, we are sure that they will do nothing and will continue to give out signals that their wagon is not proceeding toward a U.S. station even though they will continue to direct this same wagon toward this same station.

BLACK HEBREW LEADER PROMISES RESISTANCE TO EXPULSION

TA051240 Jerusalem Domestic Service in Hebrew 1105 GMT 5 Nov 80

[Excerpt] We will oppose our expulsion even if the army is sent against us. We will not send our children back to captivity in America, said the leader of the Black Hebrew sect Ben-'Ami Carter, in reaction to the interior minister's decision to reject the Glass committee recommendations, our correspondent in the South Yaron Enosh reports.

[Begin recording] [Enosh] The decision by the interior minister to turn down the Glass committee recommendations aroused considerable bitterness among the Black Hebrew sect in Dimona. Although the sect members continued repairing the apartments that were given to them in the abandoned absorption center, their leader Ben-'Ami Carter made strong statements against the minister's words.

[Carter] I am really disappointed to hear this. I am disappointed for two reasons. One is that Knesset member [as heard] Yosef Burg can react like this and continue blaming us for crimes, as he did 10 years ago. The other is that he does everything except giving us a chance to prove ourselves, to show that we have really moderated our attitude.

[Enosh] Ben-'Ami Carter added that he does not believe that the Black Hebrews can do anything to convince the government that they are not a negative factor in Israel. However, the sect members will not consent to a decision to expel them and will even oppose it with all the means at their disposal.

[Carter] Certainly, we can agree to anything except to expulsion. We will not allow anybody to expel [words indistinct]. They can, they really can send the army against us, to murder us all. I do not doubt this. But to send our children back to the U.S. captivity, no we will not volunteer to do this. We will consent to anything else, but we will not accept this.

[Enosh] Ben-'Ami Carter added: We prefer to die in Israel than to return to the United States. As mentioned, these were the words of the leader of the Black Hebrews. [end recording]

BRIEFS

LAND DIRECTOR RESIGNS--Ya'aqov Aknin, director general of the Israel Land Administration, has submitted his resignation to Agriculture Minister Ari'el Sharon, saying that Mr Sharon's concept of the meaning of the administration's work differs from the way the law sees it. In a talk with our correspondent 'Uzi Birman, Mr Aknin explained that an unbridgeable gap has been opened between himself and Mr Sharon in everything related to the administration of state land according to the law and subject to regular administration procedures. Mr Aknin had learned that the question of his continued employment was to be raised at the cabinet session tomorrow. He said that to prevent public storm, and because he was certain that, for obvious reasons, the prime minister would be unable to rule against the agriculture minister, he preferred to resign and not cause a further rift in the government. Mr Aknin told our correspondent that Minister Sharon has not yet reacted to the resignation. [Text] [TA272017 Jerusalem Domestic Television Service in Hebrew 1900 GMT 27 Oct 80]

E. JERUSALEM ELECTRIC TAKEOVER--The government will apparently rescind its plans not to renew the contract with the East Jerusalem Electric Company in view of what has been defined as "political compulsions" and "legal complications." People who demand that the government go ahead with its original intention of not renewing the contract have said that if the government does go back on its initial plan this would be Israel's first step in the process of getting "cold feet" on the issue of Jerusalem. According to these people, this process began when it was decided to freeze the transfer of the prime minister's office to East Jerusalem. "These withdrawals are ominous for the future status of Jerusalem as a unified city under fill Israeli sovereignty," these people emphasized. The issue is secret. However, reliable sources have confirmed that secret contacts are being held with the heads of the East Jerusalem Electric Company to reach a compromise, with the consent of Prime Minister Menahem Begin and Energy Minister Yitzhaq Moda'i. The main argument of those favoring calling off plans not to renew the contract is that this would be interpreted by other countries as the nationalization of the Arab electric company in Jerusalem and as an extension of the Jerusalem law. Therefore, this move would provoke another waver of anger against Israel. Another contention is that it is impossible to predict the ruling of the high court of justice on the appeal of the East Jerusalem Electric Company, scheduled to be held in December. LIBERAL-LIKUD MERGER--Deputy Prime Minister Simha Ehrlich has promised the prime minister that he will act within the Liberal Party to bring about the merger with the Likud despite the Liberal Party's long-standing objection to this move. The prime minister revealed Ehrlich's promise in a recent meeting he held with Knesset member Moshe Qatzav of the Herut movement. Our correspondent, Amnon Nadav, has learned there have recently been increased demands in the Herut movement to merge the Likud and cancel the Gahal agreement that grants the Liberals a larger representation than their actual stand among the public. A similar opinion has been recently expressed among Rafi faction members who, together with Herut members, conveyed it to the prime minister. FUTURE OF TERRITORIES, AUTONOMY--Knesset member Yitzhaq Rabin said today that the Jewish settlements in the territories, the southern part of the Gaza Strip, and the Jordan Rift Valley and the hill slopes near it and the Jerusalem area should remain under Israeli rule. He noted that although there is no country in the world that would support this plan, it would be easier to find a supporter for this plan than for the prime minister's plan for Israeli rule over the entire Eretz Yisra'el. Yitzhaq Rabin further said that the Arab residents of the territories should be granted administrative rather than legislative autonomy but this should be accorded to them only in areas populated by Arabs which will remain under Israel's rule in the future. Mr Rabin also said he was willing to accept a joint Israeli-Jordanian trusteeship but with Jerusalem excluded. Rabin today addressed the students at Bar-Ilan University and our correspondent notes that although Rabin's words were not received with great enthusiasm, the students prepared large posters with slogans denouncing Knesset member Peres and demanding that Rabin continue his struggle against Peres. SOVIET IMMIGRATION--September was "noted" for the smallest number of immigrants and the greatest amount of dropouts. This transpires from an internal report by the Jewish Agency's Immigration and Absorption Executive. Last month 1,491 immigrants arrived compared with 1,731 in August, 1,922 in July and 2,858 in June. Some 267 immigrants came from the Soviet Union in September out of 1,307 Jews who left the Soviet Union. Thus the number of dropouts reached a record 75.7 percent. This drastic drop in immigration is explained by the fact that the Soviet authorities now appear to be granting exit visas only to those Jews whom they know will not emigrate to Israel. FOREIGN WORKERS--The number of foreign workers employed in Israel dropped by about half last month compared with September of last year. The employment service granted 740 work permits to foreigners. The decline seems to result from the economic recession and from a tougher policy on granting work permits to foreigners. These figures do not include Negev air base construction workers. The ITIM correspondent in Judaea and Samaria notes that the father was deported together with the Hebron and Halhul mayors, following the murder next to the Hadassah building in Hebron. However, while the two mayors were given the right to appeal before the Military Appeals Board, no such right was accorded Shaykh at-Tamimi, since the supreme court determined that he had in fact engaged in incitement. NEW WEST BANK SETTLEMENTS--Now to settlement matters. Vered Yiriho is a moshav of the agricultural union at the entrance to Jericho, near the refugee camp. It is the closest Jewish settlement to the town of Jericho, and one of its aims is to prevent implementation of the Allon plan. Homesh is the new name of the Nahal outpost called Ma'ale Nahal. It is situated on one of the highest points on the Samarian Ridge. Only the vanguard of families came today to these two settlements. GOLAN HEIGHTS ANNEXATION OPPOSED--Now to the Labor Party. In view of the debate in the party between hawks and doves, MAPAM this evening sharpened the formulation of its position in order to pressure the Labor Party, its partner in the alignment. The MAPAM executive [Rikuz] a short time ago passed a resolution asserting that MAPAM will insist on the alignment voting against the law for annexing the Golan Heights. Amnon Nadav reports: [Begin recording] While the Labor Party is now struggling with its stand in its settlement and political committees, MAPAM this evening stepped up the pressure on the Labor Party regarding the Golan Heights law almost to the point of an ultimatum. In the course of this evening's discussion MAPAM secretary-general Victor Shem-tov said that MAPAM will not be able to live with the Labor Party if the latter initiates a law for the application of Israeli law to the Golan Heights. MK Hayka Grossman corrects him: we will not be able to live together. At the conclusion of the discussion, the executive passed a resolution asserting that a situation must not be created in which a Labor Party abstention on a vote on a Golan Heights bill will lead to its being approved by the Knesset. MAPAM is now demanding that the Labor Party refrain from submitting its own bill for the application of Israeli law to the Golan Heights; it will view this as a step conflicting with the alignment's platform, with all that this entails. And on the other side, the Labor Party's settlement committee could yet in the near future pass a resolution which would counter the MAPAM resolution and put that party to the test. KFIR PLANES OFFERED--Israel is going to invite representatives of several Latin American countries to come to Israel in order to offer them the opportunity of examining the possibility of purchasing the Kfir plane. This development comes after Washington gave Israel permission to add these countries to the list of those with whom the aircraft industry may conduct negotiations for the sale of the Kfir (which is equipped with a U.S. engine). FOREIGN CURRENCY RESERVES--Israel's foreign currency reserves dropped by $76 million in October, due to the weakening of the German mark vis-a-vis other foreign currencies. The drop stemmed from a decline in the value of the Bank of Israel's reserves, part of which are held in marks. Israel's reserves stood at $2.786 billion at the end of October, a drop of $161 million from this year's peak of $2.947 billion in July. At the end of 1979, the reserves were $2.57 billion. KNESSET MAJORITY ALINEMENT--[Report on public opinion poll conducted by Dr Mina Tzemah published in the financial weekly KSAFIM] A public opinion poll held in mid-October gave the alignment an absolute majority of 61 seats in the Knesset, compared with 59 in an August poll. With Yitzhaq Rabin heading the list, however, it got 66 seats. The poll, which asked a sample of the public which party it would vote for it Knesset elections were held now, was conducted by Dr Mina Tzemah and published in the financial weekly KSAFIM. The Likud received 29 seats (28 in August), and the NRP eight, one less than in August. An "Independent Centre" Party headed by 'Ezer Weizman received 16 seats in the poll, four more than in August. Eight of the seats were at the expense of the Alignment and four from the Likud. An Independent Rafi list, however, drew only three seats, the number it has now. In answer to the question "Who is best suited to be prime minister?" 34.6 percent chose Rabin, 25.2 percent chose Prime Minister Menahem Begin, 20.6 percent voted for Shim'on Peres, and 15.2 percent chose Weizman. Peres' rating rose five percent since August, while the others received about the same. Over 60 percent of the public is dissatisfied with Begin serving both as prime minister and defence minister. Asked whom they preferred as defence minister, 34.4 percent chose Ari'el Sharon, while 27 percent chose 'Ezer Weizman. [Text] [TA319831 Jerusalem JERUSALEM POST in English 31 Oct 80 p 3]

TAX COLLECTION DOWN--A real drop of over 10 percent was registered in tax collection during the period between April and October, according to figures released by the State Revenue Commission. Indirect tax receipts were up slightly last month, but the overall picture still shows a drastic fall in tax revenues. Adjusted income tax revenue showed almost no change for the first seven months of the current fiscal year, but import duties fell by about 40 percent and tax on local products by 15 percent. Value added tax receitps were down by 14 percent net, and local purchase taxes were lower by more than 28 percent. [Text] [Jerusalem JERUSALEM POST in English 7 Nov 80 p 15 TA]

PAPER CRITICIZES U.S. STAND ON IRAQI-IRANIAN WAR

JN031100 Amman AL-AKHBAR in Arabic 3 Nov 80 pp 1, 13

[Editorial: The Position of the Camp David Trinity on the Iraqi-Iranian War"]

[Text] As the theatrical game of the hostages enters its last stage, a theatrical being acted by Washington and Tehran before the Iranian and U.S. peoples, the nature of the close ties linking the two countries and their conspiratorial role in exacerbating the situation in the area in preparation for returning U.S. influence and U.S. control over its interests has been exposed.

The barter deal--hostages for space parts--in first and foremost meant to justify a U.S. intervention in the Iraqi-Iranian war. The U.S. intervention is aimed at prolonging the war and exploiting it and at regaining its status in the area by adopting a partial stand supporting Iran against the Arab position which supports Iraq in its pan-Arab battle against the Iranian aggression. The barter deal would be in implementation of the Camp David plot and would serve Israel's interests.

The three Camp David partners--Egypt, Israel and the United States--have adopted a joint stand on the Iraqi-Iranian war in declaring that Iraq is the aggressor. This confirms the close ties between Washington and Tehran, ties which are an extension of their relations under the former regime.

Iran's leaders are entrenching the bases of their alliance with the United States against Iraq; or more precisely, they are reviving their old alliance with Washington.

The U.S. partiality toward Iran against Iraq is an extension of Washington's biased attitude toward Israel. This is a well-known U.S. stand against the Arabs in every field, a stand appearing as if it is a part of the U.S. strategy.

It is incumbent upon the Arabs vis-a-vis this serious development, to adopt a stand to reply to the pro-Iranian U.S. intervention. The Arabs must marshal their potentials without bounds to support Iraq in orde to enable it to end the war in its favor and to settle the battle, which is basically one of the Arab nation.

There is no doubt that all these developments confirm Jordan's sound and healthy stand since the beginning in support of Iraq and its pan-Arab battle against the Iranian aggression. The battle will assume serious dimensions as a result of the U.S. intervention unless the Arabs hasten to unwaveringly support and back Iraq without reservations.

ISRAELI REPORTER DENIES SPLIT IN GOVERNMENT LEADERSHIP

TA101900 Jerusalem Domestic Service in Hebrew 1700 GMT 10 Nov 80

[From the Evening Newsreel]

[Text] Dissatisfaction has been reported among certain levels of the Jordanian population due to Jordan's pro-Iraqi intervention in the Persian Gulf war. However, unlike yesterday's report there are no manifestations of opposition in the Jordanian leadership to the Jordanian-Iraqi rapprochement. Our correspondent for Arab affairs Aharon Barne'a reports:

[Begin recording] For 8 weeks, ever since the beginning of the Iraq-Iran war, an argument has been raging in Jordan about Jordan's part in this war. The regime's leadership, which fully supports King Husayn, is well aware of the Iraqi interest in Jordan and the benefit Jordan can gain from cooperation with its northern neighbor, which is now one of the richest Arab countries. Nevertheless, there are manifestations of opposition among the Muslim brotherhood and other religious elements due to their closeness to Khomeyni's Islamic revolution. It is reasonable to assume that remarks in this spirit have been recently made during sermons in mosques.

Until the outbreak of the Persian Gulf war Jordan has been enjoying an unprecedented economic boom, but over the last 8 weeks there have been increasing reports about shortage of basic commodities throughout the Hashemite kingdom. The port of al-'Aqabah, Jordan's only outlet to the rest of the world, is blocked by ships transferring equipment to Iraq. The port workers are very busy unloading equipment not designated for Jordan, and the truck drivers conveying food from al-'Aqabah to Amman and other cities are now making long trips conveying equipment that does not belong to them to another country.

All this causes internal ferment but the criticism leveled at King Husayn is over the scope of the aid, not over the principle of aid. Some question Jordan's involvement in the private war of Iraqi leader Saddam Husan, and some wonder why the Jordanian king is playing the role of an attorney of the Iraqi regime that has entered an endless war in the Arab world.

For the time being there is no confirmation of the report published in the name of Zayd al-Rifa'i, former Jordanian prime minister and King Husayn's personal friend, opposing the rapprochement with Iraq, nor is there any conformation of reports about arrests of opponents to the Jordanian involvement in the war. Informed sources say today that an argument in certain circles about the size of aid to Iraq exists, but there is no opposition to the Jordanian ruling class. [end recording]

BRIEFS

FOREIGN MINISTER INTERVIEWED--Foreign Minister Marwan al-Qasim has affirmed that the Jordanian stand on the Iraqi-Iranian war is very clear, adding that Jordan's support for Iraq derives from a pan-Arab premise. In an interview published by the Kuwaiti paper AL-QABAS today, Al-Qasim says that His Majesty King Husayn's visit to Iraq was successful. He added that during this visit, developments in the Iraqi-Iranian war, current circumstances of this war and various future possibilities were discussed. Al-Qasim said that the current Arab situation and the possibility of clearing the political atmosphere and of working to reunify the Arab ranks, prior to the convocation of the forthcoming Arab summit conference, were also discussed. Asked about the meetings of the seven-member committee, the foreign minister said these meetings were one of the best Arab conferences, pointing out that all of the delegations met their responsibility in facing the challenges to our Arab nation. Marwan al-Qasim added that the committee adopted several positive decisions and recommendations, including the decision to convene another meeting for the committee on 18 November, since by then the Arab League general secretariat and Jordan would have put all of the recommendations and decisions in their final form. Marwan al-Qasim added that if these recommendations are agreed upon, they will be referred to the Arab foreign ministers for adoption. These recommendations would then be referred to the Arab kings and leaders at their conference on 25 November. [Text] [JN311238 Amman Domestic Service in Arabic 1200 GMT 31 Oct 80]

PALESTINIAN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE--Jordan has set up another committee for Palestinian affairs; it will deal with Jerusalem-related matters. Our correspondent, Pinhas 'Inbari, reported that, among other aims, the committee will provide assistance to Jerusalem institutions and will seek to realize Jordanian policy stressing the city's Arabic nature. Called the Royal Committee for Jerusalem Affairs, it is headed by Qasim al-Ramawi, a former prime minister. This committee was established within the framework of the Jordanian Government's activities to reduce the importance of its joint committee with the PLO. KUWAIT PAPER DISCLOSES FRENCH EFFORT TO RESOLVE LEBANESE CRISIS

LD281519 Kuwait AL-WATAN in Arabic 24 Oct 80 p 13

[Beirut dispatch: "AL-WATAN Unveils a Special Important Secret; a French Initiative in the name of Western Europe; Delamare Meets Sarkis and Leaves for Paris"]

[Excerpts] Beirut--AL-WATAN has learned from an informed diplomatic source in Beirut that behind-the-scenes contacts have been taking place between France and the Lebanese Government for some time now on a new initiative which the French Government intends to make to resolve the Lebanese crisis which has been going on since 1975.

According to information, these efforts are nearing completion. Last week, French Ambassador to Lebanon Louis Fernand Delamare left for Paris for consultations with the French foreign ministry on the outcome of the efforts that have been made in this connection.

After having met with President Ilyas Sarkis to say goodbye before leaving for France, Delamare declined to say anything to journalists other than that the talks he had with the Lebanese president were "extremely important", adding: I cannot at present reveal the nature of the subject on which the talks centered.

It appears that the French ambassador's eagerness not to say anything in this connection coincides with the information given by the diplomatic source on a new French initiative. It has been learned also that Catholic Church leader Pope Paul II has something to do with this subject because Papal Nuncio Monsignor Carlo Furno has participated in some aspects of the efforts and contacts that have taken place in this connection, particularly with the members of the isolationist leadership.

According to certain information, if all the parties concerned with the Lebanese crisis agree, France is prepared to play an important role by sending French forces to Lebanon to replace the Syrian forces which are operating as Arab deterrent forces in some areas in the capital and the suburbs, provided that the question of the Syrian forces' continued stay in the other areas is left for discussion at a later stage. The information says that France regards the restoration of normal life to the capital, Beirut, as a basic factor in resolving the crisis. It is worth noting that sniping operations take place and shelling is exchanged daily, particularly at night, in the commercial sector of the capital where the Palestine Liberation army forces are stationed as part of the Syrian forces.

The idea that is being discussed provides for the deployment of French forces in the commercial area and on the contact lines between the two sectors of the capital as well as in the southeastern suburb where the presidential palace and the Defense Ministry are situated.

On the other hand, during these efforts an idea was put forward providing for the deployment of international forces in the capital, Beirut, of which the French forces would constitute the basic force. It is worth noting that this idea agrees with the posture of the Phalangist Party leadership which has links with the Zionist enemy and which seeks the withdrawal of the Syrian forces from Lebanon, particularly from the area of Beirut and its suburbs.

According to other information, the Western European countries might adopt the French initiative--that is, the initiative will be announced in the name of the Western European countries following the American presidential elections which will take place next month.

In any case, the coming days will reveal more details and information about this matter.

DRAFT PLAN FOR REORGANIZATION OF NATIONAL MOVEMENT PUBLISHED

Beirut THE ARAB WORLD WEEKLY in English 25 Oct 80

[25 Oct 80 pp 12-16]

[Text] The following are excerpts from the draft plan for the reorganization of the Lebanese leftist National Movement which was carried on October 11 and 12 by the Beirut pro-Syrian daily AL SHARQ. The document was drawn up by Mr Mohsen Ibrahim, executive secretary general of the NM and presented to the Central Political Council and the Executive Committee of the movement.

The draft plan described itself as being "a political analysis of the Lebanese conflict in the present and future stages," and made recommendations concerning the broad lines of future action to pursue "the national Lebanese struggle during the critical situation."

The introduction gave a general picture of the Lebanese situation and stated the main purposes behind the draft plan. The Lebanese crisis was described as the result of local, Arab and international conflicts which prolong and complicate the Lebanese problem. It warned the National Movement against the risk of falling a victim of this situation as a result of inadequate policies. The document proposed to examine in an objective way the different aspects of the crisis in order to determine a practical line of action.

The report then proceeded to examine the various facts and conditions of the situation in the following manner:

"First. The Israeli Policy Vis-a-Vis Lebanon.

"I. The goals

"a) The "immediate and direct" goal is to strike a blow to the Palestinian revolution by destroying its military bases in Lebanon." The aim as it is seen, is to impose the Camp David agreements on the Palestinian cause, including the forced resettlement of Palestinians in the countries where they currently reside, including Lebanon. The document says that armed struggle remains the only hope for a Palestinian return to the occupied territories.

"b) The "immediate and direct" goal of using the Lebanese scene for more Israeli military and political activities to pressure the Arab steadfastness front, and especially Syria, into a defensive position.

"c) The "middle and long-range" Israeli goal of taking progressive control over Lebanon so as to realize "the Zionist ambitions in South Lebanon.

"2. The Means

In order to implement its goals, Israel would resort to the following means:

a) The consolidation of the occupation Israel has already achieved in the South with the creation of the mini-state of rebel Lebanese Major Saad Haddad, in addition to the annexation of parts of the borderline territories.

b) To provide political and material support to the "isolationist" project of the Lebanese Front in general and the "mini-state the Phalangist Party is establishing" in particular.

c) Frequent statements of Israeli political intentions on the Lebanese scene and which are broadly defined in the above point.

d) The use of military tactics to keep the Lebanese scene under constant pressure by the Israeli military machine (a policy which has been implemented ever since the March 1978 incursion).

e) To intensify military aggressions, especially air raids, every time the Middle East situation in general creates the right opportunity for it, with the purpose of frustrating Syria which had taken it "upon herself to ensure the security of Lebanon."

"Second: The U.S. Stand vis-a-vis the Lebanese situation

"1. The US position on the Lebanese crisis hinges on its overall Middle East policy, and is bent on attempting to spread the Camp David logic in the Arab world.

2. The US has given its approval to the Israeli plan to pressure Lebanon, the Palestinian resistance and Syria in Lebanon. The US is described as the main support of Israel and the main obstacle to the implementation of UN resolutions.

3. As far as the internal Lebanese situation is concerned, the US supports the legal authorities and acknowledges Lebanon's territorial sovereignty and independence. Yet, this does not preclude tacit support to the Lebanese Front "in order to maintain an essential balance of forces." This balance of forces is deemed necessary to maintain the chances of the Camp David peace process alive on the Lebanese scene.

"Third: The Lebanese Front's plans on the political and territorial levels:

1) The "isolationist" approach does not aim at the partition of Lebanon, but at the "occupation" of all of Lebanon with the purpose of imposing a one-party (phalangist) system.

2) The Phalangist policy of forced unity between the different forces in presence in the regions aims at forming a central base which would enable the party to carry out its ambition of monopolizing power in Lebanon as a whole. The plan said that unity as seen by the Phalangists would be a federation.

3) The Phalangists' position towards the Palestinian is in line with that of the Israelis; they aim at distributing the Palestinian population over the Arab countries, except Lebanon.

4) The fact that the Phalangists have monopolized power in regions under the control of the Lebanese Front confirms that they have plans for the establishment of a "one-party fascist system."

5) The Phalangists want to establish themselves as the legal authority in regions under their control.

6) The plan says that the reiterated warning against a power vacuum at the end of Mr. Sarkis' presidential mandate indicates that this is the time when the Phalangist Party will substitute itself for the legal authority in regions under its control. This is interpreted as likely to lead to a resumption of the war.

"Fourth: The stand and the responsibilities of the legal authorities

1) The plan blames the Lebanese legal authorities for having ignored reality and having encouraged the impression that the Lebanese Front was the victorious side.

2) The legal authorities lost time in their search for partial solutions as was the case with the reconstruction of the Army.

3) Following Syria's decision to withdraw part of its forces from Lebanon, and especially from Beirut, the National Movement proposed its plan for "a political solution to the Lebanese crisis" in order to avoid the power vacuum that would have resulted from the Syrian withdrawal. The plan was overlooked and still awaits the initiative of the President.

4) The 14-point proclamation made by President Sarkis received wide support. However, the text said, the State was unable to bring about a political solution to the conflict and this has let the crisis drag on.

Part Two

Part Two, which is divided into two sections, deals with the necessary means to put an end to internal dissensions, achieve the unity of military ranks and define the role of all forces in Lebanon: the Arab Deterrent Forces, the Internal Security Forces (gendarmes) and the Palestinian resistance. This part also looks into the necessary means to meet the needs of the population and to improve information and propaganda.

Section I

First and foremost, the National Movement reasserts its goal which is only "a means towards securing an overall solution to the Lebanese crisis."

It said that "despite the obstacles that stand in the way of a just peace, despite attempts by the isolationist faction to monopolize the situation, despite the Phalangist-Fascist continuous criticism of attempts to restore national unity, and despite continuous uprisings throughout the country, the National Movement maintains its belief that Lebanon's salvation can only come through political endeavours. Violence cannot solve the urgent problems and efforts deployed by some to extend a form of partisan hegemony over the country and can only be fatal to Lebanon's sovereignty.

"Democracy is, in our belief, the only possible solution capable of ensuring a healthy future to the country..."

"The National Movement is aware of the fact that the pro-Israeli isolationist faction in Lebanon is attempting to drown the country in a new wave of violence. The persisting escalation of Zionist moves in the South and in particular the increase in Zionist armed presence, is a proof of the isolationist influence.

"On the other hand, the National Movement understands very well that it must continue to fight and consequently to defend Lebanon against its aggressors. The struggle will always be undertaken in the name of a just and equitable political solution. The National Movement refuses to take up arms for the sake of extending its own hegemony over the country."

A. Main Conditions for National Unity

"1. The reconstruction of the Lebanese political and central authority.
2. To reassert Lebanon's Arab allegiance.
3. To establish a just and democratic rule.
4. To rebuilt the armed forces and the various national institutions.
5. To reactivate the economic and social sectors of the country.

B. Conditions for a Democratic Reform

The plan said that once national unity is re-established in the country on the basis of the principles defined above, "then we must carry on the democratic struggle in an effort to exploit the country's resources at all levels. When this becomes possible, the National Movement will extend its hand to all factions with the purpose of pursuing the goal to the end. The National Movement will then implement the working paper first proposed in August 1970, a plan which it considers as a national peace plan.

"The Zionist-Imperialist alliance has bestowed a special role upon Lebanon. It is well known that the Zionists have long coveted Lebanon's waters and lands, and in the past it (Lebanon) was chosen as an experimental site for the promotion of sectarian dualism, such as it exists in the Jewish state. The Camp David dilemma has added a new dimension to Lebanon's role, making it all the more linked to the Middle East crisis. Furthermore, the tripartite Camp David alliance has turned Lebanon into a battlefield to intimidate Arab states. By allying himself with Israel, Egyptian President Anwar Sadat has indirectly opened the way for the destruction of Lebanon..."

"To counteract Zionist plans, the National Movement has come forth with the following points:

"1. Formation of an Arab militarized Steadfastness and Confrontation Front whose responsibility will be to prevent violence and political deterioration in all Arab countries. It would have to undermine relations that foster defeatist plans; confront the US-Israeli alliance, demand the liberation of all occupied territories and the restoration of the Palestinian right to establish its state on its own land.

2. The task of the projected front has been adequately filled by Syria. Consequently it becomes imperative that we fully cooperate with Syria.

3. It is necessary to offer unlimited cooperation to the Palestinian cause. The PLO will be considered as the sole representative of the Palestinian people.

[1 Nov 80 pp 11-13]

[Text] 4) To support the National Movement's goal of preserving the unity of Lebanon, its Arab character and its democratic evolution.

5) To work within a truly unified Arab context and along the lines drawn by the Arab summit.

6) To foster strategic relations with the Soviet Union and most socialist countries and liberation movements.

7) To preserve the national and social gains that have been secured by the National Movement.

8) To promote a popular majority which will assume its responsibilities in the struggle against the Zionist-imperialist alliance.

9) To keep up the influence of the national and progressive Arab front at a popular level and throughout the Arab world.

10) Arab unity remains the only weapon which the Arabs can use to secure their social and national independence.

Leadership

"In view of the chaotic situation which prevails across the country, it becomes imperative that the President of the Republic assumes his responsibilities vis-a-vis the nation. A continued lack of central authority can be fatal since it will promote the current trend calling for dividing the country into cantons or a federation.

"Our first demand will be the formation of a cabinet which is long overdue. We are not concerned with its external make-up but rather with the policy it will follow. Will the new cabinet put an end to the fascist faction and destroy the trends calling for partition, or will the cabinet continue, as in the past, to accept the present status quo.

"The answers to these questions lie in the stand that the President will choose to take. He must dictate the future political evolution of the country."

The document went on to list the bases on which national unity should be achieved by the new cabinet:

--a plan for the reconstruction of the Army
--a security plan for all the Lebanese territories
--a plan to preserve the South from Israeli aggressions
--a plan to implement agreements concluded between Lebanon and the PLO
--a plan to define Lebanese-Syrian relations
--a plan to secure democratic values
--a plan for the reconstruction of the economic and social sectors

The document said that "the security plan needs to be implemented quickly, and we are looking forward to a new formula which would promote the role of the Army. On the other hand, the plan must clearly explain the responsibilities of the Arab Deterrent Forces, their coordination with the Lebanese Army."

On Palestinian presence in Lebanon, the text said "we must...work towards implementing the agreements that were signed between the local authorities and the PLO."

It added that a political plan needs to be formulated to promote the national interests of the country.

Reorganization

The document then dwelt on the measures that are necessary to be taken in order to "counteract the direct confrontation led by the pro-Israeli isolationist faction."

--"The pro-Israeli isolationist scheme which the Phalangist Party is implementing shows distinct Zionist involvement. This indicates that this party cannot work for national unity nor would accept solutions likely to restore peace in the country.

--"The legitimate authorities represented by the President of the Repbulic have failed to take a strong position against the Phalangist fascist current and have failed to implement a political solution to end this chaotic situation. Meanwhile, isolationist influence is increasing. If the population of this country does not pressure the authorities, we cannot expect from the latter any immediate actions.

--"Nevertheless, the power of the authorities is limited. This is why Opposition (i.e. the force opposed to the isolationist's schemes) must pull its weight across the country and work in cooperation with all factions that seek to preserve Lebanon's Arab character and its democratic evolution.

"The legitimate authorities, alone, cannot overcome the isolationist plan. The National Movement proposes to work with the authorities... The plan called for by the National Movement is completely different from the isolationist plan. The isolationist plan proposes a temporary state of partition (i.e. a confederation) but its long-term goal is complete hegemony of a sectarian and fascist rule. On the other hand, the National Movement's plan calls for the reorganization of the country at all levels and urges Lebanese nationals to exert pressures on the authorities.

The document said that in order to achieve its goals and implement its plan, the National Movement should adopt a series of reorganization measures, which are as follows:

1) On the political level the text called for giving priority to collective action by all the NM's members and to reduce the importance of individual action by the various forces. It stressed, however, that this should not interfere with the ideological and political independence of the various individual groups and that the individual groups should not obstruct collective action by the Movement.

The text added that communication should be improved at all levels of the National Movement.

It also called for reorganizing the joint political committee that binds together the National Movement and the Palestinian resistance.

2) As far as military and para-military activities are concerned, the text called for unifying the military branches of all National Movement parties into one single military organization. It also called for reorganizing the joint military committee established between the National Movement and the Palestinian resistance, and for defining the duties and role of this committee.

Furthermore, the document called for establishing a unified joint military command for the National Movement member-parties.

The document also called for defining the role and duties of the (Syrian) Arab Deterrent Forces, the Lebanese Internal Security Forces (gendarmes) as well as relations between the National Movement and the various other security agencies existing in the country.

The document also underlined the importance of social questions and the need for ensuring decent living conditions to the population by reviving or creating services and institutions necessary for its welfare and well-being.

It also announced that the National Movement's newspaper AL WATAN would soon be published again and called for establishing a NM-owned radio-station in an effort to promote information.

AL-WAZZAN INTERVIEWED ON NATIONAL EVENTS

NC042103 Beirut Domestic Service in Arabic 2000 GMT 4 Nov 80

[Excerpts] About a week ago, Prime Minister Shafiq Al-Wazzan was interviewed by AL-JUMHUR magazine on affairs and events taking place on the Lebanese arena. The magazine will publish the interview tomorrow, Wednesday.

Prime Minister Al-Wazzan began the interview by saying: What has been happening in Lebanon since the start of the events is definitely a plot, many plots. I cannot say anything about the timing of the 'Ayn Ar-Rummanah incidents. I can only say that they were apparently studied and came to coincide with the period of transferring the government responsibilities. Despite this, I will not evade the responsibility and I am dealing with the matter according to the dictates of duty. I believe that we must consider Lebanon's interests first and last even if this places on our shoulders a responsibility which is not the responsibility of our government that has not yet assumed its duties.

Asked if the army commander has placed his resignation at the disposal of the president of the republic, Prime Minister Al-Wazzan answered in the negative.

Asked if the legality has fallen with the fall of 'Ayn Ar-Rummanah, Al-Wazzan answered: I can deny this conclusion. Certain facts make me believe that the authority is serious about raising the flag of legality and determined to emphasize the sovereignty of the state.

Regarding the problem of the south and Israel's slicing of parts of it, the prime minister said: this question appears embarrassing at first for the official who can see clearly his inability to confront the aggression with his own resources. I will not clarify this statement or elaborate on the inability of Lebanon to confront the Israeli attacks. I say in answer: if the state cannot confront the situation militarily, then its only option is to seek the aid of the brothers and of the United Nations. We have sought this aid and you are aware of the course of events and the results. Those sincerely wishing to resist these attacks have only to point the way to us. We believe in useful resistance and not the resistance which would generate more tragedies and further occupation.

Concerning the defense law, Al-Wazzan said: I have a specific point of view based on my commitment to certain principles and stands and on memorandums which we submitted to the officials concerned. The gist of these memorandums is that we want to build a national, balanced and sound army which could earn the confidence of all through their feeling that the army belongs to all of them and not to a certain faction. Moreover, we have declared that it is necessary to adopt the organizational rules followed by the sound democratic states in all matters relating to the reorganization of the army, including the intelligence directorate.

Regarding the 14 principles of the national accord, the prime minister said: these principles constitute the suitable groundwork to deal with the question of accord.

Concerning the state's relationship with the Palestinian Resistance and the loose security in the western part of Beirut, Prime Minister Al-Wazzan said: we believe in the need to coordinate with the Palestinian Resistance. This coordination should take place on the spot in light of the contacts, which must take place in keeping with the practice of the government so far. I hope we will succeed in this to serve Lebanon and the Palestinian question.

NEW PRIME MINISTER OUTLINES PRIORITIES

Shafik Wazzan

Beirut MONDAY MORNING in English 27 Oct-2 Nov 80 pp 24-29

[Interview with Shafik Wazzan, prime minister designate, by Mona al-Said, date and place not given]

[Text]

In his first private interview with the press after his appointment last week, Prime Minister Designate Shafik Wazzan told Monday Morning on Friday that one of his first priorities as Lebanon's new premier will be the implementation of the controversial defense law.

Wazzan also said that he intended to take part in the preparation of a security plan which would be designed to bring the internal situation under control.

Disagreement over parts of the defense law was one of the major factors which clouded relations between President Elias Sarkis and Prime Minister Selim Hoss, Wazzan's predecessor.

Wazzan, as president of the Islamic Council and member of the Islamic Grouping, was known to be a supporter of Hoss' position, and he told Monday Morning last week that his views on this subject have not changed.

"President Sarkis knows all my thoughts and positions, and I have even submitted written memoranda to him on the subjects to which your question refers," he said. "Our commitment to the memoranda that we have submitted (on the subject of the Army) stands, and this matter will doubtless claim a major part of our attention until we arrive at a conclusion that serves the national interest."

He added: "We don't want something for any sect to the exclusion of any other sect in Lebanon... We want the Army to have a national structure."

Asked if the Lebanese could expect the implementation of the defense law in the near future, Wazzan said, "This must happen! It must happen! "

The disagreement over the defense law reportedly revolves around the prerogatives of the Maronite Army commander and the jurisdiction of the Army intelligence section, which is also headed by a Maronite. The dispute has held up the implementation of the new defense law, which was drafted and approved by Parliament to make the Army more "balanced" confessionally and eliminate Moslem and leftist objections to the use of the Army for security duties in West Beirut, South Lebanon and other leftist-dominated areas.

It is this dispute which is believed to have hampered the implementation of a number of nationwide "security plans" worked out by President Sarkis and involving the use of the Army.

On the subject of security plans, Wazzan said: "If there is to be a security plan, I want to be responsible for it; I want to participate in its preparation. Otherwise, I would not be willing to bear this responsibility... We must have a security plan in the preparation of which I participate."

Answering questions about his relations with the various armed parties in Lebanon, Wazzan said he had "many strong friendships" among the members of the National Movement, Lebanon's major leftist alliance.

He said he had not met with the rightist (Maronite) Lebanese Front alliance, but he pointed out that he had discussed matters with some Lebanese Front MPs during his parliamentary consultations last week.

These MPs, he said, "wanted to place a special responsibility in my hands in my capacity as president of the Islamic Council. I, in turn, gave them a special message: that they must understand the truth of the Islamic position, through which the Moslems have demonstrated allegiance to Lebanon which is above suspicion. I asked them to refer either to their official, recorded speeches or to statements that they had made, and I requested that they abide by what they had said, assuring them that this alone would facilitate efforts to settle the situation. This nation can rise only on foundations of justice and equality, and we will accept nothing short of justice and equality.

"I said to one of them: 'I refuse to allow anyone to monopolize the honor of allegiance to Lebanon or the honor of defending either the territory of Lebanon or any national Lebanese issue. Let no one posture on these matters.'"

Members of the Lebanese Front, especially the Phalangist Party, have often cast doubt on the Lebanese Moslem community's allegiance to Lebanon and declared that the Front had singlehandedly defended Lebanon while the rest of the population watched.

On his relations with Damascus, Wazzan said he had always called for "special" Lebanese-Syrian relations, and he emphasized that he was ready to contact or visit Syria "when I find that the national interest requires" it.

On Lebanese-Palestinian relations, Wazzan called for coordination with the Palestinians "in such a way as to maintain the effectiveness of the Palestinian struggle in all arenas and at the same time preserve the sovereignty of Lebanon and protect Lebanon from harm."

At this writing on Saturday afternoon, Wazzan is in Baabda for what is generally believed will be his final consultations with President Elias Sarkis, and his sources say the members of the new government will be named after the meeting.

On Friday, he told me that Lebanon's democratic system "dictates a government whose members are drawn from Parliament, and this is what the MPs want. They also want each minister to have only one portfolio."

He added: "But the Lebanese constitution is flexible on this matter, and it allows the President and the prime minister to form a government of non-parliamentarians or a mixed government of parliamentarians and non-parliamentarians when the need for such a government arises.

"We are now in conditions that free us of all formal considerations as we all strive for the major goal of saving Lebanon. The salvation of Lebanon requires more than names. We hope that the men we choose will be as close as possible to perfection and to the ability to undertake the mission that will be entrusted to them in these difficult times."

I asked the premier designate exactly what that mission would be.

My question:

I know you don't like labels, but how would you describe your government? A "security government" that will concentrate on giving the Lebanese people security, as most MPs have demanded? A "national accord" government that will deal with all parties and try to bring them together? An "external affairs" government that will concentrate on improving Lebanese-Syrian and Lebanese-Palestinian relations? A "routine affairs" government that will focus on the day-to-day matters and avoid the basic issues?

That question gives the impression that we are after a specialized government, like a man who asks for a heart specialist or an internist or an eye specialist. The fact is that we are suffering from all diseases, and the government will govern with everything it has in terms of legal and constitutional power, using prerogatives which are limited by nothing but the constitution, the law and tradition.

A minister of health, for instance, must make use of all his prerogatives to improve the health situation and do his duty in that regard. The same applies to the other ministers.

Those labels were brought up by people who were thinking of certain conditions which dictate, for instance, special attention to the security that all the people need and demand; conditions which dictate the presence of certain people and forces that would be responsible for security. This, of course, will be taken into consideration, keeping in mind that the coming government will be a government which has full authority and is fully qualified to do its duty in all the fields that you have mentioned and in many other fields that you have not mentioned.

We are like doctors who must offer treatment for any ailment that they come across. Otherwise, we would be neglecting our duty to the nation and shirking the responsibility that we have agreed to bear in these difficult circumstances.

Are you and President Elias Sarkis in agreement on the basic issues that have clouded relations between the President and Premier Salim Hoss?

I am not new to the political arena. President Sarkis knows all my thoughts and positions, and I have even submitted written memoranda to him on the subjects to which your question implicitly refers.

I am not one of those who abandon their ideas, change their principles and shift their positions. But I am a positive man and I work to achieve everything that serves the interests of Lebanon.

Where the Army is concerned, our commitment to the memoranda that we have submitted stands, and this matter will doubtless claim a major part of our attention until we arrive at a conclusion that serves the national interest. We don't want something for any sect to the exclusion of any other sect in Lebanon. We want the welfare of all the Lebanese. We want national measures. We want the Army to have a national structure. We want the Army to be a model to be emulated by all State institutions, to take on the form that all of Lebanon wants it to take — democratic Lebanon, nationalist Lebanon, the Lebanon that wants to rid itself of the sectarianism that has so far hampered its growth and progress and is, indeed, responsible for the horrible situation in which we find ourselves today.

But are you in agreement with the President on the question of the Army law?

I believe the answer I have given you is enough. I could have given you more, but I would rather not go into the details at this stage — not because I don't want to commit myself or because I am afraid to express my views, but because protocol and political and national interest considerations dictate that I wait for the formation of the government before I speak, so that anything I have will be presented as part of the government's program and ideas.

Can we expect the full implementation of the defense law in the near future?

This must happen! It must happen!

Are you in agreement with the President on the question of the security plan?

To tell you the truth, we have read about so many security plans that we no longer know what security plan the newspapers are talking about.

If there is to be a security plan, I want to be responsible for it; I want to participate in its preparation. Otherwise, I would not be willing to bear this responsibility.

So you will prepare a new security plan?

I will definitely look into this matter. We must have a security plan in the preparation of which I participate.

Can we expect the deployment of the Lebanese Army in the commercial center of Beirut during your term?

I could have refused to answer many of your questions on the grounds that they are premature, but I'm afraid you would interpret this as my way of ducking the question, and I never duck questions.

But how can I answer a question about the deployment of the Army when I just told you that I want to take part in preparing the security plan? The plan I want has not been prepared yet, and I have not seen any of the previous plans, so I cannot adopt them.

But you must have an idea of the security plan you would like to have implemented. Could you give us an idea of the form this plan could take?

This is my first interview with your magazine, and I would like to tell you that I am straight in all my dealings.

I am not a technician, so I cannot prepare the plan myself. But when I ask technicians to prepare the plan, I have enough brains and reason and vision to determine the nature and the goals of the plan and to recognize its merits and limitations.

Are you in agreement with President Sarkis on the so-called "weapon of clear positions" — the weapon which Premier Hoss says has never been used by the executive authorities?

I know that the position is the position of the State, and anyone who feels he cannot go along with it must step down.

Do you expect this "weapon" to be used during your term?

If we consider positions to be weapons, then the mere announcement of a position dictates that the man who announced it either implement it or return to his home.

Are you in touch with Damascus?

I have not visited Damascus for some time. In the past, I have visited Damascus only when the national interest dictated a visit. When I find that the national interest requires direct contact with Damascus, or even a visit to Damascus, I will not hesitate one second.

How would you evaluate your relations with Syria?

I am among those who say that our relations with Damascus must always be strong. And this is not a new position on my part. I have stated it in Parliament, and you will find it in the records — especially the records of the period when the Permanent Lebanese-Syrian Commission was created. Anyone who reads the House's records of that session will find that I have always been a proponent of special relations between Damascus and Beirut.

Have you contacted the Palestine Liberation Organization?

I have not contacted them, but I have made contact with them, in principle, through my statements at the entrance of the presidential palace (after his appointment as premier designate). I believe that kind of contact is stronger than a direct telephone contact.

We support the PLO in its struggle to regain Arab rights in Palestine; we support it in its rejection of permanent resettlement and in every activity it undertakes in any arena toward the realization of these goals.

And if Palestinian activities have led Lebanon into embarrassing and confusing situations and sometimes into situations which have been unacceptable to some, it is our duty to coordinate with the Palestinians in such a way as to maintain the effectiveness of the Palestinian struggle in all arenas and at the same time preserve the sovereignty of Lebanon and protect Lebanon from harm.

What I'm saying now is nothing new. I have said it repeatedly in the past, and it is recorded in Parliament and in communiqués. As I said in answer to one of your questions, I will never change any of my positions.

Will there be any direct contact between you and the PLO soon?

I hope to contact all forces present in Lebanon.

What are your goals where the Palestinians are concerned?

Where the Palestinians are concerned, we have no goals other than the support of the Palestinian cause. Support of the Palestinian cause today carries a double benefit: a benefit for the Palestinian people, who have had enough suffering and dispersion, and a benefit for Lebanon, because there are some who want the Palestinians to remain in these conditions until they despair, abandon their cause and accept the idea of permanent resettlement (in Lebanon).

We must therefore help the Palestinians for nationalist considerations first, so that they will regain their country, and second to end their problems in Lebanon — problems which have spawned a Lebanese issue.

How would you evaluate your relations with the Lebanese Front?

The truth is that we have no relations with the Lebanese Front so far, although I did receive some MPs who belong to the Lebanese Front during my consultations with Parliament.

The Front has its own ideas, and the Front MPs with whom I met wanted to place a special responsibility in my hands in my capacity as president of the Islamic Council. I, in turn, gave them a special message: that they must understand the truth of the Islamic position, through which the Moslems have demonstrated allegiance to Lebanon which is above suspicion. I asked some of them to refer either to their official, recorded speeches or to statements that they had made, and I requested that they abide by what they had said, assuring them that this alone would facilitate efforts to settle the situation.

This nation can rise only on foundations of justice and equality, and we will accept nothing short of justice and equality.

I said to one of them: "I refuse to allow anyone to monopolize the honor of allegiance to Lebanon or the honor of defending either the territory of Lebanon or any national Lebanese issue. Let no one posture on these matters, especially after the lessons we have all learned and must benefit from in any future step to rebuild the new Lebanon."

Do you intend to meet with the Lebanese Front as a whole?

I have not thought of that so far, so I cannot answer you. But I believe that national interest will, at the appropriate time, dictate a meeting among all parties – not a meeting of meaningless sentiments but a meeting on the basis of unified principles on which we can build the Lebanon of the future, the Lebanon which the coming generations want.

How would you evaluate your relations with the National Movement?

As far as I am concerned, I consider myself a friend. I have strong friendships among the parties and people in the National Movement, and we hold many principles in common.

But I don't want to get carried away with this answer. I would rather have you hear it from them before you hear it from me.

Have you met with the National Movement?

I have not met with the National Movement, but I have been contacted by Mr. Walid Junblatt (elected president of the Movement, leader of the Progressive Socialist Party and leader of the parliamentary National Struggle Front). The members of the Struggle Front with whom I met during the consultations relayed to me Mr. Junblatt's greetings and informed me that the positions which they explained to me were adopted under Mr. Junblatt's guidance – which I consider very encouraging.

Once again, I don't want to get carried away. I would rather have the answer come from them, not from me.

You have not set a date for a meeting with the Movement?

No, but I believe in the need for direct contact, and this is what I said when I completed my consultations with Parliament. I said that I would now turn my attention to contacts with certain quarters with whom I believe it would be useful to confer.

What about your relations with former President Suleiman Franjieh?

We hold President Franjieh in great regard and esteem, especially in view of his bold nationalist positions.

And I would like to tell you – I have not revealed this before – that when I went to the North and visited (former) Premier (Rashid) Karami, I seized the opportunity of my presence there to contact President Franjieh by phone – first to ask about his health (for I had heard, with regret, that he was not feeling well), and second to request his support in the mission that I have been entrusted with. You are the first one to know this.

Do you intend to meet with him in the near future?

We did not discuss this. But I did meet with the parliamentary bloc led by Bakhos Hakim and the discussion we had was a clear expression of President Franjieh's views.

And as I told you, we will not hesitate to hold any meeting or make any contact which we believe can serve this nation. ●

BIOGRAPHIC DATA ON NEW MINISTERS GIVEN

Beirut MONDAY MORNING in English 3-9 Nov 80 pp 22-34

[Article by Lydia Georgi]

[Text]

Last week, this magazine introduced Prime Minister and Interior Minister Shafik Wazzan — lawyer, former MP, president of the (Sunnite) Islamic Council, member of the (Sunnite) Islamic Grouping and father of two children.

This week, the rest of the Wazzan government introduces itself.

Each of the 20 ministers of the Wazzan government was asked by Monday Morning to tell our readers who he is and where he stands politically.

Each was also asked to give a message to the Lebanese people about what he hoped to achieve in the government.

And each obliged.

This (in alphabetical order) is how Lebanon's new ministers — who may "help elect the next President of the Republic," as leftist leader Walid Junblatt told us last week — view themselves and what they hope to achieve:

Joseph Abu Khater

JOSEPH ABU KHATER, MINISTER OF STATE

His message to the Lebanese people: "I will devote myself to the tasks which are entrusted to me as minister of state. I assume that, for certain reasons, I will be asked to concentrate on the efforts which must be exerted in the direction of national entente. I will devote myself wholeheartedly to this mission, because I am convinced that entente is the sine qua non condition for Lebanon's return to a quiet life in an atmosphere of restored security. The very survival of Lebanon depends on it."

His place and date of birth: Zahle, 1909

His sect: Greek Catholic.

His political affiliation: As a political leader in Zahle, he says, "I was my own boss." In Beirut, he headed the "Chehabist" Nahj Bloc, the cluster of MPs supporting the late President Fuad Chehab. He refuses to say what party or political leader he represents in the new government.

His political career:

•In 1946, he served as Lebanese ambassador to Mexico (seven years), then Lebanese ambassador to Italy and Austria (seven years), then Lebanese ambassador to Egypt and the Arab League (seven years).

•In 1958, his diplomatic career was briefly interrupted when he was appointed secretary general of the foreign affairs ministry, after which he returned to his post as ambassador in Cairo.

•In 1950, he was a member of Lebanon's first delegation to the U.N., and in 1959, he headed a Lebanese delegation to the U.N. Earlier (1947), he had headed Lebanon's delegation to the UNESCO conference in Mexico.

•He served as minister of education in two governments headed by Premier Rashid Karami, from 1968 until 1970.

•He ran for Parliament in 1968, heading his own ticket, and was elected deputy for Zahle and Beqaa. He was not a candidate in the 1972 parliamentary elections.

His professional background:

•He received a law degree from Beirut's St. Joseph University in 1925.

•He had his own legal practice from 1925 until 1946, when he started his diplomatic career.

His marital status: He is married to Renée née Skaf (his cousin) and has one son, Ibrahim.

MAHMOUD AMMAR, MINISTER OF STATE

His message to the Lebanese people: "It is my hope that the Lebanese people will recognize the dangers besetting them, unify their ranks and rally around the legitimate authorities of the Lebanese State.

"As a minister of state, I will strive, first and foremost, to achieve a minimum level of security, to provide the day-to-day needs of the people, and to help implement the (announced) principles of national accord."

His place and date of birth: Bourj Brajneh, a suburb of Beirut, 1920.

His sect: Shiite.

His political affiliation: He is a member of the Independent Parliamentary Bloc and represents it in the government. He is also a member of the Higher Shiite Council which was founded by Imam Mousa Sadr, who disappeared mysteriously when he visited Libya in 1978, and is now headed by its vice president, Sheikh Mohammed Mehdi Shamseddin.

KHATCHIK BABIKIAN, MINISTER OF JUSTICE

His message to the Lebanese people: "This is a message of hope. After five years of suffering, the Lebanese people must realize that all we have gone through is nothing but a fleeting moment in the history of this country. Lebanon will remain, or rather, it will become better than it ever was, because the events that have occurred since 1975 will help shape our national character and our sense of brotherhood.

"In the field of justice, Lebanon has very ancient traditions. I hope that, with the cooperation of everyone, I will be able to give more hope to all those who are suffering. I will make a special effort to give justice a new face, particularly in the provinces and the remote regions which have often been neglected by the central authority. That, after all, would only be an expression of the

It is every citizen's right to have the State provide him with sound public health and, for those who are unable to pay, free hospitalization.

"This ministry is determined to exert serious efforts to improve the existing government hospitals so that they can play their role fully. In addition, we will work toward the establishment of new government hospitals and the strengthening of government clinics, so that we can cover all Lebanese regions and provide all citizens with the required health care.

"In this context, we will pay special attention to the health conditions of South Lebanon, helping the Southerners, who are suffering from daily Israeli aggression, to cling to their land and resist all forms of displacement.

"We will also endeavor to impose a medicine price list which will reflect the actual prices of medicines, and we will exert serious efforts to implement the decree for the establishment of the National Medicines Office, which can represent a sound solution of the chronic medicine problem.

His marital status: He is married to Soraya née Jawhari and has four children: Roukiya, Randa, Abderrahman and Rula (ages not provided).

FUAD BUTROS, FOREIGN MINISTER AND DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

His message to the Lebanese people: He would rather "leave this to the new ministers."

His place and date of birth: Beirut, 1918.

His sect: Greek Orthodox.

His political affiliation: He was a "Chehabist" — a supporter of the late President Fuad Chehab — during the Chehab regime (1958-1964) and the regime of President Charles Helou (1964-1970), as was President Elias Sarkis.

MUSTAFA DERNAIKA, MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE

His sect: Sunni.

MICHEL EDDE, MINISTER OF INFORMATION

"I promise the Lebanese people that I will revive the ministry of information, which now, for the first time in four years, has a full-time minister in charge of it. Information ministers have so far (since the war) held other portfolios and have therefore neglected the ministry of information. I intend to make this ministry a link between the Lebanese."

His message to the Lebanese people: "The word 'tourism' may draw a smile in Lebanon these days, but tourism covers everything: security, the environment, economic activity, the cost of living; in short, all the problems that directly concern every citizen today.

"Moreover, a ministry, in addition to being a specific portfolio, is a political function. We will try to undertake this function, with national entente as our main goal. When the Lebanese people can once more enjoy 'tourism' between the various regions and areas without danger or discrimination, we will have attained our goal.

"I hope to be able to give the ministry of tourism a cultural dimension and make of it a moving force for a series of youth meetings — meetings among the Lebanese and between them and foreigners."

I categorically refuse to sign any formality that is not strictly legal. I will not go beyond the law. There is no room in this ministry for those who are after commissions.

"We will adopt a policy of reward and punishment with the civil servants. I have asked them to work as a team with me, and not as employees with their superior, so that we can all render the services which public opinion demands. PARTY OF PROGRESS, SOCIALISM ANALYZES CURRENT CRISIS

Casablanca AL BAYANE in French 7 Oct 80 pp 1, 3

[Text] [portion of sentence omitted] October in Casablanca in its eighth regular session. On the agenda was a single subject: an examination of the general situation in the country and immediate tasks resulting from it.

After stressing the importance of the item on the agenda, Comrade Chouaib Riffi, member of the Political Bureau of the party and first secretary of the region of Casablanca, who presided over the meeting, yielded the floor to Comrade Ali Yata, secretary general of the party, who presented an important and exhaustive report on behalf of the Political Bureau.

The translation of the complete text of that report will be published in our newspaper beginning tomorrow.

The report made by Comrade Ali Yata is divided into four parts: an analysis of the international situation in the light of recent developments on the international scene; the evolution of the question of our territorial unity; the country's economic situation; and social problems.

We are publishing here a report on the work of the Central Committee of the Party of Progress and Socialism.

I. International Situation

Analyzing the international situation, Comrade Ali Yata stated that on the world level, the ratio of forces is on the side of the nations of democracy and socialism.

Socialist countries may naturally encounter problems, but they overcome them successfully. This is the case of recent events in Poland. The enemies of socialism have tried to exploit the situation in order to condemn socialism. Actually, the Polish workers did not give their strike political dimensions. They were not questioning socialism in their country.

We can only rejoice over the fact that the Polish people emerged from the test victorious.

Concerning the Third World countries and national liberation movements, the liberation of Zimbabwe from the racist yoke, the Islamic revolution in Iran and the revolutionary changes in Nicaragua are all pluses on the balance sheet of peoples.

In the capitalist countries, the working class is mobilized and in struggle facing increasingly acute problems such as unemployment and inflation. This crisis of capitalism is a structural crisis. But although the capitalist and imperialists are suffering blows, they still do not disarm and create hotspots of aggression here and there.

The following is Comrade Ali Yata's analysis of two main events: the events in southern Lebanon and the Iraqi-Iranian war.

Israeli Aggression Against Southern Lebanon

Having lost strategic points such as Iran, the United States and its allies are seeking to increase their number of support bases in the region of the Arab Gulf, which is of particular interest to them because of its oil resources and strategic position.

Having succeeded in bringing Egypt into their fold through Sadat's betrayal, they also hope to win Lebanon by dismembering it, by striking at the progressive movement linked to the Palestinian revolution and by liquidating that same Palestinian revolution.

This analysis shows that Lebanon's defense is not only the task of the Palestinians and the Lebanese, but the duty of the entire Arab nation.

In this defense, it is essential to rely on the union of Arab forces, transcending the contradictions that pit Arabs against one another or against neighboring countries.

Speaking of the situation in the Arab and Muslim world, Yata cited the action waged to free the holy city of Al Qods, which Israel wants to make its "eternal capital."

If we can but come to agreement on the slogan "Jihad," we are convinced that that watchword would be empty of meaning if turned against Israel without attacking imperialist interests, using all political, economic and military means, Yata said.

As for unity between Libya and Syria, we must be clear:

If we are zealous supporters of unity, we believe that it can come about on sound bases because past experience has shown that any unity imposed without the real participation of the peoples involved and without preparing the conditions necessary for success is doomed to failure.

Concluding on the Arab question, Comrade Ali Yata said that the success of the fight against imperialism requires the union of Arab forces and a distinction between our friends (such as the Soviet Union) and our enemies.

Iraqi-Iranian War

Since 22 September, Iraq and Iran have been at war and while it is difficult to verify the veracity of the military statements on both sides, one thing is certain: Losses in materiel and men on the two sides are substantial at a time when that energy is so sorely needed to free El Qods, when Israel is stepping up its attacks on Lebanon and when Iran is threatened by imperialism.

This war serves only the interests of imperialism and Zionism, as demonstrated by the obvious satisfaction of the Zionists.

If this war continues, it may give the imperialists an opportunity to destroy the Iranian revolution and to restore the old regime, as was the case at the time of Mosaddeq. This would truly be a catastrophe for the entire Arab nation and for the Palestinians.

It is within this overall context that we must view the war, not as if wearing blinders!

That is why the party expresses its grief over this war between two Islamic nations, both members of the Movement of Nonalined Nations, both members of OPEC, both anti-imperialist.

The conflict must therefore be stopped and the problems solved by negotiation, rather than adding fuel to the fire.

II. National Question

The question of our territorial unity remains the prime question on the national scene.

In this recent period, we have noted that attacks by our enemies are increasingly infrequent and none have been launched from the regions of the Sahara recently recovered by Morocco.

These attacks are made on uncontested parts of Morocco. They are launched from Algeria, to which our enemies return when they succeed in their action.

The POLISARIO Front therefore has no foothold in the Western Sahara.

It is Algeria that plans and directly supports this aggression aimed at our country, which is contrary to the rules of international law and against good neighbor conduct.

Furthermore, the POLISARIO mercenaries are not Moroccans, but essentially Mauritanians, Malians and Nigerians, whom the POLISARIO was able to recruit because of the poverty and famine reigning in those countries where they are doomed to certain death.

Although the POLISARIO Front has been able to kill some civilians and soldiers in these attacks, it is incapable of lasting success on our soil, thanks to the FAR [Royal Armed Forces] which courageously defend our territory. We take this opportunity to honor the memory of our martyrs and express our admiration for our courageous soldiers, noncommissioned officers and officers in the FAR.

Militarily speaking, the situation is therefore clearly in our favor.

But international opinion has its weight and a diplomatic effort must be made.

At Freetown, the POLISARIO Front was expecting recognition of the so-called SDAR [Saharan Democratic Arab Republic] by the OAU, but despite all pressure and corruption, the recognition never came because the voice of wisdom spoke.

Let us particularly mention the historic speech of President Ahmed Sekou Toure on the Moroccan nature of the Sahara.

At Freetown II, there was important progress for Morocco.

The SDAR was not recognized. Morocco was not condemned. The Polisario was only the 11th Saharan organization heard by the Committee of Wise Men.

The recommendations of the Committee of Wise Men included: an immediate ceasefire; the presence of a UN force (the "Blue Helmets"); the organization of a referendum (with maintenance of the Moroccan forces in the barracks and of the Moroccan administration).

The Political Bureau unanimously supports the idea of the ceasefire because it essentially concerns the POLISARIO and therefore, Algeria because Morocco is only defending itself.

As far as the UN forces are concerned, we do not see the need for such a presence because the Moroccans in the Sahara have already expressed their self-determination on several occasions.

Nevertheless, Morocco does not fear the referendum because it is 100-percent certain of the opinion of our Saharan brothers.

Morocco and Algeria are two neighboring countries and they have numerous tasks in common, such as their economic takeoff and industrialization, which are hindered by the unrest in the region.

Morocco and Algeria have duties vis-a-vis the Palestinian question and cannot perform them as long as they have not settled their bilateral problem.

The interest of the two countries, the Arab nation, the Muslim world and the supporters of peace is therefore to put an end to this situation.

Comrade Ali Yata made an appeal to the Algerian people and the Algerian leaders, particularly President Chadli, for reconciliation and a return to normal of relations between our two countries.

He also appealed to the FLN for a meeting of our two parties.

The same appeal was made to the Libyan people and leaders.

III. Economic Situation

The economic situation presents all the characteristics of a crisis. There has been stagnation since 1978 (beginning of the 3-year plan).

Despite the priority given to the agricultural sector, grain imports increase every year. Our party has already evoked the danger that this represents for the country's food security.

Whence the need for true agricultural reform.

Industrial production is stagnant, with growth amounting to the ridiculous figure of 2 percent.

Some companies have gone bankrupt, which has resulted in the laying off of workers and an increase in the number of unemployed.

Our trade balance still shows a deficit despite the increase in phosphate and unprocessed timber exports, partly because the higher cost of oil.

We must therefore think rapidly about solving our energy problems by using other sources of energy such as solar power and coal. We must also speed up exploration for oil.

Finances

Morocco constantly goes deeper into debt to pay back its debts. The IMF grants loans to Morocco but it gives "poisoned advice" to our country, such as the devaluation of the dirham, which hurts Morocco's interests.

Social Situation

It is also the IMF and the World Bank that "advised" Morocco to question the aid given by the government to basic products through the Compensation Fund. This dramatically affects the buying power of the masses. The PPS has demanded abrogation of these measures.

Comrade Ali Yata particularly noted three social hotspots:

Education

He noted the failure of the policy followed to date in the field of education. The spirit of the Ifrane colloquium could lead to the resolution of these problems.

Yata recalled the principles that our party has always defended regarding education.

Housing

Yata showed how the recent decision to lower the rent of wage earners receiving less than 1,500 dirhams is not enough to solve the crisis.

This does not solve the problems of the evictions or the rent problem for those receiving under 1,500 dirhams. This law in no way affects the interests of the big property owners who rent housing to those earning under 1,500 dirhams at inaccessible prices.

Finally, Yati recalled the solutions recommended by the PPS to solve this housing crisis.

Cost of Living

The increase in wages announced for lower-level civil servants will not be applied until next year and these increases have already lost all significance because of the inflation affecting basic products such as flour, oil, butter and milk.

The government justifies these increases by those that have occurred on the world market.

But it does not say why the rich are not made to bear the cost through direct taxes instead of taxing the meager income of workers through indirect taxes.

Where are those who speak of authenticity? Why do they apply the "imported advice" of the IMF?

V. Conclusion

The enemies of our territorial unity are waiting for Morocco to crack under the weight of the economic problems.

Our country's situation is not desperate. An improvement is possible if we condemn the liberal orientation and adopt scientific planning in a spirit of responsibility.

We must replace the men in government. We need hard-working men devoted to the people.

We need a minimum program on the basis of which the government should be named.

We must trust the masses and their authentic representatives.

We must rehabilitate the political climate.

The release of political prisoners and the return of the exiles is a positive thing but we demand amnesty for the 90 remaining political prisoners.

It is necessary to strengthen the domestic front and bring about a radical and overall change in the country's orientation.

A homogeneous government basing its action on a minimum program can save the country from the crisis.

Our appeal to a national pact fits into this framework because national unanimity must not be limited to the national question, but extend to other fundamental problems for our country.

We can save the country from the crisis, but on the condition that a sincere political determination exists in everyone.

That determination exists in the PPS and we are convinced that it is found in others. We shall do whatever is necessary so that it is expressed.

Discussion of the Report

The report made by Comrade Ali Yata was greeted by warm applause. The discussion then began.

The speakers all expressed their total agreement with the report presented on behalf of the Political Bureau by Comrade Ali Yata. They then developed certain questions, particularly concerning current tasks.

With regard to higher education, two important meetings are ahead and we must prepare for them seriously. They are the 17th Congress of UNEM [National Union of Moroccan Students] and the SNESup [National Union of Advanced Education Teachers] congress.

The question of the situation of the working class and particularly unemployment problems were also raised, along with numerous points concerning the national and international situation.

Comrade Abdallah Layachi, member of the Political Bureau and secretary of the Central Committee, then took the floor to emphasize the importance of the party's political and organizational tasks. In particular, he emphasized the importance of propaganda work concerning party positions and the partnership with the masses in order to study their daily problems.

Comrade Ali Yata concluded by emphasizing the importance of the tasks facing the party in the current phase.

Finally, the political report presented by Yata was approved and unanimously adopted.

Warm applause greeted the vote, applause that demonstrated the pride of the members of the Central Committee over the cohesion and spirit of responsibility characterizing the conduct of the session.

BRIEFS

BAKERS' STRIKE IN MARRAKECH--Modern bakery workers in the city of Marrakech are continuing the strike they launched at the beginning of this week. The workers' struggle is motivated by the arbitrary actions of the owner of the Al Manara bakery, who laid off a number of workers 2 months ago without reason. The strike could last until those employees are reinstated. Mobilization of all modern bakery workers is extensive, which explains the total success of the last strike that the workers launched, respecting their slogans in spite of intimidations and arrests made in their ranks. AL BAYANE supports the struggle of the workers of the modern bakeries in Marrakech and demands immediate reinstatement of those laid off. [Text] [Casablanca AL BAYANE in French 4 Oct 80 p 1] 11,464

KOOLI SEES NO DISTINCTION BETWEEN DESTOURIENISM, ISLAM

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 27 Sep 80 p 4

[Speech by Mongi Kooli: "There is No Distinction Between the Destourien Involvement and Religious Faith"]

> [Text] The party's leadership has set up a committee for Islamic thought and religious guidance. The committee, chaired by Dr Mohamed Habib Belkhoja, the republic's Mufti, which consists of an elite of clergymen, held its first meeting last Thursday at Party House in the Kasbah under the chairmanship of Mongi Kooli, party director and minister attached to the prime minister.
>
> In a speech delivered on this occasion Mongi Kooli pointed out that Tunisia, a Muslim country, as its constitution stipulates, is linked with Islam which, he emphasized, is one of the main characteristics of the Bourguibian system.

Bourguiba's Fight Is Based on Carrying High the Standard of Islam

The party director reminded of the achievements of the Tunisian state under the leadership of the Supreme Fighter in bearing the standard of Islam high and increasing its influence among the people's masses. This is a truth which should be clear to everyone, Kooli said. As a result of this the preservation of Islam and the constant and sincere concern for upholding the faith were, in fact, the very foundations of the struggle waged by Bourguiba against colonialism.

It is thus that ever since its creation the party has drawn its militant principles and moral values from the precepts of Islam to such an extent that it has made the protection and strengthening of Islam one of the basic objectives for whose implementation the party has never ceased to work both before and after independence.

It is in accordance with this approach that the committee for Islamic thought and religious orientation was created, Kooli added.

This will be a permanent structure whose role will be to work throughout the country for the implementation of a set of targets particularly related to the strengthening of Islamic authenticity and awareness among the popular masses, particularly among the third strata, and support of Islamic values.

Islamic Awareness Strengthens National Unity

Mongi Kooli equally pointed out that the party ascribes particularly great interest to this action, as it is convinced that the strengthening of Islamic awareness is the most effective support of national unity which we justifiably consider support of our overall development efforts, a development whose strengthening and preservation remain the party's main target. He furthermore noted that the society we are building should be linked with the Islamic religion and draw its spiritual values in the precepts of Islam, precepts which call for fraternity, harmony and goodness.

The party director emphasized the need to evaluate the religious situation in the country and establish a program of action essentially aimed at the young generations.

Winding up his speech, Mongi Kooli stated that the party will give the committee the moral and material support needed for the implementation of its mission. He specified that all suggestions concerning this structure will be considered particularly closely by the party.

"In our party," Kooli concluded, "we make no distinction whatever between the Destourien involvement and support of religion." He urged the members of the committee to focus their activities on establishing direct contacts with the people's masses throughout the country.

MZALI SPEAKS BEFORE SILIANA CADRES

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 28 Sep 80 p 4

[Speech by Mohamed Mzali to local and regional Siliana governorates: "Our Common Responsibility Is To Tell the Truth and Display Competence, Loyalty and Courage"]

[Text] Friday evening, Mohamed Mzali, prime minister and party secretary general, chaired in Siliana a work meeting attended by local and regional cadres. Also attending were Mohamed Chaker, minister of justice, and Lassad Ben Osman, minister of agriculture.

The meeting opened with a report submitted by the regional governor on the economic and social situation, emphasizing the measures which were taken to the benefit of the citizens and the success achieved in the region.

Having emphasized the feelings of the citizens who are pleased with the government's policy, the governor discussed the obstacles which hinder development in some sectors such as agriculture and the social area.

The prime minister listened with great attention to the statements by some of the participants. These statements, actually, reflect the positive response of the Siliana citizens to the choices and principles which the prime minister is tirelessly reasserting. They express the citizens' concern with the dissemination of a truly Destourien morality and of sincerity in managing citizens' affairs.

The prime minister was asked to provide an explanation of the concept the government has of the middle social class. Some spokesmen emphasized the need to proceed with an administrative reform and provide the young people with healthy civic and moral education and solid training in the various scientific and professional areas.

The regional cadres showed their interest in relations between Tunisia and fraternal and friendly countries, neighboring countries in particular, praising, on this occasion, the prime minister for his efforts aimed at strengthening such relations which would benefit the peoples of the Maghreb today and in the future.

They also expressed their loyalty to the Supreme Fighter and their support of his personality and principles. They requested the prime minister to deliver to President Bourguiba a message of affection and regards.

This was followed by a speech by the prime minister in which he stated the following: Allow me, first of all, to thank you for your fraternal welcome which proves, yet once again, the people's support for President Bourguiba. This is not my first visit to the Siliana area. My initial contacts with it date from before independence and, specifically, in the period of Franco-Tunisian negotiations for internal autonomy, i.e., before the triumphant return of the Supreme Fighter on 1 June 1955.

I recall making speeches in Siliana at that time on behalf of the party. I found here sincere supporters and was able to sense the authentic values of the region.

After the independence I have paid a number of visits to this area and have made a modest contribution to the development of a number of sectors.

Mzali added: Ever since the chief of state decided to set up the Siliana governorate, in 1974, the development of this area progressed on a new basis. Ever since then I have been aware in the course of my visits here of great achievements and steady improvements.

On this occasion I am visiting you as prime minister and secretary general of the party to study your concerns and aspirations. This visit, the first after my trip to Mahdia, proves the desire of the government, inspired by the will of the Supreme Fighter, to pay particular attention to this governorate and to similar governorates which have suffered so greatly during the colonial period and, consequently, were deprived of conditions for rapid development and prosperity.

The prime minister then emphasized the determination of the authorities to insure the overall development of this area despite our modest means. "In this we are relying on your enthusiasm, reciprocal help, the joining of your efforts, and your great loyalty to this area. I am firmly convinced that the essential prerequisite for success is found in the prevailing psychological climate and in the awareness of citizens and cadres. That is why I was pleased with the clear presentation made by the governor and, above all, by the climate of tranquility and serenity prevailing among the population in the area." I have the impression that your hope is being strengthened and that your enthusiasm is being revived. Everything becomes possible once despair and surrender are eliminated. Conversely, should the horizons narrow and prospects turn dark, nothing could lead the people out of their underdeveloped status.

The role of the party is, essentially, to engage in psychological work aimed at sharpening the will and enhance the feeling of responsibility of the citizens for the building of their future. That is what will be achieved in the future thanks to the dialogue and understanding between leaders and popular masses. We are determined to be in permanent contact with the people's masses and we shall never accept any obstacle to separate us as we follow this truly Bourguibian way. Success will be easy as long as the political leaders and the administration and the party members believe in what they are doing and pay proper attention to the psychological aspect.

The governor reasserted the concern which the leaders of the Siliana area show for the human element by the fact that they are aware of the aspirations of the people.

Whereas it is necessary to keep statistics and make accurate computations in the various sectors it is even more necessary to think properly. This can be achieved only if we consider man as the final objective.

The prime minister went on to say the following:

In our view, the causes of underdevelopment should be found. If they are rooted in man we must focus our attention on the human element and its development. Actually, Bourguiba's fight provides us with the best possible example, for, from the very first days of the national struggle, he focused his attention on the human element and was not satisfied with encouraging the planting of olive or almond trees, something which the regressives considered the best way leading to the liberation of the country.

Before focusing on the material aspects, Bourguiba turned to the education of the citizens and to promoting their awareness of their duty, for success in any action is the result of the relations of trust which exist between the citizens and the leaders. Ever since the country gained its independence, the party has tried to have the same behavior. It has refused to increase the number of useless meetings. It concerned itself with the real problems concerning the citizens, looking for proper solutions.

On a number of occasions I have recommended, in meetings I have held here, in Siliana, to pay particular interest to students and to the subjects they are being taught in order to determine whether the latter were consistent with our realities and with what we would like them to learn, and if they were consistent with their way of thinking, their state of mind and their patriotism. In our view, this is more important than the building of high schools, classrooms, or boarding schools.

We always call for close relations between the leaders and the masses. We have felt that such relations have been broken and that there is no longer a communion between them.

How many meetings have been held in the course of which some speakers have expressed everything but the feelings of the citizens and their concerns. This has led to a lack of trust. I recall, Mzali said in this connection, that in the course of one such meeting a citizen asked why was it that his son had not been given a scholarship. Told that he could not meet the annual income stipulation, he answered that the son of the cell chairman had been given a scholarship even though his father's income was far superior to his. This is merely one example among others. This is one of the factors which have led the citizens to feel that they alone are bearing the burden whereas the leaders and the cadres change the rules to the benefit of the leadership.

Once mistrust has developed between citizens and leaders, the latter would find themselves alone facing arising problems and would no longer be able to rely on the people's support.

I state this as a political leader who must play a role and whose responsibility as a politician is exactly the same as that of a physician, for the people, like the body of a person, could show certain symptoms, in which case the politician should provide a diagnosis and prescribe the best medicine even if its taste is unpleasant. As far as we are concerned, our only ambition is to see our people free from any disease, however minor it may be.

What I am telling you today must be said by any leader whatever the level of his responsibility may be, providing, however, that he is a competent and courageous physician capable of saying everything he thinks and prescribing the most effective medicine in order to cure the patient the moment the first symptoms have appeared and before the disease has worsened and triggered a catastrophe and upheavals.

Our joint responsibility is to tell the truth and to display competence, loyalty and courage. I can assert that the Tunisian body is healthy in its structures. However, for a variety of reasons, it could experience malaises. I state most frankly that, more than ever, we must be interested in the psychological aspect and improve the political climate so that every leader would enjoy the affection and respect of the people's masses.

I am pleased by what I have heard on the concern of the leaders to be in constant touch with the citizens in order to be aware of their problems and their concerns. I am equally pleased by the fact that the serenity of the citizens has been strengthened.

As I express my pleasure of meeting you, I would like to share with you my admiration for the inflexible will which inspires you to meet all the necessary conditions for resolving the problems facing the area. I can assert that the Siliana governorate and the neighboring areas will be the target of far greater interest in the years to come and, more precisely, in the course of the Sixth Plan.

However, human and material potential must be made avaialble to use the funds which will be allocated for the implementation of some projects. In accordance with the 1980 budget 600,000 dinars were spent exclusively to supply the Silinia governorate with drinkable water. This was caused by the lack of technicians and of the necessary material facilities. Therefore, it is imperative to eliminate obstacles, for good will and credits would not enable us to implement projects within reasonable periods of time in the absence of cadres or harmony within the administration.

Actually, I have spoken to you of the directives issued by the president of the republic in the course of the various meetings of the Council of Ministers he has chaired, in the course of which he insisted on the need to pay greater interest to the deprived areas in order to give them a new impulse which would raise the level of development reached by the coastal regions. This policy will be one of the main guidelines of the Sixth Plan whose target is the establishment of a proper balance.

Mohamed Mzali also pointed out that the development of agriculture will be one of the main foundations for the development of the Siliana governorate.

Along this line, the prime minister mentioned some features of the government's policy in the field of agriculture, emphasizing the determination of the government to help the small farmers and provide the necessary encouraging means which would enable them to play a proper role in the development of the economy.

He pointed out that an appropriate committee had been set up following the instructions of the chief of state. The committee examined the matter in its different aspects and was able to find solutions to the problems existing in this area. It is thus that we are contemplating the establishment of a fund by the Central Bank. This would enable the farmers to obtain loans from the different banks throughout the country.

Mzali noted that self-sufficiency in food products and the settling of the young on the lands of their ancestors was the target for the development of agriculture. If this objective is to be reached the farmers must be guaranteed substantial income. The agricultural areas must be developed and provided with the necessary amenities for a decent life.

The prime minister approved the remarks stated by some cadres on educational and cultural achievements in the area, the need for a balance between administrative centralization and economic decentralization, the status of women and the acquisition of basic knowledge on the environment.

Speaking of industrialization, Mohamed Mzali pointed out that the government considers this question vital and is promoting the multiplication of factories and the diversification of output. The government is also concerned with setting up such units in the various parts of the country, particularly in those so far deprived of industry.

He told the Siliana citizens that a certain number of plants will be built in the area in the next few years, specifying that the nature of these units and their deployment will be announced in the course of the next 6 months.

On this occasion the prime minister emphasized that, without denying the importance of industrialization, he believes that agriculture should be ascribed the importance it deserves, for extensive industrialization at the expense of agriculture yields negative results.

Mohamed Mzali went on to discuss political matters. He stated that the party is the essential motor of the country's political, economical and social life, and that it is responsible for the success of our development.

The Destourien cadres are assuming in the country the responsibility to guide the citizens. The next party congress, he added, to be held next May, will discuss and formulate the development policy for the next decade along with the characteristics and targets of the Sixth Five-Year Plan. It will also deal with some political questions, primarily those of the youth, the revision of the party's internal rules, the qualities which must be enhanced in the Destouriens, and the question of professional and territorial cells.

The prime minister expressed the hope that the congress will reach decisions and recommendations such as to strengthen the party, make it a militant party and avoid the infiltration of the party by careerists.

On this subject, Mzali emphasized that we want sincere party members who find their happiness in serving others and the superior interests of the nation, as President Bourguiba has taught us.

The prime minister called upon the new Siliana Coordination Committee Bureau to consider the political problems and realities in the area and to seek the ways and means to strengthen the party and consolidate its influence among all categories of the people of Tunisia.

Our party is a pole whose basic mission is to attract to itself all national strata. This is possible only by developing democracy within the party and, above all, democracy in electing Destourien leaders.

"Actually, I have drawn your attention to this truth. I have urged you to turn the congresses and the general meetings of all Destourien organizations into encounters in which you would ask the leaders to account for their actions with sincerity and courage. Should a leader fail suitably to fulfill his role or should he abandon the right way in the course of exercising his responsibilities, it is your duty to blame and criticize him, and to point out his errors at the general meetings of party units." I also recommend to the citizens and the Destouriens, Mzali added, to be guided only by their conscience in the course of the elections and to vote only for candidates who have proved their competence, loyalty, honesty and desire to serve the superior interests of the nation.

They must elect candidates who will enhance the party's prestige and consolidate its position with the Tunisian society. Our party is no one's prerogative. It is everyone's party. That is why I said that it is you who determine its success, for it is you who will be electing the leaders.

In the same order of ideas Mzali pointed out that the next party congress will consider the question of party districts.

We are against barriers separating Destourien cells from the Political Bureau, for the cells are the base, the foundation of the party and if their leaders are democratically elected the entire organization will be healthy.

He added that the party must be and always remain the conscience of the nation. Its role is to conceive, formulate ideas, control, and promote enthusiasm. In fact, it is responsible for defining the policy of the government and its orientation in the various areas.

Discussing relations between Tunisia and fraternal countries, neighboring countries in particular, Mohamed Mzali recalled his recent talks in Rabat, with the Moroccan leadership and, particularly, with King Hassan II of Morocco or the Algerian leaders, headed by President Chedly Bendjedid, emphasizing the esteem in which President Bourguiba is held by the leaders of these two countries who consider him the doyen of the fighters and the president of the Arab Maghreb. They have always needed his directives and his long experience. Mzali added that these talks revealed the will of all the parties to broaden their economic and cultural exchanges.

He added the following:

We shall unquestionably be able to face exploitation together. The day will come, and it will not be long in coming, when we will give the example to be followed by the countries of the Arab Machrek in facing the Zionist challenge, the hegemonistic aspirations and the deep penetration within the Arab nation.

On this subject, Mohamed Mzali stated that attempts had been made to Balkanize Lebanon and to divide the Middle East into ministates, such as the territory of the traitor Saad Haddad, which is an example, Mzali added. He called upon the Arab countries to resolve their differences in order to insure their self-sufficiency in all areas.

Mohamed Mzali emphasized that our cooperation with our Arab brothers should not be based on interest but on principles, for we believe that our common destiny, common history, common objective and Arab-Muslim ties are more important and more sacred than considerations of interest.

We have stated all this to our brothers who have felt our sincerity and loyalty.

Having recalled, on this subject, the talks between Tunisia and Kuwait and Saudia Arabia, recently held in Tunis, Mohamed Mzali stated that the two fraternal countries were entirely disposed to cooperate with us, believing that we are a fraternal Arab country which is sincerely aspiring to promote the good and development around it.

The prime minister emphasized the need to adopt an ambitious development policy without fear or hesitation and to rely on our own means and our cooperation with fraternal countries which have steadily told us of their willingness to participate in the financing of industrial, agricultural or financial projects in Tunisia.

Mzali recalled the agreement concluded between Tunisia and Kuwait and between Tunisia and Saudia Arabia on the establishment of important development banks in Tunisia.

He noted that such banks would make the necessary studies of development projects and their financing and will supervise their implementation. Their attention will be focused on governorates with inadequate resources such as that of Siliana.

Mzali added that the next development plan will be very ambitious, for it will open 65,000 jobs per year. This will enable us to eliminate the deficit which has developed in this area over the past few years, totaling an unemployment of 150,000.

Discussing Tunisia's foreign policy, Mzali pointed out that it is guided by the Bourguibian principles. On this subject the prime minister recalled the current war between Iran and Iraq and the efforts undertaken by Tunisia within the Security Council. He pointed out that that same day he had discussed the subject with the Iraqi ambassador in Tunis and reasserted Tunisia's concern for joining its efforts to those of the Islamic Conference, aimed at positive action.

He equally recalled the decisions of the conference of ministers of foreign affairs of Islamic countries, recently held in Fes, Morocco, and expressed the hope that the Arab and Islamic countries would succeed in focusing their efforts on the solution of the crises which weaken and disperse their energies.

JOURNALISTS ACCOMPANY POLISARIO MEMBERS TO MOROCCAN TERRITORY

Paris LE MONDE in French 22 Oct 80 p 7

[Article by Daniel Junqua]

[Text] Hassi Hafed Boudjemaa. When the POLISARIO took a dozen journalists, most of whom were French or Spanish, on a 3-day trip into the "liberated territories" of the Saharan Democratic Arab Republic, it had a dual purpose in mind: to prove that it effectively controls almost all this region which for almost 2 years now has been abandoned by the Moroccan Army and to demonstrate on the other hand that the present fighting is still taking place on the selfsame territory of the Kingdom in the oued of Draa. The demonstration seemed convincing to us.

We left Hafed Boudjemaa, 25 km south of Tindouf, on 9 October; and our convoy of five Land Rovers returned there on the 13th, after having covered 1,000 km. At no time did we have cause for concern, except perhaps during our bivouacs in Farsia and Haouza, in the heart of Saguia-El-Hamra, or as we traveled over the Hamada when immense clouds of dust were easily spotted from aircraft. On two occasions, at day and at night, the Land Rovers even traveled over the road laid down by the Spanish, a long, thin ribbon with a shattered embankment which snakes its way from Farsia to Smara over rocky plains strewn with rare tufts of esparto and thorns. Our drivers, with their heads wrapped in their turbans [cheches] and their eyes protected by huge motorcycle or ski goggles, in the absence of windshields, did not hesitate to use their parking lights and even their headlights. In passing, the combattants proudly showed us a plowed field which is to be sown with wheat and oats. For lack of tractors, the earth, which is plowed in long irregular furrows, was worked with the help of Land Rovers. Doubtless the Saharans have no illusions about the agricultural potential of their country; however, for these nomads the plowing of fields has a symbolic value. It bears witness to their desire to settle down.

The Ras-El-Khanfra Fighting

Our escort began to take precautions only when we approached the Moroccan border to enter the Ras-El-Khanfra region where violent confrontations have been taking place for a month (LE MONDE, 10 October). Ras-El-Khanfra, a small mountain in the first foothills of the Zini mountains, commands a valley which, through Abatteh, 17 km further along, gives access to Tan-Tan. That is one of the routes taken by the POLISARIO katibas to climb toward the northern part of Morocco. In this way they are able to attack the route which, along the coast from Tan-Tan to Tarfaya, permits the channelling of supplies, men and war materiel to the fortified triangle of Hagounia-Samara-Boujdour in the Western Sahara. This stronghold encompasses the capital of the territory, El-Aioun, and in particular the Bou-Craa phosphate deposits. With the city of Dakhla (formerly Villa-Cisneros) further to the south, these are now the only points in which Moroccan troops are established in the former Spanish colony.

"For this operation, which is designed to protect its communications routes, the Moroccan Army," we are told by Omar Hadrani, a member of the POLISARIO command council, "has engaged some 20,000 men who are in Abatteh under the command of Col Ben Othman. In August 1980, 12,000 of these soldiers were stationed in three positions spaced over 30 km, one in Saharan territory in Kreibichat, the second in L'Bouba, on the border, and, finally, the last in Ras-El-Khanfra, several kilometers inside Morocco. Following our attacks, the first two garrisons had to disengage between 16 and 18 September. They proceeded to reinforce the Ras-El-Khanfra garrison. We will continue our attacks; and we have already surrounded their command post and have destroyed heavy artillery batteries and Stalin organs."

Protected by a providential layer of fog which prevented aerial reconnaissance, at dawn our group was only 5 km from Ras-El-Khanfra from which point sounds of explosions occasionally reached us. The terrain, which was slightly irregular, bore traces on all sides of the violent fighting of the preceding days. There, scattered over several hundred square meters, was the wreckage of a Mirage-F1 airplane which was shot down on 21 September; further out, there were the blackened and shattered hulls of two armored troop carriers of South African manufacture. Our guides next showed us a huge Caterpillar bulldozer which appeared out of place in this desert setting. "The combatants seized it from the Ras-El-Khanfra positions," we were told by Omar Hadrani, "and they managed to bring it here. However, the motor blew up. We have already destroyed four of these machines. The Moroccans use them to dig holes and erect protective barriers."

Next we visited the positions in Kheibichat and L'Bouba abandoned by the Royal Armed Forces. Signs of the Moroccan withdrawal were visible everywhere. Individual foxholes and trenches, littered with canned goods, artillery and mortar positions strewn with ammunition casings and crates, overturned Land Rovers, burned tank trucks. Here and there, several mounds of freshly turned earth: "They are graves which we dug for Moroccan soldiers," we are told by a member of our escort.

"Who is Mopping Up [Ratisse] Whom?"

According to Omar Hadrani, since the start of this series of operations the Moroccans have suffered 600 deaths. "We have a good opportunity there to attack the best enemy units, the several thousand men who make up the spearhead of the Royal Armed Forces. We engage them before they have the time to reinforce themselves."

The mention of "mopping up operations" which, according to Pabat, resulted in the elimination of the POLISARIO in the southern part of the kingdom made Hadrani smile. "Who is mopping up whom?" he asked as he mentioned the successive withdrawals of the Royal Army. "As for the southern part of Morocco," he added, "it is being increasingly threatened, as has just been demonstrated by our attack on M'Hamed-les-Gazelles, near Ouarzazate, at the Agadir level." Later, on the road back, after the traditional meal: roast goat, rice and green tea, Hadrani, under the cover of a tent improvised from blankets, drew for us the lesson of the last meeting of the OAU in Freetown. "We agree to have a self-determination referendum," he said, "and a cease fire, on condition that the Moroccan army totally evacuate our territory. No consultation can take place under the threat of Moroccan arms. The OAU wanted to throw the King a last life preserver. He did not even grab it. From now on, our priority is combat to ensure the departure of Rabat's troops."

ARAB LEAGUE OFFICIAL DISCUSSES PEACEFUL SOLUTIONS TO MIDDLE EAST CRISES

Paris AL-NAHAR AL-'ARABI WA AL-DUWALI in Arabic 13-19 Oct 80 pp 18-20

[Interview with al-Shadhli al-Qalibi, Secretary General of the Arab League by Rashid Khashanah: "Al-Shadhli al-Qalibi Says Solution to Lebanon's Crisis Lies in Creation of Homeland for Palestinians; 'We Supported Iraq, but We Placed League at Disposal of Peace Efforts;' Coming Year Will Bring Beginning of a Solution to Sahara Dispute; We Do Not Wish To See a Setback to the Unity Between Syria and Libya; We Want It To Become an Example"]

[Excerpts] [Question] Did the aid formula which Arab countries can offer Lebanon through the league or unilaterally to confront the situation in south Lebanon begin to take shape after your negotiations with Lebanese officials and especially with President Sarkis?

[Answer] My recent visit to Beirut came in the context of the resolution that was adopted by the recent session of the league's council. This resolution charged the secretary general with making direct contact with top-level officials in the Lebanese government to study the situation, especially in the aftermath of the recent raids on the south, and to look into the possibility of helping the Lebanese state overcome the difficulties which it is facing.

And here I must say that the aid which the Lebanese government requests is what the Arab countries may offer collectively in the context of the Arab League. There can be no other aid. The Arab countries cannot nor do they have the right to propose formulas for this aid, be this aid moral, political, economic, material or financial.

We believe that despite the multiple difficulties that confront it due to various and interconnected factors, Lebanon can, to a certain extent, overcome these difficulties. These factors are basically foreign and are the result of the fact that the Palestinian people have been deprived of their homeland. They are also the result of Israel's various tyrannical acts in the area, both in the occupied territories and in the neighboring areas.

But there is no doubt that the final solution to what Lebanon is suffering from lies in allowing the Palestinians to settle in their homeland and to establish an independent state on their land.

However, we are not telling our Lebanese brothers that there is nothing we can do to alleviate the impact of the difficulties they are facing until a final solution is achieved. I believe that while we wait for this solution we can--in fact, it is our duty--help Lebanon check the grave consequences of the problems and obstacles that stand in the way of the state and its institutions.

This action depends to a large extent on the establishment of what President Sarkis calls the reconciliation. He had proposed a set of principles for this reconciliation in a famous speech which we regard as the foundation for everything that may be achieved in this regard and a point around which the Lebanese can rally. The starting point for any action which seeks to curb the problems that are becoming more critical inside the country must turn towards regulating the relationship between the state and its institutions, on the one hand, and the Liberation Organization, on the other. This means that any such step must take into consideration the requirements of the revolution, which we do not deny, do occasionally conflict with the requirements of the state. There is no doubt about that and there is no way we can avoid acknowledging it.

It is possible, nevertheless, to strive for what the Tunisia Summit had advocated and to organize or re-organize the relationship between the state and its institutions [on the one hand] and [between the state and] the PLO and the requirements of its revolutionary action on the other. But this in itself does depend to a large extent on the Lebanese reconciliation so that the people of Lebanon could speak with one voice.

It is, therefore, the duty of the Arabs to supply Lebanon with the assistance that Lebanon, as a state with united institutions and as a nation with united groups deems appropriate. It is thus that Lebanon can gradually regain its health and its strength, and it is thus that the state can regain its ability to assume its responsibilities in the various areas. Lebanon can thus adjust its relationship with the revolution both on the popular level and on the level of state institutions.

This was the subject of the discussion with all the officials I contacted, and especially President Sarkis.

Everything that we can do is being discussed within the league, all of whose members believe that all previous agreements must be enforced. The Lebanese state must gradually regain its ability to assume its responsibilities in all areas.

This, however, must not make us turn our attention from the real confrontation, nor must it make us forget that these are problems that the Zionist entity deliberately created and concocted here and there and wherever it can so that Arabs' efforts can be diverted towards them throughout the Arab homeland. For years we have been concerned with and we have been keeping up with the internal situation in Lebanon with growing anxiety while the real confrontation is between the Arabs and Israel.

We must all regain an awareness that must be aimed at three points:

* Regardless of its duration and its onerous consequences, the Palestinian presence in Lebanon is temporary. Palestinian presence will not turn into Palestinian settlement, not because the Lebanese people object to it, but because the Palestinians themselves refuse it. It is not in the interests of Palestinians even to think about settling in Lebanon.

* All leaders and commanders on the Lebanese scene must overcome the painful, daily problems. They must rise above these problems and look to the future. It is the future that will make it easy to overcome the difficulties of the present. In fact, we must endure the present while we forge the future.

* This is an extremely difficult period which Lebanon has been experiencing for 5 years. It is a period of various, onerous and painful ordeals for us. We call it a period of labor because Lebanon will emerge from it a united nation and an indivisible homeland. Peoples and nations are fused by the ordeals [they experience].

If all the leaders were to look at this future and if they were to look at the present ordeals with all the pain, hardships, and disasters they involve, they would realize that these ordeals are the melting pot in which all the groups would be fused. It is from this melting pot that a new Lebanese mentality will emerge and demonstrate the balance that we should have in the future. It is this that will enable the Lebanese people to forge their country anew and to make it stronger than the country which the treaties created 40 years ago. This is because the Lebanese people would have created a country with their own hands, with their own minds and with their own hearts. They would have contributed to the creation of a homogeneous entity that is headed for the future.

This is what I want to establish and to underscore in the minds of all our Lebanese brothers. There is no flattery involved here: what concerns the Lebanese people concerns the Arabs who are not indifferent to Lebanese problems. In fact, the Arabs are prepared to do as much as they can [for Lebanon]. Although it may be easy to determine what Arabs are to offer, it is not easy for them to interfere in the affairs of a sovereign state--a state that must remain a sovereign, independent and separate entity.

First and foremost, we must also all understand, whether we are Lebanese or not, that a solution to this crisis, like all [other] crises in the Arab world, has to be an Arab solution.

Iraq-Iran: an Islamic Solution

[Question] When the clashes between Iraq and Iran escalated, you did not waver in expressing your support for Iraq, "the Arab country," in [its efforts to] defend its sovereignty. Now that the situation has turned into a serious confrontation that threatens the area in its entirety, what is the position of the league [vis a vis the Iraq-Iran conflict]?

[Answer] Without any hesitation I would say that no one who is conscious of the dictates of his humanity can support war. It is to the Arab's credit that he can say--even though his interests and those of his homeland may be on the line because what concerns Iraq does concern every Arab--that man can find no reassurance in war. Man is [usually] forced to go to war, and he goes to war with a sense of bitterness and joylessness. Inasmuch as we did express support for our Iraqi brothers' demand for their rights before the onset of military operations, we now feel that we are all being called upon to find a peaceful solution that would safeguard the area from imminent dangers.

This is what we must say very clearly. If I were to say the opposite of that--if I were to say that I supported the war--I would not be faithful in the fulfillment of my responsibilities. [Such a statement] would not conform to Arab and Islamic practice or values. We are both Arabs and Moslems. The values upon which our civilization has been built undoubtedly include protecting [our] dignity and championing what is right.

But those values also require that we lean towards what would save the peace and what would strengthen good relations that are based on neighborliness. We do not want the disputes to get worse so that there would be no feelings of hatred in people's hearts that generations would inherit. There are many areas in the world that have suffered for long periods of time from the fact that hatred had settled in the hearts of people who are neighbors. This is what happened in the distant past between Britain and France, and it happened not too long ago between France and Germany.

We would not like such hatred to become entrenched between Arabs and non-Arabs in the Middle East. Although in the present situation our feelings make us sympathize with a certain side and undoubtedly lean towards it, we do state, as the guns are being fired, that relations between nations must be saved [from such rancor].

We must also take into consideration what may be a mutual destiny but not a common one.

[Question] There was an agreement between you and Mr Habib Chatty that joint efforts would be made to settle the Iraqi-Iranian dispute and to coordinate the efforts of the two organizations [in that regard]. A week ago you expressed the hope that the clashes would not develop so that the two organizations would not have to undertake that effort. Now that the clashes have developed, do the two organizations intend to mediate or to take part in settling the dispute?

[Answer] I believe that cooperation between the two organizations is very important under all circumstances and especially in this situation in particular. I did try to contact Mr Habib Chatty by telephone, but I was not able to reach him because he was on his way to New York. I did, however, ask the league's representative in the United States, Dr Clovis Maqsud to get in touch with him. Dr Maqsud contacted Mr Chatty and told him on behalf of the secretary general that the league and its office in the United States were at the disposal of the Islamic Organization. He told him that he, that is, Dr Maqsud, was authorized to act in accordance with what the two parties perceive to be beneficial and in accordance with the proposals made by the Islamic Conference Organization. With regard to this I was able to contact a large number of ministers of foreign affairs--I was unable to reach some of them--to consult with them about what we can do. Our opinion was unanimous at this stage at least that the appropriate background for interfering and mediating was Islamic. This is what we are now pursuing along with the United Nations which is working diligently [to settle this matter]. We are following the efforts of the United Nations with great interest and appreciation. These efforts are being carried out by the secretary general himself, Dr Waldheim and by the president of the Security Council who, fortunately, is a Tunisian Arab. He is a politician and an experienced diplomat, well-known for his know-how in national and international negotiations. We believe that the United Nations can do something now. In the final analysis it is the United Nations that will make a decision because a cease fire [that would be established] to pave the way for official negotiations must be made by the United Nations so it would acquire an official, decisive character.

We Do Not Want the Unity To Suffer a Setback

[Question] You talked with President al-Asad and with Mr 'Abd-al-Halim Khaddam in Damascus about the plan for unity. Do you believe that this endeavor is sufficient for facing the situation in the area, especially since the response to it in the Arab countries was not as positive and as warm as those who forged the unity had expected?

[Answer] We discussed numerous matters with both President Hafiz al-Asad and with 'Abd-al-Halim Khaddam. Chief among the subjects we discussed was the plan for unity between Libya and Syria. As an Arab League we cannot but give our blessings to every step that is taken to further the trust between two Arab countries or among a number of Arab countries. I know the comments that have been made internationally about this plan, and I am also familiar with the doubts that some observers are raising about the benefits of this step because of the numerous matters that separate the two countries. But I do believe that the reapprochement that will result from the plan will in itself be positive. It will be a political rapprochement--a rapprochement in the coordination of efforts--as well as a joining of forces and a solidarity in other economic and military fields. It is no secret that Syria is one of the most important countries facing the enemy and that it needs support because of its location. This support must go to Syria from all the Arabs; Syria is in fact receiving this aid regularly from numerous Arab parties, especially from the oil countries. The fact that Syria is receiving this support from Libya meets with the requirements of confronting the enemy. Consequently, we view this plan on two levels:

* An urgent level of supporting the opposition; and

* A deferred level. This [level] means that haste would not be necessary because haste will bring about disappointment, and we do not want this new experiment to suffer a setback and to be weakened by the same failure that weakened its predecessors.

Therefore, we believe that it is the duty of all of us and it is the duty of the Libyan and Syrian brothers to take their time and to proceed one step at a time so that they would establish those steps firmly and create this unity with the integration, the strength and the firm, solid foundation that it requires. It is on the basis of such a foundation that unity between the two countries can be achieved. If that unity becomes a good, radiant, credible model, it may become an example for others.

This is our view of the experiment in the immediate and in the distant future.

Weapons for the Arabs: Persuasion

[Question] According to statements you made, your negotiations with Yasir 'Arafat dealt with impending dangers to the Palestinian forces and with ensuring an immediate Arab reaction if Palestinian forces were to be subjected to any Israeli attack. What practical formula or formulas do you think can ensure a minimum of Arab confrontation that would be characterized by unity and immediacy.

[Answer] When we met with our fellow fighter Yasir 'Arafat, we talked about the efforts that all of us are making in the international area to persuade our friends that there is a question of a nation. What we always hear from our European friends is that the question is that of the people of Israel and the state of Israel. It is Israel whose security and whose survival must be guaranteed. Everything else is marginal and would only be viewed incidentally and occasionally. We are trying to convince our European friends that this view is lacking because there is another nation. We cannot tell them that the people of Israel do not exist, and since the existence of the people of Israel is their logic, we proceed from their point of view so we can gradually win them over and tell them, "You believe that there is a Jewish people who are the people of Israel. All right. But there is another nation in the same area--a more authentic nation--that was expelled from its land and condemned to homelessness for over 30 years. This nation's problem has existed since 1917, the day the Balfour Declaration was made and the Jewish throngs came from everywhere to buy land and to take it over by all means. Those homeless people do exist, and their existence cannot be denied. They will not accept fading away within the Arab community or blending with any other community. They have their own entity, their own identity and their own characteristics." There is no way for Israel or anybody else to hope that this question will be obliterated by settling the Palestinians in Lebanon, in Jordan or in any other country. This conviction has begun to take root in the minds of our friends, the Europeans.

We spoke about this effort which the organization and we in the league are carrying out; all the Arab countries are contributing to this effort. We looked into the dangers surrounding the area and especially south Lebanon-shelling the forces of the revolution and shelling Lebanese civilians so that they would emigrate to the north and create a vacuum in the south, thereby increasing complaints and unrest there. Israel is hoping that difficulties between the Palestinians and the Lebanese would get worse as a result of these hardships and disasters with which south Lebanon has been afflicted. This is what Israel is hoping for. Israel may be encouraging Sa'd Haddad to take over south Lebanon, making this a persuasive, indirect annexation. Israel may also be thinking about encouraging Bashir al-Jumayyil to announce the creation of a state independent of the original legitimate state. All these dangers are possible. We had to review them and to think about how we would react to them. I believe that the most important weapon the Arabs can use to confront these dangers is to remain united, not only because there is strength in unity, but also because the fragmentation of the Arabs would enable Israel to carry out maneuvers until problems one day become aggravated and avoiding them becomes impossible. The most dangerous threat to the area is for Israel to establish what Moshe Sharitt and Ben Gurion have been aspiring for: the creation of another state in the area on the same grounds upon which the state of Israel was founded. That state would then become the justification for the existence of Israel because it would have been built on religious and racist grounds.

This cannot take place unless the Arabs become fragmented, but if they remain united, Israel cannot accomplish such an operation. Therefore, one of the most important things that we must do is to close the gaps that have appeared here and there so that the ranks of the front which emerged in Baghdad and then in Tunisia would remain together.

It is thus that we can confront the enemy and the opponents and establish the proof that bilateral agreements with Israel are of no use because the Arabs reject them all and because the basic question has not been solved.

The European Friend Is Prepared

[Question] What is your evaluation of Mr Thorn's tour in the Arab region? Do you expect the European Common Market countries to undertake an initiative in the Middle East?

[Answer] Our evaluation of this experiment must take into consideration above all else my verbal negotiations with a number of European leaders. I was convinced in the course of these negotiations that our European friends were prepared to make a special effort to facilitate opening the roads to a real and just peace in the Middle East. We must welcome any action taken by our friends that would make a peaceful solution easier even though their point of view is not identical to that of the Arabs. This is natural because if a French man or an Italian thought the same way an Arab did, problems would come to an end. But the Arabs themselves do not always think alike on many problems. How then can an Arab and a French man think alike? It is therefore natural that there be differences and that we work to minimize them. Even if we were to disagree with our European friend, we must encourage him to come closer to us gradually by persuading him and not be exerting pressure on him. Pressure may be useful, but it is not beneficial under critical circumstances. Support can only be based on faith and conviction.

Although we may not be able to win them over, we believe that we can even persuade the Europeans who are not our friends to [accept] positions that are close to ours. They would at least favor neutrality, or their enthusiastic support for Israel would diminish.

There are various steps, and just as is the case with a musical instrument, there are many scales we can play. There is total support, and there is total opposition, and between the two there is a vast difference. We can take advantage of all the capabilities so we can strangle the enemy and render him incapable. The war between us and [Israel] is not just a war with airplanes and tanks. The time for such a war may come: it did in the past and it may come in the future. But before we resort to such a war and instead of resorting to it, there are many things that we can do before that: there are media, political and economic disturbances. We can use all the power, the influence and the means at our disposal to isolate the enemy and to reduce the supplies he receives from abroad because Israel survives on foreign supplies. If we can organize the Arab forces and the Arab energies on the U.S. scene just as the Zionists organized their forces in the United States scores of years ago, we will be able to confront the Zionist influence adequately. This is what we are thinking about now.

We must confront Israel with all the means that we have at our disposal. It was on this basis that His Royal Highness Prince Fahd called for a holy war. You will recall that I said [then] that a call for a holy war does not inevitably mean war. It would be naive to say that it meant war or no war at all. I said that war and nonwar were implied. Prince Fahd's call for a holy war has many other implications: the power of determination is among them. Prince Fahd's call was an invitation to the Arabs to resolve to enter into the battles and assume all the responsibilities. The second implication of the holy war is using all the means that we have and sacrificing ourselves and what is dear to us--and sacrificing what is dear to us before sacrificing ourselves.

We Count on Our Rights

[Question] Is it legitimate for the Arabs to count on the U.S. elections? What is the position of the league vis a vis the U.S. administration after that administration continued its absolute support for the Israeli position?

[Answer] We are counting on Arab rights and on the confirmation of those rights. We are counting on the fact that those rights can be understood in all the arenas. If we can influence European and U.S. public opinion, the U.S. government will follow the trend because political and social organizations in the United States make the government incapable of straying away from what is dictated by U.S. public opinion.

In this regard we cannot say that Carter or any one of the other candidates would be better.

The best thing for us is to continue the Arab effort on this basic arena, on all the arenas and in the face of all the powers that have influence and that can or must contribute towards the establishment of a just and peaceful settlement.

[Question] Military bases and facilities granted to the superpowers have become numerous in some areas of the Arab homeland. This implies a threat to sovereignty, a violation of the sanctity of Arab land and a violation of the charter of the Arab League. The recent session of the council of the league decided to charge you to make the necessary contacts to deal with this matter. How far have your efforts gone? Do you expect the matter to be raised at a summit conference or do you expect the achievement of uniform positions to be impeded?

[Answer] The answer is hinted at in your question. The council of the league did in fact charge me to contact the parties concerned, to conduct an investigation and to report about it. I have not been able to carry out this task yet because I have been busy with other matters. I believe I will have the opportunity as soon as possible to do what is necessary in this regard. This may take the form of consultations with all the Arab parties about what will weigh the scales in favor of fundamental Arab values upon which Arab consensus is based. It is these values that preserve the unity of joint action from disarray and fragmentation.

The Sahara. . .Next Year

[Question] The Arab Maghreb is still the scene of an armed struggle that lasted for more than 5 years. Recently, Arab circles have begun to sense a development in the Algerian and Moroccan positions that would permit the achievement of a negotiated settlement. Does the secretariat general intend to undertake an initiative in this direction?

[Answer] The work that is being done by the league along those lines is not always done publicly. We are not always concerned about the fact that the league's actions be reported in the media. This is because we believe that what is important is not to have people say that the secretariat general is doing what it is doing, but what is important is to try and to strive and to make an effort. For a year we have spared no efforts to move in this direction and to contact the two parties that you mentioned as well as other Arab parties that may influence this dispute. The information that I have now from various sources makes me believe that the coming year may bring us good news about settling this dispute in a manner that would be satisfactory to everybody.

What Egypt Is Doing Is Insulting

[Question] The council of the league decided to open four new offices at once for the first time in the history of the league. Your envoy also made intensive efforts in the countries of Latin America; these efforts yielded some positive results. Is the league about to undertake new diplomatic and media campaigns to explain the Arab cause to public opinion and to governments?

[Answer] This last session was an important one. I emphasized the positive features that characterized it in the closing speech. I want to emphasize this because usually the prevailing opinion is that a session of the league's council which is not attended by the ministers is not a very positive one. But this session established the evidence for the opposite [view] even though the ministers do give a session greater significance.

I would like to mention here that the council's business is carried out at the committee level. Among the traditions of the league is the fact that debates in the committees are always heated. Everyone who knows the league knows this propensity to a hot climate. This does not mean that there are special problems in that session, but it is usual for the debates in the league to be heated. This is an indication of enthusiasm and of the fact that matters are taken seriously. It is an indication of the fact that all are concerned about examining matters thoroughly and carefully.

The reports were positive with regard to financial aspects, indicating that the secretariat general had made efforts leaning towards austerity, tightening disbursements and avoiding what may not be exactly congruent with the law.

With regard to political action the political committee expressed its appreciation for all the efforts that were carried out by the secretariat general both on the Arab and international scenes, and especially with regard to the Arab-European dialogue and Afro-Arab cooperation.

The assembly has also made important decisions in political matters that are rather important. The question of Eritrea came to the league for the first time, and a decision is being made on this matter. This affirms the fact that the league always supports liberation questions. This is our duty, and it is one of the values we believe in.

With regard to Lebanon a decision was also made to send the secretary general to that Arab country and to entrust him with a political mission.

Also with regard to news that has been spreading about agreements on granting foreign bases in the Arab region, the council made a firm decision, and it also charged the secretary general with conducting the investigations that are necessary.

This session was characterized by firmness in all areas, and its actions were positive. The secretariat general, thank God, was appreciated for what it did accomplish in the various fields.

[Question] The Egyptian government has decided to resume the negotiations with Israel even though the decision to annex Jerusalem is still fresh on people's minds. A few hours after the Egyptian decision [was announced], Israel decided to establish four new settlements. What does the secretary general of the Arab League think of this direction which Egypt is taking?

[Answer] Notwithstanding my respect for the actions of every Arab or non-Arab government, I cannot say [that I respect] the actions of the Egyptian government. As an Arab citizen, however, I am deeply hurt, just as every Arab would be, by the fact that hardly did a few weeks go by after the Egyptian government proclaimed its determination to cut the negotiations unless Israel reversed its decision regarding Jerusalem; unless it changed its mind about settling Jews in various parts of the occupied territory; or unless it accepted fundamental matters regarding autonomy, but we were surprised by the fact that the negotiations were resumed. I do not allow myself [to express] an opinion on this subject. All that I will say is that it hurts me deeply, and that I feel somehow wronged as though we had all been insulted.

KUWAIT DECLINES TO JOIN AIDO

Beirut THE ARAB WORLD WEEKLY in English 25 Oct 80 pp 10, 11

[Text] Contacts are currently taking place between the Arab Industrial Development Organisation and Kuwait to persuade the latter to join the organisation following its change of name from "Center." The Chairman of the organisation's current session, Iraq's Minister of Industry and Minerals, Taher Tawfeeq, has been charged with persuading Kuwait to join the organization. Kuwait's attitude towards the change of name is that it neither retards nor advances the Centre and that what is required is a realisation of its aims and not a change of name. It should then be developed so as to become worthy of the name "organisation."

Kuwait was called upon to join the organisation at its first board meeting which was held in Baghdad from September 20 to 22 under the patronage of Iraq's President Saddam Hussein. Kuwait was absent from the meeting due to her reservations about the change of name. It was decided at the September session to form a five-man committee led by Iraq's Minister of Industry and Minerals and consisting of experts from the Arab League, the Arab Industrial Development Organization, OAPEC and the Gulf Industrial Investments Organisation. This committee was given the right to refer to any Arab exports in its assignment to draw up the internal structure of the organisation's various bodies.

The organisation's first board meeting also examined the cooperation existing between it and the Arab Fund for Economic and Social Development and called for close cooperation with all Arab organisations. The problems arising from the lack of expertise in the organisation were evaluated, and attributed to the moving of its headquarters from Cairo to Tunis and then to Baghdad.

The board saw the need to fortify the local expertise available with Arab expertise both within the Arab nation and abroad, so as to do away with the need to resort to foreign experts as far as possible. It stressed the need for the organisation to complete all the activities it has begun, giving priority to conducting regional survey which will serve the economic development strategy decided upon by the Arab Economic Council at its last meeting in Amman.

The board also expressed the belief that the transitional period that has been estimated at six months will be sufficient to prepare for the establishment of an Arab information bank. It also approved a budget for the organisation of US $3,053,559 for the coming year.

TRADE WITH YUGOSLAVIA--Kuwait has agreed to lend Yugoslavia $250 million to help it boost its foreign currency reserves, it was announced in Belgrade; officials there said that the loan agreement was signed by the National Bank of Yugoslavia, but they did not identify the Kuwaiti state corporation which they said made the loan, nor did they disclose any other details. Economic relations between the two countries have until now been insignificant: the loan is worth more than 10 times the entire value of two-way trade in 1979. Yugoslavia's chief oil supplier is Iraq, which exported $514 million worth of crude and other goods and services in 1978 and $806 million worth last year; Iraq's trade surplus with Yugoslavia rose in the same period from $359 million to $586 million. Iraq accounted for more than 60 per cent of Yugoslavia's trade with OPEC countries last year. With the rest of the Arab world, Yugoslavia has enjoyed a small but healthy trade surplus: exports, worth $374 million in 1978, were up to $451 million last year, while imports jumped from $147 million to $249 million. Overall, however, Yugoslavia suffers from a serious balance of payments, deficit, which increased from $4.23 billion in 1978 to $6.12 billion last year, and it has been seeking loans from a number of Western countries, as well as oil-exporting nations and the USSR to make up some of this gap. ZIA: 'SOVIET TROOPS LACK WILL TO FIGHT'

Karachi BUSINESS RECORDER in English 1 Nov 80 p 5

[Text]

LONDON, Oct. 31: A top leader of the Afghanistan resistance has said that 120,000 Soviet troops are fighting with the Mujahideen in that country.

Hamid Nasser Zia, Deputy Leader of the National Islamic Front of Afghanistan (NIFA), told the General Affairs Committee of the Western European Union (WEU), which links Britain to the six founder members of the European Economic Community for defence purposes, that a Russian political opposition group, N.T.S., has jointly with the National Islamic Front signed leaflets in the Russian language which have been distributed in thousands in many of the major cities of Afghanistan. This has added "an ideological dimension" to NIFA's operations.

The General Affairs Committee of the WEU, which met in London was told by Zia that now there were 120,000 Soviet troops in Afghanistan, but they "lack the will to fight."

The first Soviet units, mainly from the central Asian republics, were withdrawn because the young central Asian conscripts "proved to be of poor resolve and stamina." But even the recent seasoned troops "are proving to be of poorer quality than expected."

He rediculed the belief in certain Western quarters that the combination of Western economic sanctions and political pressure is worrying the Russians. They worry "about the Mujahideen," not about who wont sell them wheat. They worry about how to keep their casualties hidden from the peoples.

To give an idea of the Soviet casualties in Afghanistan, Zia recalled a recent report by an Afghan nurse, who worked in an hospital in Kabul. She had reported that an average of 25 to 30 Soviet soldiers a week died there.

The Afghan people, too, were paying a high price for their resistance to the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan, he went on. Six recognised groups are fighting the "enemy" and their "political differences" are not causing the resistance any problem "the Afghan people are 100 per cent united in the face of the enemy."

"The progress that NIFA can report at this time is that our forces are becoming ever more effective within the cities in their disruptive activities, especially in Kabul.

The outer sections and suburbs of Kabul were now controlled by the resistance, and the NIFA is running the judiciary and administration in many parts of the country.

He urged the WEU to ask their governments "to practically and constructively support the Afghan resistance." The destiny of the free world will be decided in Afghanistan. If the West does not take constructive action today, how will it be morally capable of resisting further Soviet expansionism?

The assembly of the WEU is meeting in Paris this December, when it will "examine the possibility of full financial and other assistance to the Afghan resistance movement until the USSR proves it is ready to negotiate withdrawal of its forces from Afghanistan," according to a spokesman of the union.—IINA.

MANAGEMENT OF AFGHAN REFUGEES BEING REORGANISED

Karachi BUSINESS RECORDER in English 1 Nov 80 p 5

[Text]

ISLAMABAD, Oct. 31: The Government has initiated a plan to reorganise the management of Afghan refugees in view of their continuing influx.

An official spokesman told Radio Pakistan, here today that the number of Afghan Refugees in Pakistan has now reached about 1.2 million of this over 9,50,000 are in NWFP, two lakh in Baluchistan, 22,000 in Punjab and 1000 in Sind and Azad Kashmir.

The spokesman said that the problem has assumed enormous proportions not only in unprecedented increase in refugee population, since the Soviet military intervention in Afghanistan but the number of their camps itself had more than double.

He said in view of the large scale multi-dimensional problem the entire organisation for Afghan refugees especially at lower tiers has been revised and strengthened.

Under the new plan, every camp to be called a tentage... village, would contain only 5000 refugees or 1000 families. Thus the villages are now to be more than 200 in NWFP and 40 in Baluchistan. Five villages will form a district or an agency.

The spokesman said that the better qualified personnel will be detailed to make the plan here attuned to the new situation.

It will speed up the distribution of food supply, medical supplies and social services to the refugees in order to alleviate their plight.

AFGHANS MAY FACE HEALTH, FOOD PROBLEM IN COMING WINTER

Karachi BUSINESS RECORDER in English 4 Nov 80 p 6

[Text]

PARIS, Nov 3: Famine and disease thraten to follow in the wake of war this winter in the mountains of Afghanistan, according to two French doctors who have just spent two months in the north-eastern province of Nuristan.

Frederic Tissot and Daniel Parisot, of the Organisation International Medical Aid (AMI), said that the fighting between Soviet troops and Afghan guerrillas coupled with the still increasing exodus of refugees, has meant that almost no crops have been cultivatd.

Animal food is almost non-existent and a large proportion of the livestock has been killed by anti-personnel mines dropped by Soviet helicopters, the doctors said.

While the severe winter, which has already begun in Nuristan, poses severe food problems there for women and children in particular, in more central regions such as Hazaradjat which are not traditionally self-sufficient there is a real risk of famine, the doctors added.

The medical picture is no brighter, with no Afghan doctors left in a region where there was one for every 100,000 population in 1978. Nor can local people go to Kabul for treatment as the road is out and regularly bombed.

The only aid now comes from volunteer medical teams from French organisations such as AMI, Doctors Without Frontiers and Doctors of the World, but even they have only about 10 doctors to cover the whole frontier region.

The team of doctors Parisot and Tissot was led into Afghanistan by a local chieftain. It took with it some 600 kilos (1,320 pounds) of medical supplies and light surgical equipment.

In Nuristan the doctors trained local nurses and cared for the sick as well as those wounded in the war. They said the fighting was still fierce, with Afghan Government troops penetrating into the valleys with the support of armour and Soviet helicopters to carry out combing operations.—AFP.

FOUR AFGHAN TRIBES JOIN MUJAHIDEEN

Karachi DAWN in English 1 Nov 80 pp 1, 10

[Text]

NEW DELHI, Oct 31: Four Afghan tribes were reported to have joined forces to surround an Afghan Soviet column of tanks in the Logar valley south of Kabul, diplomatic sources said here yesterday.

They named the tribes as the Logaris, Mangals, Jajis and Zadrans. But no details of the combined operation were immediately available.

The sources said there had been some air activity over Kabul in the past week. But that combat helicopters were heading mainly towards the Logar valley and Ghazni city about 11 km. south of the Afghan capital.

Senior Afghan Government and party leaders visited Ghazni last Monday.

Clashes were also reported from Charikar, Pauli Khumri and Gurbahar, north of Kabul, according to the sources.

They said fighting in the provinces had resulted in a shortage of firewood in Kabul.

The price of firewood had increased since last winter and was now beyond the means of most Afghans who used it for cooking and heating, they said.

The sources said conscription was still being severely enforced "on the streets in shops, public bars and houses".

Kabul Radio monitored in New Delhi repeated an amnesty offer this week to young men who had failed to turn up for service, saying they would be exempt from punishment if they reported for duty before November 7.

Residents of Kabul, hit in the past by shortages of some food items and fuel, now face the rugged Afghan winter with a shortage of firewood, a diplomatic source said in New Delhi Thursday.

The price of firewood in the capital had more than tripled over what it was two years ago, rising from the equivalent of about 2.64 US dollars for a Kharwar (1.232 pounds) to about 8.50 dollars, said the source, who asked not to be identified.

Wood is used both for cooking and heating in Afghanistan, but the current price makes it far too expensive for the average Afghan, the source said.

Last winter the Government brought truckloads of wood from the forests to the capital in a large convoy protected against anti-Government guerilla attack, and that supply brought the price down to about 5.76 dollars per Kharwar, the source said. He added that there were fears that there could be trouble in Kabul this winter if the Government does not do the same again.

Winter already has begun in this rugged, landlocked Asian country with snowfalls on Tuesday and Wednesday blanketing the mountains.

A top leader of the Afghanistan resistance has said that 1,20,000 Soviet troops are fighting with the Mujahideen in that country, reports IINA correspondent.

Mr Hamid Nasser Zia, deputy leader of the National Islamic Front of Afghanistan (NIFA), told the General Affairs Committee of the Western European Union (WEU), which links Britain to the six founder member of the European Economic Community for Defence purposes, that a Russian political opposition group, at N.T.S. has jointly with the National Islamic Front signed leaflets in the Russian language which have been distributed in thousands in many of the major cities of Afghanistan. This has added "an ideological dimension" to NIFAs operations.

To give an idea of the Soviet casualties in Afghanistan, Mr Zia recalled a recent report by an Afghan nurse, who worked in an hospital in Kabul. She had reported that an average of 25 to 50 Soviet soldiers a week died there and that only top Afghan officers were admitted to the hospital.

The progress that NIFA can report at this time is that our forces are becoming ever more effective within the cities in their disruptive activities, especially in Kabul, were the main fuel storage tanks were blown up, the general heading the KGB was assassinated, and key members of Afghan Communist Party were killed. The Soviet and Afghan troops are now only able to control the centre of the city."

The outer sections and suburbs of Kabul were now controlled by the resistance, and the NIFA is running the judiciary and administration in many parts of the country.

Japanese Foreign Minister Masayoshi Ito yesterday called for consultations by Japan the United States and the nine countries of the European Community on the future of their economic sanctions against the Soviet Union.

Mr Ito said there was a lack of unity in the stands taken by the US, Japan and the EEC countries on the sanctions, which were imposed following Soviet intervention in Afghanistan.—Reuter/IINA.

Some of the leaders of the nationalist groups are reported to have gone underground to mobilise forces against the present government. It may be mentioned here that the nationalist forces of Afghanistan have also formed a Pakhtoonkhwa Revolutionary Front against the Babrak regime.

The Afghan youths, the sources said, have recently formed another resistance group called the Islamic Freedom Front in Gardez province. It consists of young men who have no political affiliation with any political party. Mr. Zabihullah Mujaddi, the chief of the front, recently contacted the other nationalist forces in Afghanistan to bring the youth on one platform.

Mr. Gailani, who heads the National Islamic Front of Afghanistan, said his movement had an urgent need notably for food, medicine, anti-tank weapons and air defence system and would accept help "from any quarter, provided, there are no strings attached."

Mr. Gailani, who was speaking at a Press conference, charged the West with having turned its back on Afghan resistance which he described as "a rampart of the West and Islam".

SOVIET AMMUNITION CONVOY REPORTED DESTROYED

Lahore THE PAKISTAN TIMES in English 2 Nov 80 pp 1, 5

[Text]

NEW DELHI, Nov 1. Afghan guerillas destroyed a Soviet ammunition convoy, killed at least 45 Communist Party members and burned down a large primary school in raids on north and south of Kabul in the past week, a report from Afghanistan said today.

The guerillas raid last Monday night on the convoy near Sange Niwishta Pass 37 kilometres south-east of Kabul, prompted Soviet punitive air attacks against "very moving thing" in the villages of Logar province, killing hundreds of civilians, said the report from a source that in the past has been reliable.

Guerillas losses were not given in the raid south of Kabul but 15 to 17 Mujahideen were reported killed in strikes in the past week against police posts and a party office at Karte Parwan in the northern suburbs of Kabul. The report said the guerillas seized weapons and killed 30 members of the Ruling Peoples Democratic (Communist) Party.

Guerillas also killed 15 party members attending a gathering in a private home at Charikar, the Parwan provincial capital, 60 kilometers north of Kabul during the week, the report said.

The specific raids were not independently confirmed, but diplomatic reports reaching here have also mentioned fighting in the same areas.—APA.

COFFIN FACTORY FOR RUSSIANS IN KABUL REPORTED

Lahore THE PAKISTAN TIMES in English 3 Nov 80 p 4

[Text]

KARACHI, Nov. 2: A new factory making 300 coffins a day for the dead Russians has been set up recently in Kabul, besides a special cemetery, 'Beijing Review' disclosed in a recent issue.

It said Russian casualties are mounting with the escalation in the fighting and shipping the coffins back to the Soviet Union is having a demoralising effect so the dead are now being buried in Afghanistan.

Beijing Review further disclosed that the Russians are trying to get out of the fix they have got themselves into when they rolled into Afghanistan, by stepping up operations against the resistance fighters and by trying to put their stooge in Kabul more firmly in the saddle.

Since early July, they have been pouring in more troops and equipment into Afghanistan. Reports now put Soviet troop strength at 1,20,000, a 30,000 increase over earlier estimates. The Russians are revising their battle tactics, too, after being frustrated by stubborn guerilla resistance. Divisions are being divided into four to five detachments of 2,500 to 3,000 men each to be more responsive to guerilla attacks.

The stepped-up Soviet military suppression is coupled with political moves to weaken Afghan resistance. But neither Soviet bullets nor Karmal's promises are producing the results the Soviet Union hopes for, the Paper said.—PPI.

REPORTER ANALYZES RELATIONS WITH SOVIET UNION

Kabul NEW TIMES in English 27 Oct 80 p 3

[Text] The reporter of the Kabul News Times has carried out the following interview with Eng. Shaheen, President of Afghan CART Company, in connection with Babrak Karmal's visit to the Soviet Union and the long-standing relations between Afghanistan and Soviet Union:

Recalling his observations, and his constructive memories during his recent visit to the Soviet Union, Eng. Shaheen said:

It was my second visit to the USSR. My first visit took place in the land of Great October Revolution when I went there to receive higher education.

In the course of several years of study in the Soviet Union, I found out that the Soviet people are prosperous, they work hard and are energetic. They are patriotic and they enjoy their life as they have everything. The Soviet people do not worry about the future of their children. All these happiness and prosperity are the results of the bloody and long struggles of the heroic Soviet people.

After the victory of the Great October Revolution, the Soviet people for the first time in the world raised the banner of working people, putting an end to the satanic rule of tsarism.

V. I. Lenin, sent a message to Ghazi Amanullah Khan, recognising the independence of Afghanistan. Since then the friendly relations between Afghanistan and Soviet Union are increasingly developing and getting further consolidated on the basis of peaceful co-existence.

In the past 62 years this friendship has stood the test of time.

The presence in Afghanistan of Soviet limited military contingent, at the request of DRA Government, to defend the gains of the Saur Revolution and especially its new evolutionary phase, and ward off the foreign aggression, and finally foil the plots and conspiracies of foreign enemies, led by US imperialism in collusion with regional reaction and Pakistani militaristic circles, Chinese hegemonists and Arab reaction, is a vivid example of Soviet profound friendship with Afghanistan.

With the victory of the Saur Revolution the people of Afghanistan were freed from the yoke of imperialism and now Afghanistan is placed along the front of peaceful and progressive forces of the world. The nature of our national democratic revolution, brings us further closer with the progressive forces of the world. Now, Afghanistan is able to make use of the experiences of friendly Soviet Union for building blossoming Afghanistan. The Soviet Union, as real friend of Afghan people, has refrained from no disinterested assistance to Afghanistan. There are scores of examples of assistance of Soviet Union to Afghanistan and one can name the Naghlu hydro-electric power station. Ghaziabad and Hadda farms, Kabul Polytechnic Institute, Jangalak technicum and that of Mazare Sharif, Kabul Airport and etc. as example of economic and technical cooperations of the USSR to Afghanistan. Only, recently the Soviet Union gave Afghanistan a hundred million roubles grant-in-aid in forms of clothings and other essentials which are being still distributed to the deserving people.

The past treacherous regimes, especially Amin, the traitor, wanted to undermine the friendly and fraternal relations between the two countries, however, they failed to achieve their vile designs.

Despite the plots and conspiracies and even armed interventions of 14 imperialist countries as well as civil wars, incited by imperialism, the Soviet people, in the light of socialism, were able to build a strong Soviet Union from under the war debris. Now, the achievements made by the Soviet Union in all walks of life are eye-catching.

After the victory of the Great October Revolution, all Soviet people had the opportunity to take equal part, without any discrimination, in building their society. Due respect was paid to the desirable traditions of the people as well as to their culture. The Soviet Union is a vast and multinational country, yet it has preserved its national prides.

The relations between Afghanistan and Soviet Union are based on principle of peaceful coexistence, equality of rights, respect to each other's national sovereignty and territorial integrity as well as mutual cooperation and non-interference in each other's internal affairs. It is in the framework of this policy that Afghanistan was and is able to make effective use of fraternal and all-sided cooperations of Soviet Union in political, economic, cultural and social spheres.

The Soviet people are staunchly loyal to this friendship. I was personally witness that Afghans in the Soviet Union were treated like brothers and they profoundly respect the Afghans tranditions, customs and religion. The common religion between our Moslem people and Moslems in the Soviet Union has further consolidated our relations.

I am confident that with the help of noble people of Afghanistan and leadership of PDPA and with the disinterested assistance of Soviet Union, we will overcome all our problems, concluded Eng. Shaheen.

KABUL MAY SEAL BORDERS WITH PAKISTAN, IRAN

Islamabad THE MUSLIM in English 1 Nov 80 p 1

[Article by Qaisar Butt]

[Text] Islamabad, Oct. 31--The foreign troops in Afghanistan have been seen moving towards borders with Pakistan and Iran, to launch pre-winter offensive against freedom fighters, an eye-witness told this correspondent who visited North Waziristan, the Pak-Afghan border area recently.

The witness who crossed over the border said the situation prevailing inside Afghanistan was likely to force the Kabul Government to seal its borders with neighbouring countries.

The Russians are conscious that during the winter season guerilla warfare becomes more effective. The cold weather, the source said, would create more difficulties for Afghan troops posted at various installations, like powerhouses and telecommunication poles, air bases and border check posts.

The source said that Kabul authorities would also attempt to prevent the Afghan refugees and other persons from crossing over to Pakistan and Iran.

This correspondent also visited the Tribal border of Waziristan, where six Afghan gunship helicopters had carried out an attack last week. The source said the Afghan government was very unhappy with the Zardan tribesmen of the Paktia province where the Afghan Minister of Tribal Affairs Faiz Mohammad and his two companions Bakhtiar and Mian Habib were assassinated by the Afghan fighters last month. The Afghan Minister had gone to the tribesmen to ask them to lay down their arms. The Afghan Minister also allegedly attempted to bribe the fighters with cash and other facilities.

The Afghan government is reported to have asked the Zardan tribe to hand over the murderers to the government. According to the source, the tribesmen are defying the orders and are continuing the struggle against the Afghan government.

The source said that most of the refugees, who were target of Afghan gunship helicopters attack, belonged to the Zardan tribe. The tribesmen of Zardan area are of the view that the attack was intended to harass the tribal belt people who have been supporting the cause of Afghan Mujahideen.

NATIONALIST FRONT AGAINST KARMEL

Islamabad THE MUSLIM in English 3 Nov 80 p 1

[Article by Qaiser Butt]

[Text]

ISLAMABAD, Nov. 2: The nationalist forces in Afghanistan have joined the resistance and taken up arms against the Babrak Karmel's administration by forming the "Pashtoon Khawa Revolutionary Front", a usually reliable source disclosed to The Muslim here today.

The Pashtoon khawa is a Pushto word used for the nationalist. The source said the front of the Afghan nationalists comprises progressive students, teachers, armymen, labourers and the younger people of other progressive political groups.

He said these nationalists elements were supporting the Saur revolution till the end of Hafeezullah Amin's regime in Afghanistan but they took up arms in July this year against Babrak Karmel when he killed the "true revolutionaries", who opposed him for his anti-nationalist policies.

The Front claims to have wiped out a number of pro-Karmel elements and also some religious leaders, who had indulged in killing those Afghan people who were working in government services. These include teachers, students and other civilians officials, the source said and added that these people were killed because they were serving a Communist government.

The source said that the Front had promised to provide protection to innocent citizens against the Government's barbarous acts and also from other religious fighters who had assassinated many citizens charging them of "serving the Communist Government".

The recent defection of a high-ranking official of Babrak Karmel's administration, Akhtar Mohammad Paktiwal, brings into sharp focus the struggle of the nationalist forces in Afghanistan.

In his speech Mr. Paktiwal, Afghanistan's chief delegate to the UNESCO General Conference in Belgrade, had stated "that the Afghan people were not fighting against Socialism but they were fighting for freedom, for self-determination and for their own rights. He had stated that "the Afghans are killing other Afghans.

The Government is killing Afghans and Afghans are killing the Soviets and the Soviets are killing Afghans." The speech of Mr. Karmel's representative reflects his affiliation with the nationalist forces. It is also interesting to note that the defecting Afghan official did not lend his pleas with religious protestations. He only protested against the killing of Afghan people and their independence.

KABUL JAILS CRAMMED WITH DETAINEES

Karachi MORNING NEWS in English 7 Nov 80 p 12

[Text] Paris, Nov. 6--Kabul jails are crammed with political prisoners, a French reporter recently freed from captivity in Afghanistan said here on Tuesday.

The journalist, Francois Missen of the News Agency La Compagnie Des Reporters, was arrested in Kandahar last Sept 7, together with his agency colleague, French photographer Antoine Darnaud, who was subsequently released with Mr Missen.

Mr Missen said that apart from Afghan guerillas there were political prisoners.

We were first kept in Pul-i-Charki prison at the entry to Kabul, he said. From our block, number one, we could tell that there were about 3,000 prisoners mostly political, in the prison.

Later we were transferred to Political Police Headquarters near the Kabul Radio building and each thrown into a hole 1.10 metres (about 40 inch) wide and two metres (yards) long, guarded by Soviet paratroops.

In neighbouring cells there were prisoners captured with guns in their hands or suspected of guerillas sympathies. Every day new prisoners arrived and others left.

Mr Missen said he and Mr Darnaud were endlessly interrogated by the Afghans and by an Uzbek interrogator who spoke excellent French.

The man was a professional and knew interrogation techniques through and through, Mr Missen said. He was surely a Russian of the KGB (secret police).--AFP

Quoting reports from the Afghan capital, the sources said that leading Khalqi Ministers in Babrak Karmal's Government, Communications Minister Aslam Ali Watanjar and Interior Minister Syed Mohammad Gulabzoi, were preparing for a possible confrontation with Karmal's Parcham faction, the sources said.

The Khalqis, who are considered more nationalistic and independent, are opposed to the Parchamis who are considered closer to Moscow.

GUNBATTLE REPORTED IN CENTRAL KABUL

Karachi DAWN in English 7 Nov 80 pp 1, 6

[Text] New Delhi, Nov. 6--A two-hour gun battle took place in central Kabul on Friday, apparently between Afghan Mujahids and Government troops, Western diplomatic sources said here today.

The attack, believed mounted by an estimated 75 Mujahideen, was eventually repulsed after Soviet armour intervened, the sources said.

This is the first Western evidence of a major Mujahideen attack on an important military centre inside the Afghan capital. The incident was said to have happened near Darul Aman Palace--an important military facility base in the city centre.

The sources could not give casualty figures, but said that the insurgents inflicted injuries to Government troops.

For three days from Friday, explosions and gunfire were heard by city residents from several directions.

Quoting reports from the Afghan capital, the sources said that three Soviets and two armed Parchamis (members of the Parcham faction of the ruling Peoples Democratic Party of Afghanistan) were killed at Karte Omar, Central Kabul, on Oct. 29.

Gunfire was also heard on the same day from the direction of the Polish Embassy, the sources said.

Giving details of Mujahideen activities on the outskirts of Kabul and in Afghan provinces, the sources said three armoured trucks were seen burning on the southern outskirts of the city on Oct. 29.

Soviet aircraft reportedly bombed villages around Kariz-i-Amir in northern Afghanistan on Oct. 29 along the strategic Salanga Pass Road, which connects Soviet Union with Afghanistan.

Mujahid groups operating in the Hasseim Kot area in northern Afghanistan attacked Afghan Government troops on Sunday, the sources said.

Further north in Qarabagh, Mujahids were said to have attacked the Governor's office on Saturday and took hostage the Governor and an unspecified number of other officials.

On Sunday, Mujahids stopped public transport buses at Maidan on the southern outskirts of Kabul, and took away identity cards of new conscripts.

A long convoy of Soviet armoured vehicles, meanwhile, entered the Afghan capital from the north on Monday in an operation which could mean that the Soviets were bringing in new forces or that battle-worn troops were returning to barracks, the sources said.

Meanwhile, Western diplomatic sources in New Delhi said today the Khaliq (People) faction of the ruling party has formed armed underground self-defence units amid reports of increasing cooperation between the Khalqis and the Mujahids.

Quoting reports from the Afghan capital, the sources said that leading Khalqi Ministers in Babrak Karmal's Government, Communications Minister Aslam Ali Watanyar and Interior Minister Syed Mohammad Golabzoi, were preparing for a possible confrontation with Karmal's Parcham faction, the sources said.

The Khalqis, who are considered more nationalistic and independent, are opposed to the Parchamis who are considered closer to Moscow.

The sources here could not give the numerical strength of such underground defence units, but said that the Khalqis had secured arms from police stores in the Interior Ministry.

The units are led by Khalqi military officers and civilians, the sources said.

The sources also said a fourth plenum of the ruling party will be convened soon to discuss a Cabinet reshuffle.

The third plenum was held in the first week of July. The sources did not give other details.

Meanwhile, well-informed Afghan dissident sources here speculated that Mr Babrak Karmal might have come back from the Soviet Union with Moscow's endorsement to sack Ministers belonging to the Khalq (Peoples) faction on the PDPA who are opposed to Karmal's Parcham (Flag faction).

Mr Karmal returned to Kabul yesterday after a 21-day visit of the Soviet Union.--AFP

COMMUNICATIONS ROLE IN DEVELOPMENT DISCUSSED

Kabul KABUL NEW TIMES in English 1 Nov 80 p 2

[Article by Ljubinka Milosevic]

[Text] Communications can be a tool of power, a weapon of revolution, a trade product or a medium for education they can serve the aims of liberation or suppression, the development of the personality of the individual or the channelling of human beings towards uniformity—caution members of the Macbride commission for the study of communications problems in its report entitled "Many voices—one world".

The report saw the light of day this summer after two years' work and is stirring up fresh interest on the eve of the UNESCO session as to the nature of the new order in communications and information, a subject which has in fact been under discussion for a decade.

This report came after a storm of opposition from the privileged to the demands of the subjugated in this field—mainly the developing countries— for equitable participation in the flow of information.

The six big "world" agencies control 90 percent of agency information which is transmitted in the world. The creation of the Pool of nonaligned countries' news agencies was the response to this injustice. The state of affairs is identical as concerns the efforts of the Committee for cooperation amongst the radio broadcasting organisations of the nonaligned countries. for eight tenths of the available frequences belong to the developed world.

No longer does anyone dispute that "freedom of information" in the present system does in fact mean the freedom of the stronger to impose information (and opinions) technically and technologically on all developing countries. The debates on this subject led UNESCO to set up the Macbride commission.

The mind boggles at the fact that 3,500 languages are spoken in the world. This very number does, however, illuminate the difficulty of the tasks undertaken by Commission members, many individuals, countries and organisations—to assure communications and the transmission of information while preventing anyone from being neglected or privileged.

The situation is just so today—some are privileged while others are neglected. The Macbride report has confirmed that it is necessary to seek a new, more just and equitable order in the sphere of communications. No proof is needed to demonstrate the existing inequality and dependence. The members of the Macbride Commission are extremely clear—they consider that "the time has now come to pass from principles to reform and concrete action.

Pointing out the link between communications and overall social, cultural and economic development, they stress that each country should develop its communications models in accordance with its own conditions, needs and traditions, strengthening in this way its integrity, independecne and self-reliance.

The nonaligned and other develping countries have long since pointed out that a close link exists between the establishment of a new international economic order and a new world information and communications order—a statement which the commission members put forward in one of the 82 recommendations. In accepting this position, Commission members recommend that the concrete plans which link these two processes should be implemented under the aegis of the UN. Furthermore they consider that the UN, when it accepts development strategy, should comprise the communications sector as an essential part of the UN and not only as an instrument of public information.

The Commission members support the steps taken by the nonaligned to fill in the gap which exists in information amongst the developing countries themselves—the nonaligned news agencies' Pool and the Conference of Radio Broadcasting Organisations. They devote a special section to this entitled "The strengthening of collective independence" in their recommendations. Collective independence is, they consider, the corner—stone of the new world information and communications order.

All the recommendations put forward in the lengthy report are the basis for extensive international debate and action. One of the fundamental objectives must here be kept in mind—that the news world information and communications order should and must become the instrument of peaceful cooperation amongst nations. The Director General of UNESCO therefore acted wisely when he decided not to involve the forum of the general assembly in theoretic studies and polemics.

The UNESCO delegates in Belgrade will have entire the Macbride report at their disposal, but they will vote on the Action Programme to be proposed by the Director General in connection with the Macbride Commission proposals. As UNESCO voted for the inclusion of the problems of communications in their activity as early as April of this year (with the proposal for the formation of the International organ for planning communications development), UNESCO is today faced with concrete and clear tasks. It is not to adopt or reject the 400 page Macbride report but rather to define the directions for further inevitable changes in order for the world to remain one and to make it possible for everyone to hear the wealth of voices from all over the world. In this respect the Macbride report has done much it has made possible a maturing of awareness throughout the world of the intenability of the current information and communications system and the necessity for the creation of a new one.

PRELATE WARNS AGAINST TIES WITH SECULARISTS

Tehran JOMHURI-YE ESLAMI in Persian 14 Oct 80 p 10

[Interview with Dr Bahonar]

[Text] The magazine 'ARUTOLWOTHQA [Strong Bond], a student publication of the Islamic Republican Party, printed an interview with Jojjatoleslam Dr Bahonar in a recent issue. Because of the importance of some of the questions raised, we undertake to publish a part of the aforementioned interview.

Dr Bahonar, answering a question concerning provision of the Islamic Republican Party's [IRP] budget, stated: The party has precisely continued the Islamic revolutionary movement of the Moslem masses. You recall that this movement's crusade had large expenses in the past. Our movement required a budget for all those trips, reproduction of tapes, distribution of announcements and books, organization of groups, preparations for marches and demonstrations, etc. As you know, in the past the budget for this movement and Islamic awakening came from the people's contributions and generosity; some of them even put aside their daily bread and their daily livelihood and joined the ranks of the crusade. In the same fashion, when the party was organized, the people who gathered together in the party and who proclaimed their cooperation, interpreted and now interpret the party's organization precisely as an Islamic movement and service in the path of God. Furthermore in different forms they make efforts helping administer the party.

In addition to that, as you know, expenditures of the imam's fund and portion are solely for Islam, the advance of Islamic propaganda, Islamic service, and the preservation of the Islamic nation's existence. Therefore they can be for activities that take place in the form of propaganda publications, organization of societies and ceremonies that are exactly in the Islamic revolutionary line.

And these are all matters that are in the path of the imamate, the Koran and the leadership, and therefore religiously sanctioned funds can be spent for them. Apart from this, an amount has also been received from interest-free loans. I think this question must be asked of many other organizations, societies and parties. We believe that the IRP possesses a popular base in the revolutionary line. We do not want to say that all the people who were in the revolutionary line exclusively gathered together in this party. However, we do claim that those persons who have joined and express their interest and cooperation are people in the Islamic revolutionary line. Since the party has a popular base, made up of these very people that in the past, as I said before, administered the revolution, and performed positive work; for example, persons who created and built the Unification Societies and welfare and 'Alavi schools, or initiated interest-free loan chests or assistance centers, and accomplished all those things with such difficulty under those suffocating and oppressive conditions, the resistance, damages and blows of the regime; how were all these monies and funds provided? the nation is a nation that has an ideal, a goal, that wants and waits to be of service to the revolution, to help as much as it can.

Hojjatoleslam Bahonar was further asked: What is the party's position in relation to various other groups, whether or not they are non-Islamic, quasi-Islamic or Islamic?

In my opinion, the answer to this question requires a long time and extensive knowledge. To summarize, I must say that a party, if it is a pious party and has a clear ideological foundation (such as the IRP), and certainly thinks piously and Islamically, then it is clear that it cannot compromise in confrontation with any group or party that is atheistic or based on a faith other than Islam, or which is fundamentally faithless and contentless, or which is a blend of faith and atheistic ideology. It cannot compromise unless it loses its quality of piety. Of course there was a time of discussion concerning the type of encounter, confrontation, or opposition to each one of these parties and organizations. Sometimes it is in the revolution's interest not to have hot, face-to-face conflicts with some of these parties that I have named. But this does not mean that we can bring about disassociations or unions, or combine groups of the sorts I mentioned. How many times in instances of the plots, treachery and agression of these parties and fronts that I mentioned has the party been compelled to have hot, face-to-face conflicts, acting out of Islamic duty within the jurisdiction of the Islamic Republican government? How many times when they plotted, with poisonous lies, provocations and the sowing of discord, have we been obliged to disclose and speak the truth, and display documents and proofs against the treachery of some of these groups? But if we pass over these two issues, meaning the operation of some of these parties and fronts in the form of a plot and actions for an insurrection against the Islamic Republic, or in the form of provocations, distortion and dissemination of poisonous lies, still they want to continue their political and even their ideological activities, that is, to bring about sabotage and plots against the Islamic Republican order.

Since our party's ideology gets its inspiration from Islam, we respect the principle of freedom of throught, expression of opinion and social activity, if treachery, provocation and plots do not exist. If this is the case, we do not prevent political, social and intellectual activities, and we take no negative position. Concerning the Islamic parties that I mentioned, we ask if they are truly Islamic parties, purely, truly Islamic, and if their connection with Islam is not just to hide their expression of another ideology, or if their relation with the Islamic revolution is not merely a protective shield, and behind the curtain they have associations with foreigners, traitorous agents of the past regime, or others, and if fundamentally their operation and their position are against the Islamic revolution. Thus, in answer, this means that our position is to ask to what degree are these groups Islamic, truly Islamic, and to what degree are their political positions truly the imam's and the Islamic revolution's positions. The closer they are to these positions, we consider them our brothers, helpers, and colleagues (in the field of the struggle).

Dr Bahonar, in response to this question: "In your analysis, why was most of the pressure from counterrevolutionaries (whether in the form of propaganda or assassination) turned towards the party and the central council?", said:

I imagine that this is a natural matter because groups and organizations in political confrontations with problems are deeply affected by rivalry, divisiveness and special interests, so that to whatever degree they feel that the party or individuals from the central council possibly will have a large field for development in the society and in the Islamic revolution, and might accept heavier positions and responsibilities in the future, they begin this poison-spreading in order to pound these individuals and shatter the party's power. This is an inhuman, unislamic, anti-political confrontation with the truths. Revolutions cannot expect much except from those organizations possessing this insight and character. We were and are hopeful that the Islamic revolution would be able to create a revolution in culture, morals and cirtue, to create pure, honest, intelligent, just, fair and self-sacrificing humans, so that instead of forces which can only sabotage and spread dissension, make accusations and suspicions, we would work towards constructiveness, movement and efficiency in the field of action. In summary, instead of negativism, we hope to be positive, active, useful and fruitful in society, of course in conjunction with revolutionary sincerity.

ROULEAU PROTEST AGAINST VOA AIRED

Tehran TEHRAN TIMES in English 30 Oct 80 p 2

[Text]

TEHRAN – The famous and controvercial personality in the Western news media, Eric Rouleau, recently said to Pars in Tehran that the Washington-based radio of Voice of America had badly distorted one of his recent writings about the Islamic Republic of Iran and the person of Imam Khomeini and said that he would sue the Voice of America for distorting the original texts of his writings.

Referring to VOA's Persian translations of his analystical articles on Iran, the French writer Rouleau said that the Voice of America had recently broadcasted "shocking lies under my name which totally contradict with the original of my wirtings." He added, "The Voice of America (persian Language Service) has said unjust things about the person of the Imam under my name which are not true and which are in sharp contrast with the original version of my writings."

"Throughout my articiles which have been published in Le Monde said Rouleau," I have always said that the West has no insight about the facts of the clerical world of Islam, and that it does not know that the clergy in Iran have struggled against cruelty and injustice.

I have said that Imam Khomeini enjoys the support of the majority of the masses in Iran, and that the Iranians have not forgotten that over a period of 15 years he continued his resistance in exile and while he was in Najaf (in Iraq). "He quoted the original text of his article as saying "Imam Khomeini ensured the Iranian people of the triumph of the Revolution... He is not only a religious leader but also a political leader... He does not compromise with those whose views should be against known facts... The West as well as the United States are at a loss to understand the Islamic Revolution... They compare Imam Khomeini with De Gaulle but whereas during his office De Gaulle had compromised with the left and right wings. Imam Khomeini never did anything like that."

Eric Rouleau said that in his writings on Iran he had said that since the early years of his life, Imam Khomeini never found any possibility for compromise with the Marxists, and that the VOA's distortment of this statement in this respect was downright disrespect for the writer of article.

He added he had given a lengthy account of the historical role of Shi'ism in the national struggles in Iran from the start of the nineteenth century to the present day. He noted in his articles he had given his own analysis of what might happen in Iran without Imam Khomeini, but said that the Vocle of America had related his tentative analysis as though it were an absolute prediction of something already happening in Iran.

He requested Pars to reflect his comment on the VOA's treatment of his writings for the information of the world media.

Rouleau has made frequent visits to Iran ever since the culmination of the Islamic Revolution here and has written extensively about the Islamic Revolution.

Short-term Priorities

Tehran TEHRAN TIMES in English 2 Nov 80 p 2

[Text]

TEHRAN — Long-term economic plans for the nation have received a set-back in view of preoccupations with emergency short-term plans to meet immediate requirements of essential supplies, Deputy Minister of Economic and Financial Affairs Dr. Nurbaksh told Pars yesterday.

Nurbaksh said that plans undertaken by the government at present have been aligned to the need for meeting of shortages in essential consumer requirements, therefore, leaving no time for researching into long term economic plans, he said. It was essential to have the economy in place just now without throwing it off balance, he added.

However, he went on to say, cabinet ministers including the minister of industries and mines and the minister of agriculture and rural development, have recently taken part in discussions on programs of investment with foreign collaboration. The investments are to be made either in Iran, or in countries abroad, but would serve the purpose of bringing in returns for economic growth of the country. The plans are only tentative ' and no. conclusive agreements have been reached, the deputy minister added.

One of the priorities attached to all plans of the Ministry of Economic and Financial Affairs is the effort to see that industries now holding their own as going concerns do not suffer shutdowns, and that both the industrial and agricultural sectors are revivified, Nurbaksh emphasised.

A problem that afflicts both the industrial and agricultural sectors at the moment is a severe shortage of fuel, he complained.

Five-year Plan Dropped

Tehran TEHRAN TIMES in English 22 Oct 80 p 1

[Text]

TEHRAN — New considerations such as the outbreak of the Iran-Iraq war and the resultant damage to the vital Abadan oil refinery means having to shelve the 5-year plan slated by the Oil Ministry, Aliakbar Moinfar said yesterday.

Moinfar the former oil minister and now the head of the Parliamentary commission on oil revealed this in an interview with the Engelabe-Islami, the Persian Daily.

He said in response to a question that Iran's oil resources were expected to last from anywhere between 75 to 100 years but added this would very much depend on overall oil policies.

"But before we make any prognostications on oil use we would have to consider the effects of oil policies consequent to the devastations that have resulted from this war," Moinfar said.

"How long we will be able to benefit from oil resources and what uses we are going to make of these precisely cannot be gauged without envisioning the present difficulties," he continued. "Neverthelem, logical planning will be of great help," the head of Iran's parliamentary Oil Commission added.

By planning, Moinfar explained, he meant that oil resources should be so used as to contribute towards the building up of an economic infrastructure particularly in industry and not squandered on consumption as it was under the regime of the late shah.

Moinfar also stressed oil pricing policies which, he said, was closely linked to the question of maximizing benefits from the use of oil as a productive resource and not as an expendable export commodity to be exchanged for import of goods.

The former oil minister was during his term of office very closely interested on the question of controlling and determining the Iranian oil prices and production, and generally on international pricing and production mechanisms which would ensure benefits to oil producers in the region and throughout the world.

Spending Curbs

Tehran TEHRAN TIMES in English 30 Oct 80 p 1

[Text]

TEHRAN - Minister of State and Head of the Plan and Budget Organization, Musa Khaier, yesterday called for drastic curbs in spending in the government and private sectors, slashing of consumption at all levels, and for severe austerities all round, in view of the monetary complications in the national exchequer resulting from the European economic embargoes and the current war with Iraq.

Minister Musa Khaier, made the appeal to the nation in an interview held yesterday, which was broadcast on the national television network.

He said that the nation was increasingly finding itself confronted by a situation in which national expenditures far exceeded incomes.

The minister said that this was a consequence of the earlier European economic embargoes on Iran, and now, by the war expenses resulting from the indiscriminate war damages.

Khaier said that government had enunciated certain proposals to meet the emergencies by governmental action taken hand in hand with the wholehearted cooperation of private business interests, and ordinary citizens of the country.

He said that businessmen and entrepreneurs should assist government by paying in all taxes and dues promptly to the state and punctually.

Along with this he said, there should be the most severe curbs on expenditure in the government as well as the private sector in all respects. He added that every Iranian family should share in this effort as a patriotic duty by minimising consumption.

The minister said he was confident that by such austerity measures the nation's economy was certain to make recovery and compensate the present difficulties in the national budget.

Government also plans to issue government bonds, Khaier said. He called on people in all strata of society to purchase these bonds in the same spirit of "Jihad" (Holy War) for the country, which they were bringing to the war. Khaier was hopeful that the issue of the government bonds would go a long way in meeting the nation's current budgetary deficits.

Asked whether government proposed further salary amendments, as was carried out earlier when salaries of government employees in the higher pay brackets were lowered, he said that adjustments would follow in respect of these same groups only. Salaries of middle and lower income groups would be left untouched the minister said.

The minister said that the government would soon be introducing a formula to rationalize payment of salaries in the government sector.

Development of Sistan-Baluchistan

Tehran TEHRAN TIMES in English 3 Nov 80 p 1

[Text]

TEHRAN – Urgent problems to be faced in the Sistan-Baluchestan Province were outlined by the provincial governor-general as lack of security on roads and within cities, dangers to villages and farmlands from shifting sand dunes, illiteracy, shortage of water and smuggling.

In an interview with Pars the governor-general focused on the shortcomings in the province but said that the development budget of Rials 3,000 million allocated for the region should be put to the right uses.

A Development Council has been formed for the region, he said, and stressed the need to educate people in the region on the benefits of cooperation and participation in the development projects planned by the Council.

He said that there was a need to investigate the possibilities of reviving the factories which could usefully supplement production in the province and be a source of employment to people in the areas in which they are located.

Agricultural facilities were also sorely in need of attention, he noted. He said that in a region lacking natural resources and for improved farming methods. However, the region produced 90,000 tons of wheat last year, an unprecedented yield, the governor-general observed.

Budget allocations have been made from time for provision of deep-well irrigation systems and dredging of rivers silted over with desert sands, the governor-general said, adding that these allocations were simple to meet these requirements.

He promised further government aid to fishermen who ply a trade in fishing off the Oman Sea.

The governor-general said that if the creation of jobs through the implementation of plans for a cold storage plant at Chahar-Bahar, a canning factory and the development of cooperative rural incentive schemes were realized, smuggling for a living could be minimized and eradicated.

As regards security problems in the area, he urged clergymen of the area and those in charge of the administration to guide the people and instill in them a sense of civic consciousness.

Oil Pollution Protest

Tehran TEHRAN TIMES in English 26 Oct 80 p 2

[Text] Tehran (Pars)--The Environment Organization of Iran severely protested to the executive secretary of the U.N. Environment Organization for its silence towards the pollution of the Persian Gulf waters resulting from the explosion of the excavation platform of the U.S.-Saudi oil company ARAMCO and by the eruption of the oil in the shores of Kuwait.

The seriousness of such a pollution is to the extent that oil is covering a vast surface of the Persian Gulf and the pollution has reached the Iranian shores. No doubt such pollution would cause uncompensable damages for the sea animals and for the people of the region.

The plunderer international oil companies, affiliated with imperialist countries, are exploring and plundering the oil resources of the Persian Gulf region and such a plunder is taking place without providing any security means which would thus create such deplorable events.

Obviously such events would not happen in imperialistic countries of if any instances are seen it would be immediately controlled. The Environment Organization of Iran, while severely protesting against such incidents, asks for rapid compensation the damages and purify the region from oil. In a protest to the executive secretary of the U.N. Environment Organization who is the U.N. Secretary General, Kurt Waldheim's deputy in this respect, the Iranian Environment Organization condemned the negligence of the U.N. Environment Organization in the Kuwait regional convention to support and expand sea environment in the Persian Gulf and the Oman Sea and also the operation of the regional cooperation protocol to fight pollutions created by oil.

The convention and the protocol were signed two-and-half years ago and thus is deemed necessary to be implemented. Iran has always been a volunteer to hold the post of executive secretary of the convention but due to the opposition made by the violator criminal Ba'athist regime of Iraq and severe weakness of the U.N. Environment program, so far no positive response has been made to such a demand. To ask for compensation for such pollution is the obvious and legal right of the government of the Islamic Republic of Iran and all other countries of the region affected in this respect.

NORTH KOREA OFFERS INDUSTRIAL, AGRICULTURAL AID

Tehran KEYHAN in Persian 30 Oct 80 p 13

[Text] Tehran--PARS NEWS AGENCY--Mr Cha Pyong-ok, ambassador of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea met with Mr Mohammad 'Ali Raja'i, prime minister, Wednesday night in Tehran. In this meeting, which lasted more than one hour, Mr Raja'i said: I am more or less informed about relations between Iran and North Korea, and understand them. But important above all things is the position you have taken confronting a nation from which we want to live independently, and which in a very large number of respects resembles the United States.

We have heard that you are self-reliant to a degree. If such a thing is true, we can hope in the future to step together in the interests of the peoples of our two countries. As you know, we have a pious revolution [enqelab-e maktabi] here, and as you have been informed, our beliefs are independent of the beliefs of the large country which is our neighbor. The expansion of our beliefs in society is important to us, compared to becoming dependent on a country in which another ideology rules. We see the essence of the matter to be the contents of the revolution because this revolution is our capital and our goal. We will go along with you as far as we are able while still preserving the revolution's authenticity, which depends on us alone. Mr Raja'i said: The remarks which I make speaking as the prime minister of the Islamic Republic of Iran are empty of all diplomatic ceremony, and the basis of relations between us are the very matters here being discussed.

Concerning our relations, we will accept that self-reliant production which you can offer to us. We can accept this proposal as a revolutionary proposal, and if considerable cooperation with a country can be proposed, it should be that fundamental cooperation which functions in the building of nations. In reality you make proposals which we can be assured will not cause dependency, but instead our country's people will become self-reliant as before. We will offer industry to you, and will equip you with industry so that your country's people can be self-reliant. Mr Raja'i then added: At the present time we are confronted specifically with three basic problems, each with their own specific time. The first problem is the war, the second problem is post-war reconstruction, and the third is the programs based on revolutionary values which we would implement in our country.

On the basis of what I have explained, we are very desirous of becoming informed of your country's experience with each of these three problems, and making use of it when necessary.

The North Korean ambassador said at the end: We are in complete agreement with your requests. We desired independence, and we will not permit a country to interfere in our domestic affairs. We are opposed to this, and we know that our nation's enemy is the United States, and that all our misfortunes began when the United States seized South Korea.

He said finally: We are very rich industrially and agriculturally, and we can have further cooperation with you.

IRAQI DAMAGE TO OIL FIELDS CAUSES FUEL CRISIS

Bonn DIE ZEIT in German 17 Oct 80 p 1

[Text] Beirut. Peter M. Ranke. "The Persians cannot conduct the war much longer with the meager refinery capacity they have left," the Arab petroleum experts are saying. "They urgently need aviation gasoline and fuel for their tanks and trucks." All private operations of automobiles is actually already prohibited, and the ever-decreasing operations of the Persian air force may be proof that the Iraqi war offensive against all the Persian petroleum and refinery installations is gradually leading to success.

Artillery fire as well as bombs and fires have caused damage in the billions to the Abadan refinery and have put this gigantic plant out of operation for an indefinite period. Therefore, occupation of it by Iraqi troops would no longer be significant for actual production. The experts assure us that, after an armistice, repairs and replacements would take the Iranians longer than the Iraqis. Iran would need about 6 months to reach an export figure of 700,000 barrels of crude oil a day, as before the war, since the shipping facilities on Kharg Island have also been damaged.

It will be a long time for the refinery capacity to even be able to cover domestic needs since the damage was so great and the loss of Abadan is so serious.

Iraq is better off although it is now losing 4 million dollars a minute because its petroleum exports (about 3.1 million barrels a day) had to be stopped. However, the [Iraqi] Ministry of Petroleum is hoping that the shot-up oil docks and shipping installations on the Gulf at Mina al-Bakr and Khawr al-Amaya as well as the pumping facilities and computer center in Al-Faw can be repaired in 3 months. The oil fields in southern Iraq have hardly suffered at all so far. Likewise, the oil fields in northern Iraq have suffered only relatively slight war damage.

Iraqi oil experts assure us that: "If Iraq could gradually begin exporting crude oil in 3 months at the latest after an armistice, then in a good 6 months it could achieve an export output of about 2.1 million barrels a day on the Gulf and 700,000 barrels in the North." Also, [Iraq's] gold and currency reserves are sufficient to tide it over the slack period. Of course there will be great problems of when and how many of the foreign oil experts and workers return to Iraq--on which the repairs essentially depend. And, there should not be any more damage to the petroleum industry. (SAD)

MAYOR ANNOUNCES GAS RATIONING REGULATIONS

Tehran JOMHURI-YE ESLAMI in Persian 6 Oct 80 p 9

[Text] Engineer Mohammad Tavassoli, mayor of Tehran, in a conversation with a PARS NEWS AGENCY reporter, while thanking the people for their cooperation during Traffic Mobilization Week, particularly those whose profession and occupation depend on the use of automobiles, said: We hope that our country's people, particularly residents of large cities, will take into consideration, just as they did last week, the present war conditions and the fuel shortage. I hope that they will meet these difficulties and losses with sacrifice, generosity and willingness so that, God willing, after the victory of truth over evil and the normalization of our country's emergency condition, people can begin their normal, daily work again. The mayor of Tehran added: An arrangement will be made so that there will be no interruption in the work of productive units and municipal services as far as fuel supply is concerned. A staff will be organized to examine related measures, so that private automobiles will be able to acquire a sufficient amount of fuel for vital, urgent tasks. Probably the ration, which will be announced this week, will be about 30 liters of gasoline a month for each car. The Tehran mayor, concerning fuel conservation, said: Now that the Abadan refinery, which supplied 60 percent of our fuel production, is actually closed, it is now the religious duty of every pledged Iranian Moslem to conserve as much as possible in these critical and emergency conditions, and in case other refineries are closed, to be prepared to conserve even more with the same excellent morale visible in them.

The mayor of Tehran, concerning an increase in the number of buses of the Vehed Company [Tehran Bus Company], said: Figures of Vahed Company buses and minibuses operating today throughout the city show 2,269 buses and 613 minibuses belonging to the Vahed Company, and 150 rented buses and 200 rented minibuses which are at the company's disposal. Meanwhile, it has been decided to prevent the movement of all private buses and minibuses throughout the city in the next two or three days, so that their owners, given a fair rental fee, will cooperate with the Vahed Company. Furthermore, buses and minibuses of government organizations must be placed at the Vahed Company's disposal. Permits will be issued, upon the determination of the Vahed Company and the Traffic Organization, to those organizations whose type of work requires their activity throughout the city.

Army buses which are in Tehran and not involved in the war will be taken over by the Vahed Company. With the cooperation of the ministers of industries and mines, factory buses during idle hours will be used on the Vahed Company's bus lines according to conditions.

The mayor of Tehran added: Because of the increase of buses and the movement which has appeared in the Vahed Company's management, because the city's people have become acquainted with the routes and accustomed to the use of the Vahed Company's buses and minibuses during the past week, and furthermore due to the approval and execution of the proposal of Tehran's mayor based on the distribution of the starting and quitting hours of work in government organizations, there will no longer be such crowding in the morning and afternoon. This problem will be gradually eliminated with the people's cooperation.

Engineer Tavassoli emphasized that the Traffic Mobilization Week plan and its continuation is not a component of plans to improve Tehran's traffic, and that this decision was made only because of the exigencies of war conditions and the fuel shortage. However, he said, the results will be good experience for traffic improvement planners in the future. He also again asked those persons in good physical shape and whose path is short to walk and leave the buses for older persons and those who have far to go.

The Tehran mayor, concerning statistics of Vahed Company passengers, said: During Mehr, 1358 [23 Sep - 22 Oct 1979] there were one million passengers: in Shahrivar, 1359 [23 Aug - 22 Sep 1980] two million, and during mobilization week, 3.3 million passengers. The number of buses has also doubled and the average bus speed has increased from 11.5 to 20 kilometers per hour. The sale of tickets has risen 120 percent.

Concerning the installation of coin-taking boxes in the buses, he said: This work has begun and until its completion, in addition to the cards which government workers had and the cards which ordinary persons got from banks, ticket books will also be available to the passengers through the banks. This is so that there will be no annoyance in the provision of tickets and less time will be consumed. The mayor of Tehran, while thanking drivers and other workers of the Vahed Company who have recently offered the greatest service, asked the drivers of Vahed Company's buses and minibuses to refrain from needless stops so that passengers will not be kept wandering and waiting in the bus stops, and also to continue their work in the afternoon as long as there are passengers. He also requested them to stop at the side of the road in a red condition [alert]. He asked the people, brothers, guards and Komithehs to show necessary cooperation with these drivers. He also asked them to permit those buses whose lights have been covered with blue paint to use their low means at night and during white conditions, since if they extinguish their headlights, in actuality, they will not be able to move and carry passengers.

REAGAN ELECTION IMPLICATIONS ON ISRAEL VOTE VIEWED

TA071545 Tel Aviv 'AL HAMISHMAR in Hebrew 7 Nov 80 p 3

[Commentary by political correspondent Dalya Shehori: "Reagan's Election--What Does It Mean?"]

[Text] The major loser in the U.S. presidential election is the U.S. polling institution--modern age's new oracle--which had predicted, at the most, a small Reagan lead. Anyone who wanted to smooth over their disgrace said that the electoral system is devastating to polls. This, however, does not provide an explanation for the arithmetical gap of about 8 million votes between the support for Reagan and the support for Carter. Professor Louis Guttman of the Jerusalem Applied Social Research Institution hurried to calm people and said: We have more advanced methods of assessing public opinion in cases of uncertainty. But the United States is still the cradle of public opinion polls, and yet this is what happened.

The U.S. election results bring us, in terms of the statistical forecast failure, back to that unclear but probably firmer area of "commonsense." Perhaps a sober look at U.S. social trends together with an awareness of the issues about which Americans felt "their shoes were too tight" could have resulted in a more accurate guess than the sterile Harris and Gallup polls. or, for that matter, the polls conducted by the television networks, the NEW YORK TIMES and NEWSWEEK.

It looks as though the U.S. lesson will make us view more skeptically the public opinion polls conducted here almost on a weekly basis, bringing good news to some and less good news to others. Based on an analysis of the factors that featured in the U.S. voter's choice, it could be said that by activating "commonsense" vis-a-vis the Israeli voter, if a 14-percent inflation (registered in October 1980 in the United States) led to a rush into Reagan's arms, then an inflation of 130 percent or more in Israel will push the public en masse into the arms of the alignment, and the Peres-Rabin contest and its results will merely play a marginal role.

It seems that the dissatisfaction with the Likud in Israel is greater than the dissatisfaction with the Carter administration in the United States. The awful rate of inflation, the mind-boggling price hikes, the cuts in services, the shame of the municipal network's impotence, increased unemployment, the shutdown of businesses and, at the same time, in foreign affairs--the increased Israeli isolation and the question mark regarding the status of Jerusalem with the melting away of the autonomy talks and the peace with Egypt--all these must be harbingers of massive fleeing from the Likud, whatever the public opinion polls may say (and, so far, they have indicated such fleeing). The feeling is that the longer the current government continues to be in power--by virtue of its artificial and unrepresentative Knesset majority--the more its image will be eroded and the greater the degree by which it will determine the scope of its failure in the next election with its own two hands.

Oddly enough--and perhaps not so oddly--positive reaction to Reagan's election was heard from both Likud and Labor ranks. It happened that each party hoped to find in Reagan what suited it. The Likud, without saying it outright, pinned itself to the traditional Republican image of conservatism and Reagan's record as a rightist Republican with anticommunist views--one who would act strongly against the Soviet Union. The Likud found parallels between the Republican and its own characteristics. "There will be good ties with the current administration by virtue of the ideological and political affinity," hawkish Liberal minister Yitzhaq Moda'i exclaimed. "Now in the United States there is a president who thinks along the lines of Israel's concepts," a senior "Herut" personality remarked.

The Labor Party, too--even though most of its members are neither conservative nor rightist nor reactionary--expressed itself favorably toward the newly-elected president. "His election may advance the Jordanian option," said Labor Party chairman Shim'on Peres. "The past has shown that our experience with Republican presidents Richard Nixon and Gerald Ford was very good and both demonstrated a fair attitude toward Israel and its problems," his adversary, Yitzhaq Rabin, said.

Moda'i went even further and said that Republican control of the United States, namely (and this he did not say) the U.S. retreat in the direction of greater isolationism, insulation and conservatism will help the Likud get reelected to form the next government. Peres and Rabin for their part became nostalgic--silently if not out loud--over the period of working with Henry Kissinger and they saw the opportunity that has opened to continue the course stopped short in May 1977.

Moda'i's conceptual error seems to be two-fold. First, he thinks that there can be any force in the world (except for the god of inflation) which could help the Likud get reelected, and this is an illusion. Secondly, he judges Israeli political and social trends along the same lines as those derived from the American scene, and this is a simplistic approach to reality. The conservative process was felt in Israel not in November 1980, but already in May 1977. This process began in June, 1967 after the great victory in the 6-Day War. It materialized in the Likud's rise to power in May 1977 and may have already overripened. Chances are, therefore, that we are currently facing the end of the reactionary and conservative age which we found ourselves dragged into by "Gush Emunim" rather than at the brink of such an era. At any rate, chronologically we are ahead of the United States in this development and we are preceding it by 3 years--if indeed what happened in the United States demonstrates a shift in the direction of greater conservatism--and thus it is highly doubtful whether the fact that a Republican administration was elected in the United States can encourage us to continue to instate a conservative regime in Israel.

The Likud, so it seems, also takes Reagan's campaign declarations seriously. Its members quote all of Reagan's promises dealing with Israel--"there is nothing illegal about the settlements," "Jerusalem should remain united under Israel," "the state of Israel is the most credible ally the United States has in the Middle East," "in my administration there will be no communication foul-ups" like the one that happened during the Carter term, when the United States voted against Israel at the United Nations; and "I will make sure that the Security Council does not adopt such resolutions." Reagan's hazy statements on granting a Vatican-style status to the old city of Jerusalem are mentioned with somewhat less glee. People hang on to other unclear things he had once said regarding resolution 242 concluding that Reagan supposedly does not support that resolution and will not regard an Israeli withdrawal to the 4 June 1967 borders as a necessary basis for any regional arrangement that will be reached.

Furthermore, it is said that "the Brookings document" sponsored by National Security Adviser Brzezinski is dead and buried, but at the same time people seem to forget that the Republican counterpart is the "Rogers plan" which is also, as far as those people are concerned, a nothing to be overjoyed about.

The truth can be said that even people in the Likud realize there is no point in relying on election declarations. However, with the naivete of a "tyro" they think--well, maybe, after all he said.... This is characteristic of the Begin government which blindly follows the magic of the word. Israeli officials well versed in U.S. politics not only disregard Reagan's election pledges, but are even able to identify his speechwriter by the nature of the promises and the contradictions of the different speeches. These officials are not currently prepared to discuss trends that would typify the Reagan administration because they are convinced that there is still nothing to say. Much will depend on who will be appointed secretary of state. It is also too premature to guess about this because the process of making appointments in any new administration (involving some 6,000 positions) is complex and prolonged and has to consider all the pressure groups constituting the coalition in the Republican Party.

Against the background of the uncertainty that characterizes the inter regnum period between election night and the inauguration of the new president on 20 January 1981, the more cautious assessments voices by Peres and Rabin sound much more convincing. Rabin did not go beyond relying on past experience--the distant past as well as the recent past--and Peres also addressed himself to the period when Israel and the United States shared views on the Jordanian option. Neither one ventured beyond that.

Generally, one may speculate that the difference between the Republicans and the Democrats--with respect to U.S. domestic and foreign goals--is not great and stems primarily from a different outlook of how to go about reaching these goals as well as from differences of personalities between the presidents and their advisory staffs. The differences, which appear to be harmful to Israel, between the outgoing and the incoming administrations are in the decreased number of avowed Israeli friends in the Senate and the existence of the possibility that the influence of those in the Republican Party with oil interests might increase.

The developments that appear on the surface, to be favorable to Israel are the trends--so it is hoped--that the United States will demonstrate a greater determination vis-a-vis Soviet expansionism in the Middle East as well as the desire to solve the regional conflict while strengthening the moderate countries' bloc and introducing U.S. influence.

If Henry Kissinger was to be the next U.S. secretary of state--or at least special presidential envoy to the area--it would be possible to predict that the "step by step" policy would be rejuvenated, the next step possibly being preliminary contacts with Syria, of all parties, rather than an impotent continuation of the autonomy talks. Successful talks with Syria would open the road for renewed contacts with Jordan and then to the resumption of the autonomy talks with Jordan's participation, or to another formula aimed at effecting a "pax Americana."

But the secretary of state could also be George Schultze, who still has no fixed position toward the Israeli-Arab conflict; or any other person who has not yet read the Camp David agreements. Therefore, guesses at this point are nothing but wild speculations. One could only estimate that the new administration will declare its adherence to the Camp David process, even if this adherence could be given varying interpretations. It would be foolish to predict beyond this.

One can further predict that if the Reagan administration manages to conduct a strong foreign policy, it will not allow Israel to do as it pleases, like the Carter administration did. During the last 3 years, the Israeli Government got into the habit of establishing settlements in the territories without restriction and adopted such legislative initiatives as the annexation of Jerusalem despite the merely passive and verbal U.S. objection. The Reagan administration will not make do with passive objection. It may be worthwhile to mention at this point the Ford administration's reassessment of March 1975, when all aid to Israel was stopped. We do not like pressures, but, after all, maybe U.S. pressure--or the threat to apply it--will prove to be a rather effective way of making us act wisely for our own sake.

NEW POLL SHOWS ALIGNMENT STILL AHEAD

[Unattributed report: "'HA'ARETZ' Election Poll: Alignment Maintains Strength; Slight Rise for Likud; NRP on Decline"]

[Text] The alignment continues to receive about 50 percent of all votes (50.3 percent). The Likud has recovered somewhat, moving up in the past month by 2 percentage points, from 19.1 percent to 21.1 percent. Continuing to fall, the NRP lost another 0.7 percent, dropping from 6.4 percent to 5.7 percent. These are the main findings of the Pori election poll, commissioned by HA'ARETZ, and conducted in the second half of October.

Had elections been held at the end of October, the alignment would have won 50.3 percent of the total vote (50.4 percent in September) and the Likud 21.1 percent (19.1 percent in September). Losing another 0.7 percent of its strength, the NRP now stands at 5.7 percent, as against 6.4 percent in September.

The following are the results of the poll, as compared with the September poll and the results of the elections to the 9th Knesset:

Party	October Poll	September Poll	9th Knesset
Likud	21.1	19.1	35.3
Alignment	50.3	50.4	24.8
NRP	5.7	6.4	9.2
Orthodox	2.9	3.1	4.7
Democrats and Shinui	1.9	0.8	11.6
Others	3.9	6.8	8.2
Minorities		Not polled	4.6
Undecided	14.2	13.4	—
	100.0	100.0	100.0

[as published]

An analysis of the undecided shows that they come mainly from former Likud and DMC voters. In the 1977 elections, 39.9 percent of them voted Likud and 12.9 percent voted for the DMC; 13.6 percent of the undecideds did not vote in the previous election.

A socioeconomic breakdown of the undecideds shows that there are more women than men among them and more persons of European or American extraction than of Asian or African extraction. There are also more persons in academic and administrative professions among the undecideds and more native born persons.

The findings reveal that the main reason for the NRP's decline is that 22.6 percent of those who voted NRP in the 1977 election "do not know" who they would vote for today. In addition, 15.1 percent of NRP voters in 1977 declared that they would vote for the Likud today, and 11.3 percent said they would vote for the alignment today.

The poll covered a representative sample of 1,200 eligible voters--men and women, aged 18 and over--who were interviewed in their homes in complete privacy.

RATIONALE FOR USE OF ISRAELI AIR POWER ANALYZED

TA041156 Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 4 Nov 80 p 9

[Commentary by Ze'ev Schiff: "Who Decides on the Bombings"]

[Text] The surprise fierce bombing raid by the Israeli Air Force near Beirut about 10 days ago raises a sensitive question about the process by which important decisions are made by Israel's political and defence hierarchy. Many asked wonderingly why Israel carried out this bombing, and former Defense Minister Moshe Dayan was actually critical of the operation. Suddenly, out of the blue, following a lengthy period in which the air force was not employed in an attack on terrorists, our planes delivered a fierce blow near Beirut. The last time the air force planes were sent up was immediately following the IDF's extensive infantry operation on the Arnun Plateau, in reaction to a terrorist shelling of settlements.

The immediate assumption was that there must be a special reason for the use of the planes near Beirut. For example, a new target of unusual importance in the war against the terrorists, or an available target which must not under any circumstances be missed. It has been 10 days then, and this was apparently not the case. The target that was bombed does indeed serve as a large terrorist base. It is not a new base. We have known about it for some time; Israeli intelligence has long known many details about the camp. We have had more than one opportunity to bomb it both recently and earlier.

Since the Israeli spokesman is limited to laconic announcements that resemble one another, it is difficult to know why the anti-terrorist offensive was expanded to the Beirut area. If a target 13 kms from that city is hit, why not strike at major terrorist targets which are, for the most part, located in Beirut itself? Has Israel decided to extend the bombings throughout Lebanon, or was this a chance operation that cannot attest to the opening of a new stage in the employment of the air force? It is doubtful whether there is a clear answer to this question within the hierarchy. At most there are diverse answers, sometimes contradictory and generally vague. It would appear that the subject was not properly elucidated to the political-defense hierarchy, despite the declaration by the prime minister and defense minister that this bombing is part of the tendency not to wait until the terrorists strike at Israel but to strike first.

So it is not surprising that this lack of clarity generated the question of whether the recent bombing near Beirut was not designed to test indirectly the meaning of the new friendship pact between Syria and the USSR with respect to territory (Lebanon) that Damascus considers a vital security area. It was Israeli experts who asked whether the new treaty refers only to an attack or a war between Syria and Israel on their border, or whether it also extends the mutual defense responsibility to Lebanon, where Syrian troops are stationed. On the other side of the fence there will undoubtedly be those who interpret the recent bombing near Beirut from this perspective.

The offensive against the terrorists in southern Lebanon, which began under former Defense Minister 'Ezer Weizman, has been successful and has yielded much military fruit. Its advantage lies in the fact that it is generally waged on a limited scale. With the exception of the extensive Arnun Plateau operation, it does not attract any special attention. Using effective commando operations, by the infantry and naval commandos, aided by limited artillery fire, the IDF strikes at the terrorists. The latter sustain losses and find it difficult to conduct offensive action. This applies to the large Fatah organization as well as to the smaller rejection front organizations, which are interested in offensive show-attacks. This success in using the commando method does not mean that the air force must never be employed, either in southern Lebanon or elsewhere.

Planes must be employed in extraordinary instances, when speed of reaction is of the essence, there is virtually no possibility of employing any other method and the target is an essential one or is dangerous in terms of potential losses of personnel. Certainly there can be no prior decision not to use the air force, thus according the terrorists a cheap insurance policy. However, if we judge the operation near Beirut by these criteria, it is doubtful whether it passes the test.

Why is there so much sensitivity about the ongoing and permanent use of the air force in the war against the terrorists throughout Lebanon? Evidently, one of the likely results--one we do not desire--of intensive Israeli air activity in central and northern Lebanon is that the Syrians will put surface-to-air missiles there. Such a situation would entangle Israel in more difficult combat and would make it harder for the air force to perform its missions. Moreover, using the air force, even with smart bombs, by its nature does not produce precise results. The almost inevitable result is that it injures innocent Christian civilians, we have no interest in injuring. Nor is this a Palestinian population that willingly receives the terrorists, supports them and serves as a manpower reservoir.

There is also a political reason having to do with the United States. Extensive, regular bombing of populated areas places us in a conflict with Washington. While we may claim that the air force does not use U.S. planes in its operations, this does not eliminate the conflict. There are certain things in the conduct of the war that are Israel's exclusive responsibility, matters on which Israel must not agree to outside intervention. However, if no essential need is involved--one in which the use of airpower is beyond any doubt--we should refrain from unnecessary clashes with the U.S. administration.

Deputy Defense Minister Mordekhay Tzipori is against the intensification of the war by using the air force. This unquestionably adds security considerations to the political considerations.

How, nonetheless, is a decision made to conduct a fairly heavy bombing raid near Beirut? In the past care was generally taken to bring such matters before the ministerial defense committee for its approval, in principle. In the war of attrition, for example, this committee gave overall approval, in principle, for certain types of action; such as penetration of the border and for the kind of bombing conducted deep inside Egypt. From time to time the committee would reexamine the issue, but approval for a separate, individual operation would come from a small team of defense personnel and ministers.

After the commander of the air force, or the director of military intelligence proposed a certain target, the chief of staff would approve it and pass it on for the defense minister's approval. In coordination with the prime minister, political approval for the operation was given. It is noteworthy that in the past the head of military intelligence was always involved in the process, and when the distribution of cabinet portfolios was different than it is today at least two ministers were involved in the decision.

Over the years there have been many changes in this process and its circumstances. Even though the war against the terrorists is permanent, it does not resemble the war of attrition, which was far more intensive. The ministerial defense committee has plenty of time on its hands today, and it need not make do only with granting broad approval in principle for operations across the border. In most cases it can take the time for a special discussion, for granting approval before each operation. This is certainly so in the case of a bombing raid near Beirut.

Another change concerns the defense hierarchy. Prime Minister Menahem Begin is doing all he can to fill the post of defense minister, which was imposed on him with Weizman's resignation. But Mr Begin is not in the best of health, and he can devote only limited time to military matters. The result is that the position of chief of staff has taken on more importance and weight than we have ever known, far more than was the case in the Eshkol and Rabin periods. Some say that Raful [the chief of staff's nickname] has virtually become defense minister. In several areas this has also been the result of his dispute with Deputy Minister Tzipori.

It bears noting that in the course of this development the military arm in the defense minister's bureau has disintegrated. Two officers who were active in the defense minister's bureau are effectively absent. The minister's adjutant, Lt Col Arye Shur, has left to attend a course. The military secretary, Col Ilan Tehila, is working part time, since he has received approval to study in a civil administration course at the same time, apparently before he leaves. The other officer in the prime minister's office, Brig Gen Efrayim Poran, who plays a central role, is busy with other matters. After he dealt with President Navon's Egyptian visit, spending much time there, he left yesterday for the United States to prepare for the prime minister's visit. The person remaining, Poran's aide, holds the rank of major and is the liaison man with the IDF. And again, the result is that the liaison work is done almost exclusively by the chief of staff.

This situation makes the ministerial defense committee all the more important. Today the committee is effectively the only body that supervises the decisions made by the defense hierarchy and balances them. The Knesset's foreign affairs and security committee is doing more than it did in the past in various areas, but it is far from properly supervising all the subjects. By its very essence, it deals more with decisions that have already been made and with operations that have already taken place. It is almost absurd that Minister Sharon, a member of the ministerial defense committee, offsets chief of staff Raful, as we saw on the budget issue. Not all the members of this ministerial committee have military or security experience, but besides Sharon the committee has another army man, former chief of staff Professor Yadin. In the present situation it is very important that this commmttee get more involved in details and not remain content with broad approval in principle for operations. It is also important that it hear, on a regular basis, the views of other IDF leaders, at least those of the director of military intelligence or his senior aides.

'HA'ARETZ' VIEWS 'FIRM HAND' WEST BANK POLICY

TA041500 Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 4 Nov 80 p 1

[Report by Yehuda Litani: "33 Restraining Orders Issued So Far Against Mayors and Notables in the Territories"]

[Text] To date the West Bank military government has issued 33 restraining orders to mayors, members of municipal councils and notables, forbidding them to go beyond the perimeters of their residences without military government permission. By the end of the week the military government had issued three restricting orders, to A'dal Ghanim, a member of the Nabulus Municipal Council and a trade union activist Dr 'Azmi ('Shu'aybi), a member of the al-Birah Municipal Council; and Khalid al('Awwad), former mayor of Qabatiyah.

A few months ago the military government refused to allow 23 West Bank mayors to leave their towns without its permission. It also forbade seven members of the National Guidance Committee--most of them residents of Ramallah and al-Birah--to leave their towns. Three editors of East Jerusalem papers were among the seven.

The restraining orders are being issued within the framework of the "firm hand" policy which has been employed in the West Bank for the past 6 months. These orders are designed to prevent the 33 mayors and notables from conducting any organized political activity and to prevent these persons from meeting together.

Five female students from the Ramallah seminar who were apprehended on 2 November while setting up a barricade of stones were yesterday expelled from the seminar until further notice, by order of the military government. Yesterday morning youths threw a stone at a military vehicle in Ramallah; no damage was caused.

The students association, the board of trustees and the teachers union at Bethlehem University yesterday set up an actions committee after soldiers had, in the past few days, demanded that Bethlehem University students show them student cards--this in accordance with a new order relating to higher education which the military government recently issued. Students who did not present the proper cards were not allowed to enter the university. It has been learned that this action has generated considerable ferment within the university, and there are fears--so it is reported--of strikes, demonstrations and attempts to disrupt order in the coming days.

PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE DATA ON WEST BANK ARABS

TA101716 Tel Aviv ITIM in Hebrew 1600 GMT 10 Nov 80

[Government press office communique]

[Excerpt] The director-general of the prime minister's office, Mr Matityahu Shmuelevitz, notes the considerable improvement in the living standard of the Arab population in Judaea and Samaria. The population today is 700,000, about half of which are under the age of 15. There are 40,000 Judaea and Samaria workers employed within the green line; 19,500 of them in construction; 9,500 in industry; about 4,000 in agriculture and the rest in the services.

Progress in education can be seen in the following data: the number of classrooms increased from 4,338 in 1967 to 7,457 in 1979; the number of pupils increased in this period from 141,735 to 253,826. In 1967 there were 37,995 persons in Judaea and Samaria with over 9 years of education; in 1979 their number stood at 120,500, the overwhelming majority of them being among the adult population.

There was also considerable progress in health services. In his memorandum the director-general of the prime minister's office notes that the number of births in hospitals increased 500 percent in recent years, today totaling 10,341, as against 2,100 in 1968. Infant mortality also decreased very significantly, with the infant mortality rate today only slightly higher than the rate within the green line.

In the final section of his memorandum to the prime minister, Mr Shmuelevitz noted data that points to the rapid rise in the living standard of the Arab population in Judaea and Samaria. In 1967 only 23.1 percent of the families there enjoyed electricity in their homes, while in 1979 this had risen to 79.2 percent. Among the Arab families 41.3 percent have an electric refrigerator, as against 4.8 percent in 1967. In 1967 there was one private car for every 300 families, while today that has risen to 13 cars for every 300 families. Half the Arab population in Judaea and Samaria today has a television set, and 20 percent have washing machines.

BEGIN RECEIVES DATA ON WEST BANK SETTLEMENTS

TA101728 Tel Aviv IDF Radio in Hebrew 1510 GMT 10 Nov 80

[Text] Some 28,000 Jewish settlers in Judaea and Samaria--this should and could be the Likud government's goal before the end of its present term. This was stated by the director general of the prime minister's office, Matityahu Shmuelevitz, who submitted to the prime minister a detailed memorandum about the situation of the Jewish settlements in Judaea and Samaria. Since the Likud assumed power about 14,000 Jews were added to the 3,200 settlers living in Judaea and Samaria in 1977. Our political correspondent Gad Becker talks with the director general of the prime minister's office.

[Begin recording] [Question] Mr Shmuelevitz, 28,000 Jews in Judaea and Samaria--should this be the goal of the Likud government before the end of its term, in your opinion?

[Answer] In my opinion, this can be done. Today, 17,400 Jews are living in Judaea and Samaria. Over the last 3 years more than 14,000 settlers have moved there. If we take into consideration the fact that the government's first year in power was used for organizing and preparations, then an average of 7,000 Jews were added annually over the last 2 years. Now, considering the budget limitations, it is not an exaggeration to ask for 10,000 or 11,000 additional Jewish settlers in the last year of the government's term. This seems to me an attainable goal. I wanted to emphasize that behind these dry figures one finds a great national act and, thank God, we have many elon mores.

[Question] There are 68 elon mores now. Do these settlements have the basic data necessary for any existing settlement in the full sense of the word?

[Answer] When one talks of agricultural settlements, they share the same problems plaguing such settlements anywhere else in the country. When one talks of communal settlements, these also share the same advantages and disadvantages of settlements in other places, in fact. Some people who live in communal settlements work outside their settlements. This happens anywhere, especially when the settlements are young. My report also touches on an analysis of the statistical data of industry. Today you can find 120 plants that supply the settlers with work. [end recording]

MILITARY AFFAIRS ON IRAN-IRAQ WAR ANALYZED

TA091350 Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 9 Nov 80 pp 9, 11

[Commentary by Ze'ev Schiff: "The Iran-Iraq War: Further Lessons"]

[Text] The war between Iraq and Iran today enters its 50th day. The fog of battle has not entirely lifted, but many details have in the meantime come to light. The war has revealed both of the fighting armies, particularly the Iraqi Armed Forces. Conclusions which had seemed unclear a few weeks ago have become clearer, and new facts have emerged. This matter is important to Israel, first of all, because of Iraq's place on the eastern front, but for other reasons as well.

It is worth bearing in mind that all we knew about Iraq before the war was that it had a large army which since the Yom Kippur War had doubled in size and had added immense quantities of arms. Its strength was doubled, and a large effort also made to develop a nuclear option. Furthermore, Iraq had vast resources for continuing the growth. We knew about the strength and the size, but very little about the level and the quality. One reason it was difficult to learn much about the army and its commanders' control was that this army carries out fewer maneuvers than do other Arab armies. Evidently, this difficulty existed not only for the Israelis but also, and apparently even more, for other Western states.

This question of what the Israeli intelligence community knew about the large Iraqi army and the anticipated war has become a sensitive issue. I referred to this matter in one of my articles, stressing that we had not known that we did not know. The Knesset's foreign affairs and security committee also discussed this subject, and following an examination the committee's chairman saw fit to emphasize the level of information Israel had. I have had an opportunity to examine this matter once again, and the conclusion is that we knew we did not know. This lack of knowledge bothered us in the past, and several steps were taken. And as for the eruption of the war, we were not in a bad situation at all, if one is to judge by the recent commentaries published in the United States and Europe.

With respect to the war itself, light has been shed on a few major conclusions. With all due caution not to exaggerate in coming up with a quick judgment, the most important lesson is that the Persian Gulf war has revealed today's Iraqi army to be a paper tiger. In order not to generalize, the strategic sphere must be distinguished from the operational sphere. On the political-strategic level, Saddam Husayn's regime made all the required preparations from the moment it decided--apparently last April--that it had to use force against Iran. The political-strategic preparation was correct; in contrast, just as failure was marked in most other areas, the army, too, failed in the operative and tactical sphere.

The intelligence sphere experienced a particularly conspicuous failure, both in field intelligence and in the appraisal of the enemy. All the indications are that they did not correctly estimate the field and ground situation and did not properly assess the various obstacles, such as swamps, rivers and the complex oil pipe system. A no less serious mistake concerned the weakness of the Iranian regime, its staying power and the reaction of the Arab residents of Khuzestan, which is the main target of the Iraqi offensive.

Nor did the Iraqis correctly predict the combat strategy that Iran would adopt after it was attacked. They were apparently totally taken by surprise when Iran, instead of reacting with ground combat, chose to open with bombings of strategic and economic targets. This completely disrupted the rules of the game Baghdad had set for itself.

But the Iraqi strategy appears to have become ill defined and confused for another reason. In the face of the Iraqi armored power, of a regular army, a force of a different nature presented itself: quasi-regular, a factor that is not spelled out or specified in the books of the regular armies. The result is that the Iraqi army could not realize its armored strength. It did not succeed in adapting itself quickly to the changing battle conditions.

Operationally, something strange happened on the ground. The war began with an air attack on 22 September, and that very night the land breakthrough got underway. The thin Iranian line was broken, but 2 or 3 days later the Iraqi army bogged down and ground to a halt. The foreign correspondents who were invited to the battlefield when the war broke out were expelled from the area the moment the difficulties began. Since 25 September, the war has been largely static.

Since then the Iraqis began declaring they had captured Khorramshahr; actually, the city fell much later and after considerable difficulties. The armored fist that operated in the south began to bog down, with its strength being manifested in much fire but little movement. This tremendous fist's potential was not wholly realized, even though it was confronted by a disbanded army which operated in small units.

In Khorramshahr the Iraqis made the same mistake the IDF did in the town of Suez [in the 1973 war]. They entered the city with armor and began to sustain losses of men and materiel. They had to transfer their special forces there, yet about a month elapsed before the city was taken. They are trying to avoid this mistake in the attack on Abadan. Following the capture of Khorramshahr the Iraqis, in fact, managed to close off three of the four roads to Abadan, while covering the fourth road with heavy artillery fire.

Of all the operational spheres, only one has been conspicuously good: the Iraqi artillery. This branch is working more than any other corps, but overall, the inter-arm and inter-corps cooperation have been poor. In contrast to what we thought at first, the Iraqis' logistical alignment is not bad. It is difficult to know about the level of the crossing of water obstacles. The Iraqis must cross a river at each of the four cities they have decided to capture (Khorramshahr, Abadan, Dezful and Ahvaz). The Karun was crossed at night, in a surprise move, and apparently they faced no real resistance.

In the ground fighting the situation at the moment is that Abadan is effectively surrounded and will likely fall. Iraqi artillery is pounding it without any consideration for the masses of civilians, among whom there are a great many losses.

In various places the Iraqis have shown that they do not flinch from attacking towns with ground-to-ground missiles (the frog or the scud). They refrain from entering a town, but await its fall while employing psychological warfare. In the other two southern sectors, Dezful and Ahvaz, the fighting is more static and the cities have not been encircled. In the country's center and north another two or three divisions, mostly infantry, are engaged in the fighting. The clashes have been small.

It is noteworthy that Iranian armor, which includes advanced chieftain tanks, has taken virtually no part in the fighting. The tanks the Iraqis captured from them were in camps. Nor have the Iraqis, for some reason, put the advanced Russian T-72 tank into battle. On the other hand, both sides have begun employing helicopter gunships. In the Iraqi army we see a curious mixture, in which Russian equipment is employed in combat doctrine learned from the Soviets, while the units' structure is of the old Western type, similar to what we saw in the past in the Jordanian army (350 tanks in an armored division, with 48 tanks per battalion; as against 250 tanks in an organized division under the Soviet system, such as in the Syrian army).

An odd affair in itself is that of the Iraqi Air Force and air defense. Clearly, Iraq's control system has failed badly, but it would be a mistake to conclude that the Iranian Air Force has gained any major victories. On the contrary, reports filtering out of the battlefield show that the Iranians have suffered immense losses in planes. They have already lost nearly 100 planes. This is approximately the same number Israel lost in the Yom Kippur War. But if we take into account the number of sorties made by the Iranian Air Force, its failure assumes large proportions. All the planes have been downed by fire from the ground (Iraq has about 100 surface-to-air missile batteries).

At first the Iranians succeeded in making many dozens of sorties every day, but their method today is one blow followed by a break of several days. The Iranian Air Force has another advantage in the field: the flight from its bases to Baghdad is about 150 kms, while the distance from Iraq's air bases to Tehran is about 800 kms.

The Iraqi Air Force reacted with peculiar slowness, and it is far from clear why it did not employ TU-22 bombers (as Iran did not employ the F-14). The Iraqi Air Force's sorties have increased recently, but it too has already lost about 50 planes.

As to the damage, the published figures range from $5 billion to $20 billion. These figures appear to be greatly exaggerated.

Nor is it clear whether, for example, the pumps in the oil installations have been damaged. The reports about the damage to the Iraqi nuclear reactor are also highly exaggerated. And it appears that Paris will again bring into play its cynical approach to develop the reactor.

The experts are already leaning toward the conclusion that this war, too, has proved again that the Western means of warfare are generally superior to the Russian weapons. Saddam Husayn has already begun making excuses, saying that the Iranians' arms are better. In any case, this augurs that in the future Iraq will invest large sums in Western equipment, such as radar systems.

While Iraq has a good infrastructure of spare parts and ammunition, Iran does not. It is true that Iraq is closed off, with the only connection being by way of Jordan and Saudi Arabia. Since they prepared large stocks of ammunition, the only shortage appears to be in refined fuel for jets, and this is not a real hardship. Baghdad is pressing France and Russia to implement the earlier arms procurement agreements. All the signs are that the USSR is transferring equipment to Iraq through other Eastern elements.

In Iran the situation is worse, even though it has ports outside the Gulf that are open to navigation. It should be borne in mind that the Iranian Navy in superior. The main difficulty concerns spare parts for planes and tanks, and the situation is particularly difficult in regard to refined jet fuel. In the past the fuel was refined at Abadan, and now the Iranians are trying to find substitutes in the small Shiraz and Isfahan installations. Nonetheless, Iran will be able to continue the air fighting for some months, though at a slower pace than at the outset.

The Iraqis are confronted with a difficult military question. In order to maintain their control over the Shatt al-'Arab, they must push the Iranians back beyond artillery range. This is not a simple matter, and even if they complete the conquest of the cities it means the fighting going on longer and longer.

The Iranians are confronted with a different kind of question, which finds expression in an internal debate. On the one hand there is Khomeyni's approach, which favors a transition to a popular war against the Iraqis. This is both as ideology and a means by which to weaken the power which is once more being concentrated in the hands of the Iranian Army. On the other hand, there is the approach of President Bani-Sadr, who favors concentrating the strength around the army, with the guerrilla war being only a secondary matter. Both approaches are marked by the feeling that there is no need to hurry into negotiations with Baghdad and with Saddam Husayn. Now a new factor has been added, which has to do with the Reagan administration's approach and with whether the Iranian militants will, in fact, release the hostages before the change of administrations in the White House. Questions exist on this matter, though these will be resolved in the not too distant future and will certainly affect the war.

EXPERT IN NORWAY TO PROMOTE BILATERAL INDUSTRIAL LINKS

LD071649 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 5 Nov 80 p 20

[Report by Ole N. Hoemsnes: "Israel Wants Increased Industrial Cooperation"]

[Text] Israel is now making efforts to increase its industrial cooperation with Norway. Israel's European industry and investment office chief, Director Avraham Kiperman, has been in Norway for a few days to hold talks with Norwegian export and industrial managers. He told AFTENPOSTEN that conditions are now good for increased industrial cooperation in several fields between Israel and Norway.

In the first phase the Israelis are now disseminating general information on the benefits Norwegian companies would receive in Israel. It is intended to hold a seminar in Norway in the spring and at it industrial cooperation will be a major topic. The mixed economic commission will also hold a meeting in the spring. Later the campaign will be directed more at the companies that could be of interest as cooperation partners.

On Tuesday [4 November] Director Kiperman had talks in Oslo with the board of the Federation of Norwegian Industry and the Norwegian Export Council. Today he leaves for Sweden to hold similar meetings.

Among the advantages that Israel could offer, Director Kiperman mentioned duty-free access to the Common Market and the United States, a highly trained and productive labor force, a modern and "up-to-date" industrial infrastructure, financial support of up to 75 percent of investment costs, the financing of research and development projects, the leasing of industrial premises at low rent and reasonable and advantageous tax arrangements.

Director Kiperman stressed that Israel is not primarily interested in exchanging industrial projects through the purchase of oil, but is on the other hand interested in discussing such proposals.

RISE IN WORK DEMANDS--For the first time in 1 year there has been a significant rise in the number of demands for workers in employment offices throughout the country. The number of demands totaled 20,000, a rise of 4,500 requests compared to the number of requests in September. At the same time, a rise was registered in the number of people seeking employment. Hence, the number of unemployed increased further in October reaching over 14,000 people. [Text] [TA051758 Jerusalem Domestic Service in Hebrew 1700 GMT 4 Nov 80 TA]

UPDATED BUDGET APPROVED--The Knesset Finance Committee has endorsed the updated state budget of 90.1 billion shekels. DEFENSE PRODUCTS EXPORT INCREASED--Israel's defense exports have recently increased considerably. In the current fiscal year they will total $1.25 billion. Deputy Defense Minister Mordekhay Tzipori said that the significant growth in defense exports stems from a series of new agreements, constituting a breakthrough and a "reaching of new horizons." Last year these exports totaled $600 million. A series of actions taken recently, and prime Israeli commercial successes have led to Israel's defense exports already totaling $1.25 billion in the current fiscal year which ends in April. These exports include products of Israel aircraft industries, the military industry, the weapons development authority, electronics firms throughout the country, as well as other plants connected with the defense industries. The new agreements (with countries which in the past did not purchase defense products on such a scale) will lead to the growth in defense production continuing next year as well. Mr Tzipori stated that another reason for the increase in defense exports has to do with initiatives of the Foreign Ministry under Yitzhaq Shamir. At the minister's instruction, Israeli ambassadors in various countries are helping defense establishment personnel reach new markets.

As a result of the increase in exports, thousands of workers have been taken on by the defense industries and the weapons development authority. [Text] [TA111236 Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew 11 Nov 80 p 1]

ISRAELI-VENEZUELAN AGREEMENT--An agreement on cooperation in rural planning was recently signed in Jerusalem between Israel and Venezuela--the first between Israel and a foreign country [to be signed in Jerusalem] since Switzerland refused to sign, in the capital, an agreement for settling the rights of Swiss citizens living in Israel. Following the adoption of the Jerusalem law and of the security council resolution against Israel on this matter, Switzerland about 3 months ago refused to sign, in the capital, an agreement settling the pension and national insurance rights of former Swiss citizens now residing in Israel. The details of the agreement were ratified by both governments, but the signing was postponed due to the Bern government's refusal to hold the ceremony in Jerusalem. Since then the question of the place for signing agreements between Israel and foreign countries had not come up until the signing of the agreement with Venezuela. The Caracas government did not object to the agreement being signed in Jerusalem. [Text] [TA111244 Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 11 Nov 80 p 2]

NATION'S LEGITIMACY QUESTIONED--A study carried out on "trends and politization among the Arab minority in Israel" shows that half of those questioned tend to reject or have reservations about Israel's right to exist. Most of those questioned identify Zionism with racism and nearly all of them would like to see the law of the [word indistinct] of the return abolished or amended. As a whole, the Arab population dissociates itself from the consensus that exists among the Jewish population in Israel on the issues of the Palestinians' right to self-determination, a withdrawal to the 1967 borders, the refugees' right to return to and settle in Israel, and the establishment of a Palestinian state alongside Israel. The study was carried out by Dr Sami (Shmu'el) Smookha, of Haifa University's Institute for Middle East Studies. This is his second study of this subject, the first having been published in the summer of 1976. The present study covered 722 Arab and druse residents throughout the country. About 60 percent of them were aged below 25; about one-quarter of them had high-school or higher education. Dr Smookha cites facts that reinforce the survey's findings: since 1967, over 400 Israeli Arabs have been arrested and convicted of terrorist activity or of collusion with the enemy. Of the 54 Arab local authorities in Israel, 20 are headed by representatives of Rakah or of the Democratic Front. All the Arab student unions were controlled by Rakah or by even more extremist groups, which issued many declarations of support for the PLO. [Text] [TA111249 Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew 11 Nov 80 p 4]

TOUGHER LINES ON ARABS--The security authorities have decided on a new, tougher line, one which forbids mayors and delegations from the territories to visit Arab countries in order to meet there with heads of the PLO and its institutions. There has been more than one instance in the past in which mayors asked for and received approval to visit an Arab country for meetings with PLO leaders. In addition, delegations from the territories were in the past given approval to take part in conferences organized by the PLO. The change came about in recent weeks, following 'Ezer Weizman's resignation as defense minister. The guiding line is not to permit official meetings with heads of an organization which Israel has declared a hostile organization whose aim is to destroy the state. In the wake of this guideline, a Gaza Strip delegation was not permitted to attend a conference which was due to be held in Algiers. The condition laid down by the military government was that the Gaza delegation go to the conference, but not meet there with PLO heads, as it had originally planned. In the wake of this ban, the trip was canceled. Instead of the delegation, other persons went to Amman, held meetings in the Algerian Embassy in Jordan, and then returned to Israel. As a result of the new directive, a trip by a West Bank personage who stated in his exit request that he intended to meet with PLO heads was canceled. NEW KNESSET FACTIONS--There are two new one-man factions in the Knesset: Yisra'el Ahat [one Israel], Mr Yitzhaq Yitzhaqi's faction, and MK Se'adya Marciano's faction which has no title. JORDANIANS PREVENT ROCKET FIRING--The Jordanian security forces recently prevented a terrorist from firing rockets at Jordan Rift Valley settlements. After a time the terrorist was arrested by the Israeli security forces, and yesterday he was indicted in the Nabulus Military Court. Military prosecutor Lt Yosef Hikri has accused Taysir Salah 'Assli, aged 21, from (Bayta) village, of having undergone training in the use of and the preparation of bombs and firing rockets at a Syrian camp for 17 days during October 1979. In early 1980, the charge sheet states, Abu-Ziyad, one of the Fatah leaders in Damascus, directed 'Assli to launch rockets from Jordanian territory into the Jordan Rift Valley, and to set an ambush for Israeli vehicles. In the indictment, Lt Hikri contends that the accused was apprehended by the Jordanian security forces en route to carrying out this mission. Taysir 'Assli is accused of having met with Yasir 'Arafat's deputy, Abu-Jihad in Lebanon and of planning attacks on Israel with him. He was ordered to go to a meeting place in Israel where he would find arms and to use them to perpetrate attacks. Two other charge sheets submitted yesterday to the military courts in Nabulus and Janin, reveal that the Israeli security forces prevented an attack on two IDF camps during the Jewish New Year [11-12 Sep 80], and the firing of an automatic weapon in a movie theater in the Caesarea area. UPDATED STATE BUDGET--Tonight the Knesset approved--by the coalition votes--the updated state budget at a sum exceeding 90 billion shekels. Of the Knesset members 50 supported the budget and 34 opposed it. Knesset member Se'adyah Marciano did not participate in the vote. Chairman of the Knesset finance committee Shlomo Lorincz--when bringing the budget for its final approval--said that prices must be frozen. If the way to attain this goal is through reaching a package deal than all those concerned should discuss it day and night until the deal is reached because the public can no longer tolerate the price hikes. ISRAEL-SAMARIA ROAD--After a long break the construction of the Samaria crossing road [khvish hotze shomron] is now being resumed. Our correspondent says that the Jewish National Fund is now completing the paving of the last section of the road between Tapuah--on the Jerusalem-Nabulus road--and Ma'ale Efrayyim. This section is 13.5 km long. When it is completed the Samaria crossing road will extend over 62 km from the Kafr Gsim region to the mountain ridge of the Jordan Rift Valley. Our correspondent adds that the completion of the road in 6 months will bring the central part of Israel and the coastal road closer to the Jordan Rift Valley and will reinforce the Israeli hold of Samaria. The Jewish settlers in Samaria say that completion of the road will make it possible for them to absorb many new families in the settlements. ISRAELI-GAZA OFFICIALS DISPUTE--In Gaza there is a dispute between Mayor Rashad al-Shawwa and the military government. Al-Shawwa hopes to receive permission to obtain $5 million through Amman for the establishment of a sophisticated printing house in the Gaza Strip and a cultural center to be named after the Gaza mayor. Our correspondent Rafiq Halabi has learned that the military government is concerned that al-Shawwa is raising the funds through the joint Jordan-PLO committee. The military government is investigating whether or not al-Shawwa is hoping to print stamps and banknotes which at a certain time could be clear emblems of an autonomous government. Al-Shawwa told our correspondent that these were false accusations because everything passes through the Israeli censorship anyway. The Gaza mayor also said that $1 million had been received from Saudi Arabia, another $1 million from Amman and the rest of the money had been raised from the Islamic conference. A senior officer in the military administration told our correspondent that al-Shawwa was permitted to operate a printing house and to publish a newspaper entitled (AL-HUDA). The dispute with Al-Shawwa is over the source of the funds, he said. [Text] [TA112013 Jerusalem Domestic Television Service in Hebrew 1900 GMT 11 Nov 80]

ARAB EMPLOYMENT STATISTICS--In October 42,363 inhabitants of the territories were employed in Israel compared with 43,257 in September. This represented a decrease of 1,697. Of these, 14,307 were employed in construction (a drop of 403), 16,760 in industry, 7,117 in services (a drop of 652) and 4,175 in agriculture (a drop of 146). This was reported by the employment service department of information and statistics. [TA081107 Tel Aviv ITIM in Hebrew 1545 GMT 7 Nov 80 TA]

SOVIET JEWS--The number of Soviet Jews that have recently left the Soviet Union has dropped by two-thirds. The average number of Jews leaving the Soviet Union now is 1,600 per month. The number of dropouts that remained in Vienna was 76 percent in September. These are the findings of the London Institute on Jewish Affairs based on the data of the first 9 months of this year. [Jerusalem Domestic Service in Hebrew 0700 GMT 6 Nov 80 TA]

TERRORIST ATTACKS--From June to August there were 74 terrorist attacks and attempted attacks both within the green line and in the territories. These involved 44 bombs, 8 in Jerusalem and 17 inside the green line. The terrorists also planted 19 bombs that failed to explode, 13 of them in Jerusalem. [Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew 6 Nov 80 p 5 TA]

U.S. AID--Because of the change of administrations in the United States, there is now apprehension that U.S. aid will not be increased by $400 million this year, as President Carter had promised. This is the fear of circles in the Israeli Embassy in Washington. In discussions held in recent months, an assurance was given that the aid would be upped by $400 million within the framework of the draft budget to be presented to congress. However, following the change in the U.S. administration, the change in the size of the budget will be postponed, the intention being to leave the handling of these matters to the incoming administration. Therefore, the outgoing president's message to congress in early January will not contain a proposal to increase aid to Israel by $400 million. Only the existing aid data will be noted. The coming days will see urgent consultations in Washington on how to prevent the loss of the $400 million promised us in economic aid for the coming year. COMMITTEE ON EAST JERUSALEM--Jordan has appointed a committee in East Jerusalem composed of five high-ranking personalities in order to be able to directly supervise activities in the eastern part of the city. Our correspondent has learned that contacts are being made with people from Judaea and Samaria to incorporate them into the committee and transform it into a kind of Jordanian replacement for the National Guidance Committee which works on behalf of the PLO. Members of the Jordanian committee include former ministers Anwar al-Khatib, ('Abduh Rahim Sharif), (Musbah al-Qasbi), former Judge (Taysir Kan'an) and educator Husni al-Ashhab. Arab sources in East Jerusalem told our correspondent that the PLO is very much opposed to the unilateral steps Jordan is now taking in Judaea and Samaria. Yasir 'Arafat sent a letter on this issue to King Husayn via the PLO commander of the military forces, Abu Jihad. However, King Husayn refused to receive the PLO messenger. EGYPTIAN DELEGATION ARRIVES--A high-level Egyptian agriculture delegation arrived in Israel last night to continue talks on increasing cooperation with Israel on this sphere. They will discuss with their Israeli hosts the development of farming in Egypt, the establishment of plants for the processing of agricultural produce, the purchase of irrigation equipment and cooperation between the two countries on the import and export of agricultural produce. The Egyptian delegation also includes a team of veterinarians who will discuss the possibility of vaccinating cattle herds in Egypt against African rift fever. PLANS TO SUBSTITUTE FOREIGN LABOR WITH QUALIFIED ARABS

Beirut THE ARAB WORLD WEEKLY in English 18 Oct 80 p 17

[Text] Kuwait is prepared to substitute its foreign labour by skilled Arabs at certain conditions, a Kuwaiti newspaper reported.

"We will dispose of skilled and unskilled foreigners as soon as adequate numbers of qualified Arabs are available," the paper quoted an informed source at the Ministry of Social Affairs as saying. "Kuwait will need sufficient numbers of trained workers for the implementation of the construction and economic projects," the source said.

Foreign employment in Kuwait and other Arab states was discussed at a conference of the Arab Labour Organisation in Baghdad last March. The Baghdad meeting agreed on the formation of an Arab Employment Agency to coordinate the inter-exchange of labour forces. The agency will be assigned to move surplus labour to where it will be needed. The meeting recommended the provision of training opportunities for Arab workers to lessen dependence on foreign hands.

Asked to comment on the likely dangers of foreign employment in the region, the Ministry's spokesman said the Gulf governments are aware of anything that might endanger security or stability.

Along with other Arabs, the Gulf states would unite in 24 hours in the face of any threat to their internal security, he added. At present, only three Arab states can export labor: Egypt, Sudan and Morocco, the paper said, adding most of them are not sufficiently qualified.

Because of labour problems Iraq had recently assigned a number of major projects to Korean and Japanese firms because their Arab counterparts will not be able to secure skilled Arab workers. This problem can only be solved through extensive training of Arab hands, the spokesman was quoted as saying.

BRIEFS

INCREASED VW-BRAZIL INVESTMENT--The West German car manufacturing giant Volkswagen is in principle willing to allow Kuwait to double its stake in VW's Brazilian subsidiary from 10 to 20 per cent, it was reported last week. Kuwait's original investment, acquired from the Brazilian company Monteiro Aranha, cost $115 billion, but the parent company, according to reports from Bonn, is not saying what price it wants for a new holding by Kuwait. This will have to be bought from Volkswagen itself, since Monteiro Aranha, the only other shareholder in the subsidiary, is unwilling to relinquish its remaining 10 per cent stake. The Brazilian firm lost about DM30 million ($19 million) in the first half, but expects to balance its account by the end of the year. DENIAL OF VW INVESTMENT--Kuwait's Minister of Finance Abdel Rahman Al-Atiki has denied that his country would be increasing its stake in the Brazilian subsidiary of the German car manufacturer Volkswagen. At a press conference in Kuwait last week, Mr Atiki said that the question of Kuwait's stake in VW-Brazil had not been raised during his visit to Latin America. There had been reports of a German offer to Kuwait to double its 10 per cent holding in VW-Brazil at the time of Mr Atiki's visit last month (AN-NAHAR ARAB REPORT & MEMO, October 20). VISA, WORK PERMIT FREEZE--The Kuwait Ministry of the Interior has issued an order indefinitely suspending the extension of new visas to foreigners "who are not under absolute necessity to enter Kuwait or who do not present sufficient evidence for such a necessity." A report carried by the London-based ASH-SHARQ AL AWSAT added that no new work permits were to be delivered either, until the completion of a study on the foreign workforce. According to an aide of the Kuwaiti Vice-Minister of the Interior, the new decisions do not affect businessmen and workers under contract. $1 BILLION PROJECTS FOR ALUMINUM INDUSTRY PLANNED

Paris AN-NAHAR ARAB REPORT & MEMO in English 3 Nov 80 p 11

[Text]

Gulf countries meeting in Doha, Qatar, last week have agreed on a long-term strategy for the region's aluminium industry which could cost nearly $1 billion. Under the auspices of the Gulf Organisation for Industrial Consultation (GOIC) government officials and aluminium company representatives have called for the construction of up to five aluminuin smelters and a bauxite refinery costing up to $800 million, as well as the establishment of a $100 million aluminium rolling mill.

The long-term aluminium smelter project is to increase Gulf smelter capacity to 750,000 tonnes a year by 1995, according to the head of Research and Project Studies at the Ministry of Industry in Bahrain. Present smelter capacity in Dubai and Bahrain is around 270,000 tonnes annually.

If past experience is anything to go by, however, the cost of the smelters may well have been underestimated by delegates at the GOIC meeting. Dubai's 135,000-tonne smelter, begun in 1976, was estimated at the time to cost its owners $300 million. By the time the plant was complete and came on stream last year, $1.3 billion had been spent. Moreover, it is doubtful whether there is sufficient demand in the Gulf region to absorb the capacity projected for the five smelters, and whether the aluminium projects would not suffer the same fate as the Gulf's ultra-modern but largely useless drydock facilities.

The bauxite refinery project, to be based either in or outside the Gulf area, is to refine between one and two million tonnes of bauxite annually into alumina, which is the raw material used in aluminium smelting. The GOIC-sponsored meeting last week ordered feasibility studies to be started on the refinery project.

It was also announced in Bahrain that the agreement to set up a $100 million aluminium rolling mill in the Gulf state was expected to be signed in December (An-Nahar Arab Report & MEMO, December 31, 1979). The mill, which is to have a capacity of about 40,000 tonnes a year, will use material from Bahrain's ALBA smelter. The mill, being built in association with GOIC, will produce aluminium sheet and strip either by the conventional pot rolling process or by a casting method. Construction of the plant should begin next year, while the production date has been set at 1983. Output will be sold mainly to Gulf countries, most of which are joining in the project.

Recently, the UAE agreed to become a joint owner of the mill project along with Bahrain, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Iraq, Qatar and Oman.

GOIC will provide 60 per cent of the mill's financing while the remaining 40 per cent will be obtained through soft loans from Gulf government development banks and funds, as well as from commercial banks.

GOIC is also carrying out a feasibility study for a petroleum coke plant, in Abu Dhabi, and a textiles fibreglass plant in Kuwait or Saudi Arabia is being considered. The output of the coke plant would be used in aluminium and steel producing factories, and that from the textiles fibreglass plant would provide rovings and chopped strands used in furniture-making and boat-building.

INDIA OFFERS SYRIA COOPERATION--Brussels, 6 Nov--India has begun taking action toward setting up a plant to produce new spare parts for the Soviet "T-72" tanks. Reliable sources in the West have recently pointed out that the Indian Government has recruited Arab capital toward that end and has even offered the Arabs technical cooperation on assembling and operating these tanks, considered the best in the world. India has signed deals for the procurement of these tanks, but has made the extension of the deals conditional upon obtaining Soviet permission to assemble the tanks in an Indian plant. The Indian armament industry has manufactured combat tanks according to a British "Vickers" company design. They are called in India "(Vigiatna)," and they closely resemble the "Centurion." The project also involves Indian-Iraqi cooperation as well as Indian-Syrian cooperation. Military experts have noted that the "T-72" is considered a revolutionary tank primarily because of its armor, described as yan armor that can withstand most types of antitank arms currently in existence." The Soviet agreement to allow the Indians to produce this tank is probably dependent on consent that a large part of the work will be done by Russian technicians or that the armor cover will be produced in the Soviet Union and brought to India for mounting. The T-72 tanks were placed into operation by some Arab and Eastern bloc armies last year. [Yoram Hamizrachi] [Text] [TA071136 Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 7 Nov 80 p 1]

SHARJAH EXPO ANNOUNCED--Sharjah, Nov. 1: Expo Centre, Sharjah, management announced today a 'first ever Grand National Fair' to be held at the exhibition centre from March 1 to 13, 1981. The fair will be open to the public and will feature displays of UAE merchants. Expo Centre president Frederick Pittera said, "The Grand National Fair will be organised as a national festival of retail sellers and buyers. We will be taking the dust out of the past Expos and Spring Fairs which are now and in the future relegated to the status of strictly trade forums of international character and applying the drama, colour and excitement of these past shows to the national fair." Pittera explained that the objectives of the Expo Centre were being tailored to meet the changing Gulf market conditions brought about by the increasing incidence and presence of exporting nations in the Middle East. "Foir this reason," he disclosed, "the Grand National Fair will concentrate on bringing in retail buyers together with retail sellers, whereas all other Expo Centre exhibitions will link worldwide manufacturers with the Gulf and Middle East agents and distributers." [as published] "Both type of events," he said will provide entertainment on all level comensurate with Expo Centre philosophy to combine 'business with pleasure'. [as published] "The Grand National Fair will be the most economical fair to be ever offered to national merchants with an exhibition base including shelf scheme stands offered at the unprecedented price of Dh. 25 per square feet together with full services." Pittera said the exhibition will combine fair and demonstrations of consumer goods with rock concerts, cinema shows, Dh. 240,000 in cash prizes, stage show, fun fair and carnival, circus acts and snack stands. INTER-ARAB COOPERATION, TUNISIAN-SAUDI BILATERAL CONTACTS DISCUSSED

[Text] The Saudi sovereign emphasizes the necessity to strengthen relations between Tunis and Ryadh to the highest levels.

Jiddah--Saudi Arabia King Khaled received yesterday at the Royal Palace of Jiddah Mr Driss Guiga, minister of the Interior and head of the official delegation of Tunisian pilgrims, who was accompanied by members of the delegation. Present at the interview were Mr Kacem Bousnina, Tunisia's ambassador to Saudi Arabia, Prince Abdallah ibn Abdelaziz, vice president of the Saudi Council of Ministers, and Messrs M'hamed Abalkheil, minister of Economy and Finances, and Hichem Nazer, minister of Planning in the government of Saudi Arabia.

At the close of the meeting Mr Driss Guiga declared: "The official delegation of Tunisian pilgrims had the honor of being received by His Majesty King Khaled to whom I transmitted a written message from the Supreme Combatant in which the Chief of State extends his respects, in his name and in the name of the Government and of the Tunisian people, to His Majesty King Khaled, to the Government and the Saudi people, as well as in the name of Tunisian Moslems to all Moslems gathered in the Holy City for the pilgrimage."

"We have made a complete review of our bilateral relations which are by the way excellent. His Majesty King Khaled emphasized on this occasion the necessity to further tighten contacts at the highest level and to consolidate them by an intensive exchange of visits between government officials of the two countries," he added.

Mr Driss Guiga went on to say that he and the Saudi sovereign talked about questions pertaining to the Arab World, particularly those relative to the internal and external security of the Arab Nation and the Palestinian cause. "His Majesty King Khaled emphasized that it is indispensable to promote the economic cooperation between the Arab countries."

The minister of the Interior concluded his statement by saying: "We have also talked on the subject of the war which at the present is opposing two countries and two Moslem people. We have expressed hope that the pilgrimage will be an occasion for the restoration of brotherhood and peace so that Moslems may reach a higher degree of cooperation and understanding, the objective being to make the cause of Islam and that of Moslems triumph."

INTERVIEW WITH DEFENSE MINISTER ON MILITARY, POLITICAL ISSUES

TA071744 Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew 7 Nov 80 pp 21, 28

[Interview with Defense Minister Ahmad Badawi at his office in a military camp in a suburb of Cairo to Arab Affairs Correspondent 'Oded Granto; date not given]

[Text] Question: Next week Egypt will start another series of maneuvers with U.S. forces. What is the difference between these maneuvers and previous ones? What is their objective?

Answer: The objective is to acquire knowledge not only about the very use of arms but also about the techniques of the use. We are sending Egyptians to study in the United States for the same objective.

Question: Does the presence of U.S. land units in the expected maneuvers indicate increased cooperation between the two countries?

Answer: Naturally. Do you know why we are cooperating with the United States? Because the United States is driving toward the achievement of peace and stability and is considered among the friendly countries that are very important to Egypt. The U.S. attitude toward us has given rise to a new climate for the development of relations based on mutual trust and respect unlike those with the Soviet Union at the time.

When the peace agreement was signed different regional reactions were triggered particularly on the part of the countries under Moscow's influence. There were even neutral countries that claimed Israel should not be trusted before it consents to a comprehensive just solution.

The outcome--dangers which are threatening to Egypt have evolved. Do you know where the threat against Egypt originates? From which direction? It comes from the direction of Libya and Ethiopia. Libya is active in Chad and this creates a threat to Sudan and Sudan is our life's artery....

It is from this point that our cooperation with the United States as one of the sources for arms supply has started. We are still resolved to diversify armament sources so as not to repeat the first mistake we made with regard to arms import from the Soviet Union only. The objective is to defend the borders, to establish stability, to guarantee peace--a weak country tempts others to attack it.

Question: Have the maneuvers with the U.S. army contributed to improved ability of the U.S. army to operate in desert conditions?

Answer: Certainly, undoubtedly. Otherwise we would not have decided on the maneuvers. The 12-plane Phantom squadron only has value or weight in a joint maneuver. When a U.S. battalion comes to participate in a maneuver with similar elements of the Egyptian army--there is no value to it other than in cooperation in the field of training. The Americans, too, derive much knowledge from us just as we do from them. The cooperation is on an equal basis. They come here and operate under our command. The Phantoms squadron established itself in Cairo-west under the full command of the Egyptian base commander and all rules apply to them; there are no deviations. We are saying this publicly so the entire world can hear.

In contrast, the Soviet Union today has bases, emergency stockpiles, arms and experts in Arab countries. They dominate these countries and have bases where none of the country's people--including the country's president--is admitted. We have no such thing. We have begun marching toward democracy and there are no secret agreements in democracy. The cooperation with the Americans does not detract anything from our sovereignty. The U.S. forces come for 3 weeks and leave, for 3 months and leave.

Question: You mentioned the Libyan threat to Egypt. Does Cairo view the stationing of the ground-to-ground missiles on Libyan territory as a threat to its security?

Answer: This surely threatens Egypt's security for two reasons: the Libyan decisionmaker is an unbalanced person while the "original" decisionmaker (namely, the Soviet Union) may control him and direct him against Egypt when it pleases.

Question: Is Egypt making preparations to forestall such a threat?

Answer: All of our preparations on the western border region are defensive by nature. We have no ambitions regarding Libya, nor an intention to attack it. Everything we are doing is intended to safeguard the border.

Question: Is it possible that Al-Qadhdhafi will acquire nuclear arms?

Answer: Through whom? A third party?

Question: France... the Soviet Union....

Answer: I do not believe the French will give him nuclear arms. France is giving Iraq nuclear energy for peaceful needs. If Libya receives nuclear arms it will receive them directly from the Soviet Union since Libya lacks the scientific basis for the development of a nuclear arms potential.

However, if Libya receives nuclear arms from the Soviet Union we also will have to receive these arms from another source. Otherwise this will be suicide for us--destruction and ruin. I will give you an example: if we receive this kind of arms the goal will not be to use it in an immoral manner but to prevent the other party from using it. In the 1967 war Israel extensively used napalm but in 1973 it did not use this since it knew we also had these arms.

Question: A policy of deterrence....

Answer: Exactly: When Mu'ammar al-Qadhdhafi attains nuclear arms so shall we, not in order to use them against Libya but in order to neutralize the Libyans and prevent them from using this kind of weapon against us. However, as far as this issue (of procuring the nuclear option) is concerned, there is no reason why we should scatter the resources and invest funds in it instead of investing in developing our country. If it is a question of life and death though, there will be no choice and no investments will be spared.

Question: Will Egypt consider extending aid to the Persian Gulf countries, for instance, in view of the war there?

Answer: Our commitment to help the Arab countries through training or with the supply of know-how and arms as defense against foreign attacks is valid and unchanged. The same applies to the common defense pacts. We are attaching great importance to the defense pact with Sudan because of the traditional ties between us and because of Egypt's interests in Sudan since the Nile is Egypt's life source.

We will also help the Arab Peninsula and Persian Gulf countries to repel an outside attack if we are asked. We shall not aid them if they are the aggressors. The purpose of the aid is to safeguard the region against Soviet control or influence.

This also applies to the installations we grant to the United States. These installations are aimed at helping countries that will ask for U.S. aid in repeling a threat by a big power, something that neither Egypt nor several Arab countries uniting together can face or cope with. We are giving facilities, not bases, to the Americans.

Question: What is your position regarding the Persian Gulf war? How will it end politically, militarily and economically? Has Saddam Husayn been mistaken in his war calculations?

Answer (categorically): I do not want to broach this subject being the defense minister of the Arab Republic of Egypt. It is clear, however, that both Iraq's and Iran's economy have been ruined as a result of the war. Even if one of the parties scores local, practical victories this will not measure up to the destruction and ruin caused to these two countries.

Our stance on this war is neutral. We do not support it since it is neither in the regional interest nor in the interest of either of the fighting parties. I am sorry the war broke out regardless of its motives and of who is right and who is wrong. This problem can be solved through peaceful negotiations and we call on both sides to reach an agreement between them. If each was content with the rights he deserved and did not want to get more than his due, the problem would have been solved without bloodshed.

Who stands to benefit from the war today? The Soviet Union. I expect the internal struggles in Iran to increase as the Iranian Communist Party, the Tudeh, is strengthening and awaiting the weakening of the fighting sides. Then it will proceed to do its bit....

Israel's intransigency regarding a just solution to the Palestinian problem contradicts the Western world's policy, contradicts the policy of peace and stability and enables the Soviet Union to penetrate the region as an "arms dealer."

Had the Palestinian problem been solved, the friendship agreement between Syria and the Soviet Union would not have been signed. Some say a solution to the Palestinian problem is in U.S. hands. Others claim this is not true and one should solve the problem through war. The source of weaponry for war is the Soviet Union and [in return] it should be given influence and bases--even up to the point of giving the Soviets the chance to change the social regime in an Arab country.

Today, after the Camp David agreement was signed and the problem will be solved by peaceful means it will become clear that the road followed by Egypt with the help of the United States is the one to success.

Question: I thought that Al-Asad signed the friendship pact with the Soviet Union not because of the still unsolved Palestinian problem but because of the internal threat to his regime....

Answer (firmly): When the Palestinian problem is solved regimes will change. Whoever "barters" with the Palestinian problem will be removed. Today Al-Asad is saying: The Golan issue can wait 2, 3 or 5 years and in the meantime he is taking advantage of this situation to use violence (terror) against the Persian Gulf countries to extort huge sums of money. In other words, he is bartering with this problem. When the Palestinian problem is solved, what will be "bartered" then? The Palestinian problem is the cornerstone and there is no doubt about this. We have to prove to all the countries claiming they need the Soviet Union since their existence is in danger that they are mistaken. A solution of the problem by peaceful means is the positive way.

Question: Can we say that when the Syrian regime is changed that it will be easier to solve the Palestinian problem?

Answer: The opposite is true. Al-Asad made an agreement with the Soviet Union and "is bartering" with the Palestinian problem. Al-Asad is doing everything to remain in power and rule. However, when the problem is solved, they will have nothing to chatter about. One will be able to greet them. Al-Asad represents an 'Alawite minority in Syria and he has signed a pact with the Soviet Union in order to keep his throne although he is not acceptable to the decisive majority of the Syrian people.

It is obviously not in the USSR's interest to have regional stability prevail since it is making use of the disorder and is complicating the peace process. (General Badaqi emphasizes that the Palestinian state will not be communist or given to Soviet influence and will never think in terms of posing a threat to Israel.)

Question: And the Palestinian National Charter?

Answer: Not everything the Palestinians say reflects their real policy. Today you are hitting and attacking them in Lebanon. I foresee an Israeli operation in southern Lebanon. Later the Lebanese are hitting them [the Palestinians] and the Syrians take over. Where will the Palestinians go? They have not received anything to date and when we achieve a just solution they will come to the negotiations in spite of the wish of any country.

Question: Is the autonomy agreement a reasonable solution?

Answer: A full autonomy is needed. Where in the world have you heard of autonomy for people and not for land? The Palestinians want full autonomy and you are establishing settlements. An occupation regime exists [in the territories] and the Palestinians are being driven out of every place.

Question: If Israel and Egypt achieve an agreement on the autonomy after a second Camp David conference, what will happen if the Palestinians reject this solution?

Answer: Who will reject? Every country has an extreme minority and a large majority that would accept the just solution. There are elements who do not want to solve the problem everywhere. (smilingly) Are there not Israeli elements who do not desire a solution to the problem?

How will the Palestinian state threaten Israel? The East and the West are Israel's guarantors and talk of liquidating Israel and throwing it into the sea is empty talk. The entire world, both East and West, will not agree to the destruction of Israel. We, too, will not agree and we have a word of honor that we adhere to. We signed on recognition of Israel and that is it. Israel is a state that exists and is legal. (Badawi is not overly impressed by the extreme minority, as he puts it, within the Palestinian camp. He rejects the assumption that the establishment of a Palestinian state will attract Palestinian immigrants.)

Question: As far as King Husayn is concerned, the impression is that he prefers to go in the direction of Iraq and Soviet influence rather than taking part in the peace talks.

Answer: It is naturally my hope that he will join the negotiations; however, Husayn is now going against the interest of the entire region. I am convinced that the king's steps of rapprochement toward the Soviet Union are a mere maneuver.

(Badawi entertains strong indignation against the Israeli accusations directed at Egypt and stresses the slowness of the normalization process. He is angry about reports in the Israeli press according to which Egypt stopped tourism from Israel to the region of St Catherine's.)

Answer: We agreed on tourism to St Catherine's. As regards the Israeli tourists we said: Welcome. We said, however, that as far as foreigners are concerned they will come in through Egypt's official entrances, namely, like the citizens of any country we maintain contacts with.

This story has been misused by you in Israel. The press has said that Egypt stopped and prevented tourism and did not say that foreigners only will enter through Egypt while Israel will continue as usual. Why didn't Israeli official circles release a denial about this? There are dozens of tourist companies in Egypt and they are pressuring us--how will they work and what will they profit from?

Why should Israel not be like Greece, Italy or France, or like our relations with Libya? In this latter case we bring the tourists as far as the Al-Sallum border checkpoint and from there they travel by Libyan cars or buses. This whole arrangement with the foreign tourists Israel drove to St Catherine's was temporary. We have to make our living. We cannot allow foreign tourists to go through Israel. To give Israel a preferred status deals a blow to our honor.

Your adherence to temporary arrangements is turning into a permanent thing with you and this will oblige us in the future not to make such arrangements. All in all we have to progress gradually in the direction of normalization in relations. We did not, for example, prevent you from promoting tourism allowing swimming and diving, for instance, in the Ra's Muhammad area despite the fact that this is a buffer zone. All this profits the Israeli tourist companies while the Egyptian companies suffer from a lack of income and pressure us.

What is happening? Why all this commotion?

Look at the question of water supply to Sharm al-Shaykh. We are giving the Israeli settlement in Sharm al-Shaykh 1,700 cubes per day and take 500 cubes. You say: raise the quantity. How will we go about doing that? You should remember we have forces as well as citizens there. You still claim that we are withholding water from you. You later contended that 50 cubes of water of the allocation you receive leak on the way. I said: Well then, we will increase your quantity by 100 cubes so that you will have a surplus.

I do not understand what this spitefulness is for.

Normalization is proceeding well in general. Everything started early. We made nine agreements; after 3 months we began implementation. According to the agreement the negotiations should have begun 6 months from the day of withdrawal and could have lasted 1, 2 or 3 years.

We gave you a short aerial corridor over Port Sa'id during visits by important personages. (emphatically and raising his voice) There is no country and no country's president at whose disposal we put a short aerial corridor. Any president must go through the international corridor.

What does all this indicate? It indicates there are facilities, there is understanding, and what do we get in return?

Question: Is it possible that military-strategic cooperation will be established between Egypt, Israel and the United States in the future for the maintenance of regional stability?

Answer: Military cooperation is a big word with many aspects. Do you think to yourself that we will talk today of military cooperation when Israel is still controlling part of our land and has not yet led to a just and comprehensive solution to the Palestinian problem?

Question: Also regarding the exchange of know-how?

Answer: This relates to all spheres. There is the sphere of cooperation. We met and jointly implemented the military clauses of the Camp David agreement. This is a kind of cooperation but can one talk of cooperation when he is still under occupation? This is an issue that can be discussed only at a later stage. Today one should still create the climate, the appropriate circumstances and the mutual trust, on the one hand, and to remove the factors of struggle, on the other. First, the Palestinian problem should be solved. The main goal is the implementation of the peace agreement.

Now one need not talk of military cooperation. This is not an urgent goal. If I talk of military cooperation today, under the present circumstances when my land is occupied and the Palestinian problem is still unsolved, I will be accused of treachery.... When peace and security prevail in the region there will be various kinds of cooperation among the regional countries.

I hope that the friendship between us will last and that problems will be solved. This is the best guarantee. President Al-Sadat declared that the Yom Kippur War was the last one and that all problems can be solved by peaceful means.

Question: Are you considering a visit to Israel?

Answer: So far, as a result of circumstances I have not been fortunate to visit Israel. Former Defense Minister Kamal Hasan 'Ali stayed in the United States for 70 days and continued to receive treatment later as well. All that time I substituted for him here and could not leave Egypt. I have no objection to visiting Israel. I only hope that at the same time good circumstances will also be created concerning a solution to the Palestinian problem.

KHOMEYNI'S POWER BASE SEEN DETERIORATING

Brussels SPECIAL L'EVENTAIL in French 31 Oct-6 Nov 80 pp 18, 20

[Text] Iran has been an unceasing cause for concern in the world for nearly 2 years. The Islamic revolution, the taking of the hostages, and now the war with Iraq have significantly contributed to destabilizing a vital region and to provoking disturbing tensions in the world.

The course of political change in Iran since the departure of the shah was at first surprising, then disturbing, to observers of the world scene. For many, the regime of the Ayatollah Khomeyni seemed destined to last but a very short time. Now, it has been just a bit less than 2 years that intransigence and fanaticism have held sway in Tehran.

Today, the problem of the American hostages returns to center stage. The question "Why?" must be asked. It will soon be a year since 50 of the personnel of the American embassy in Tehran were captured and held hostage. During that time the most elementary rules of international law have been scoffed at by the Iranian authorities with a nonchalance that leaves one gasping.

It may thus seem surprising that the fate of these hostages should be on the point of being resolved on the eve of the American elections and at a moment when Iran finds itself confronted with serious problems. So events are at a decisive turning point.

It appears more and more that Iran needs to shore up its prestige abroad, as the country is in bitter conflict with its Iraqi neighbor. The authorities in Tehran are looking for external support, for beyond the local defeats of the Iranian army, it is the prestige and authority of Khomeyni that could be hardest hit. Moreover, Iran needs money, as its principal source of revenue, oil, is almost completely dried up because of the conflict with Iraq.

The liberation of the hostages will undoubtedly entail the unblocking of Iran's assets in the United States. That would give the Iranians liquidity and therefore the army could be given resources to battle against the Iraqi enemy.

For in Tehran it is believed certain that an Iraqi victory would strike a fatal blow to the Islamic revolution. The heretics of Saddam Hussein would triumph over the followers of God! The Iranian people could be subjected to a painful awakening, and might even open their eyes! It is therefore indispensable for the Iranian regime, in absence of victory, to be assured of the potential aid needed to forestall such a situation. Let us not forget that many of the Arab (and Muslim) countries have clearly sided with Iraq. This includes Saudi Arabia, Jordan and the Gulf States.

The question of the hostages thus presents itself at an ideal time for enhancing Iran's image, if somehow a suitable solution can be adopted.

But, beyond this aspect, it also could have an effect on American political life. The freeing of the hostages might in part facilitate the reelection of President Carter. For this liberation would be considered by the public as a personal feat of Jimmy Carter. And he certainly understands this. For some days rumors have flown around Washington that negotiations were under way with Iran on liberating the hostages. Even though the Iranian prime minister denied it, the American public is whispering that "where there's smoke, there's fire," and that in fact some talks are being held right now. Such ideas, in case the hostages should be freed before the elections, would make it possible for the president to come out as the principal architect of their release. His chances of winning a second term would perhaps thus be enhanced. Not to mention that Washington could bring more specific support to Iran. Presently, the United States has contented itself with declaring its support for Iranian territorial integrity, without condemning "the Iraqi aggression." Moreover, and despite the absence of diplomatic relations with Iraq, there have been contacts between Iraqi and American diplomats.

Power Struggle

If the Iranians are tenaciously defending themselves against the Iraqi enemy, one should nevertheless not be fooled: their unity is only a facade. The internal political situation of Iran is far from being rosy, and it appears more and more [clearly] that a power struggle is in process among the principal Iranian leaders.

There is first of all the open struggle between President Bani Sadr and Prime Minister Ali Radjai. And behind the personal struggle is a struggle between lay and clerical factions. Let us not forget that it is the Parliament that has chosen the prime minister and imposed him on the president of the republic, even if the latter was ultimately chosen by the Iranian deputies. Nevertheless, it is clear for all to see that the two men have diametrically opposed ideas and that they are both jockeying for position as eventual successor to the imam Khomeyni. The latter, by contrast, is for the moment rather quiet and contents himself with watching the two protagonists while keeping his own power.

President Bani Sadr himself is quite aware of this situation, and thus he tries to maneuver skillfully, while at the same time avoiding antagonizing the religious hierarchy. It was however against the advice of this hierarchy that he ordered the release of a number of superior officers and advisers imprisoned for having served the shah, to help in the conflict with Iraq. In case of Iranian victory, the president would then look like the national savior. And, too, the army and its officers would be rehabilitated. This is precisely what Radjai and Khomeyni want to avoid. Their power would be greatly shaken, if this were to happen. And this is where the second conflict is taking place, between the Guardians of the Revolution and the regular army.

The Guardians of the Revolution are the personal troops of the imam Khomeyni. For the moment they are suffering the heaviest casualties in the Iran-Iraq conflict. They are, in fact, in the front line of the battle and to them have been entrusted the most dangerous missions.

They have been brought to such a pitch of fanaticism by the mullahs that they are going to their death with incredible nonchalance. Which enables them to put up ferocious resistance. By dying, these guardians are becoming martyrs who have given their lives for the victory of Good over Evil. By presenting "his" guardians as the martyrs, as the sole defenders of Islam, Khomeyni wins the recognition of the people and impedes any resurgence in the prestige of the regular army.

And, too, President Bani Sadr, commander in chief of the army, can no longer be considered the savior of the nation. The imam is killing two birds with one stone.

Nevertheless, it must be expected that this struggle will become still more pronounced, because of the disastrous economic position of the country, which will be burdened still further by the consequences of the war with Iraq.

Who Manipulates Khomeyni?

In analyzing Khomeyni's attitude, one asks oneself what he is after. What goal is he trying to reach?

At the start of his reign over the ancient Persian empire, some believed that he served Moscow's interests. It has since become apparent that this is not the case, since the USSR is, along with the United States, branded with infamy. So, what is the imam looking for?

Beyond personal vengeance, one might easily think that he aims at "exporting" his Islamic revolution at overthrowing the regimes he deems to be "corrupted by the West." The final victory of Islam over the heretics is certainly one of the deepest aspirations of Iran's ruler. Most of the other Muslim countries fear the Islamic revolution and its consequences. Few are tempted to court the economic chaos Iran has experienced. Why do the Muslims refuse to follow the old ayatollah? And what if Islam were but a pretext intended to mask another aim? Is the ayatollah acting on his own, or is he manipulated behind the scenes? These are questions which at present cannot be answered. Only the future will tell. Alas!

CHARTER OF NEW ADMINISTRATIVE SYSTEM PROMULGATED

Aim of Proposed System

Tehran SOBH-E AZADEGAN in Persian 6 Sep 80 p 5

[Text] To promote the goals of the Islamic Revolution and to annihilate the traces of the former oppressive regime in the administrative system of the country, the Union of the Islamic Associations of Government Employees has, within the limits of its ability, formulated an organizational structure in order to change the government system in conformity with Islamic principles and the Constitution.

The Overall Aim of the Proposed System:

The realization of the rule of the oppressed on earth; decentralization of the economy and services; unity of leadership and command, insuring self-sufficiency in all spheres of activity and the severance of economic and political affiliation and dependence; complete ouster of colonialism; and, moving from the status of consumer to that of producer.

Another important point is that, by drawing on Principle 133 of the Constitution which provides that the number of ministries and the scope of their powers shall be determined by law to be ratified by the Islamic Consultative Assembly (Majles), and also by considering the other principles of the Constitution and the principal needs and logical links in the organizational network, we have changed the ministerial posts and ministries and have modified their functions. Cursory reference is made to these changes in the attached proposal on the organizational structure. The attached organizational chart does not reflect the details of the structures of the ministries and departments. We have limited ourselves to the overall organizational chart. The detailed charts of the ministries and departments shall be submitted after necessary amendments.

At this juncture we, the members of the Union of the Islamic Societies of Government Employees, declare that we shall be at the service of the esteemed deputies of the Majles with all our resources. We shall attend the meetings of the deputies at any time called by the Majles in order that we may give any necessary explanation regarding the proposed system and exchange views for its perfection.

We pray to God to grant us the opportunity to discharge our indebtedness to the Revolution and to make the contribution that we have pledged.

Union of the Islamic Societies of Government Employees

Planning Government Structure

Tehran SOBH-E AZADEGAN in Persian 6 Sep 80 pp 5, 6

[Text] As this structural design has been prepared on the basis of the needs of the society and of the people of the rural and urban areas—prepared in such a way as to touch and interface these needs in an Islamic context—the features of the overall design are described from bottom to top:

1. The furnishing of the various production, distribution and consumer services to villagers so that while the services are supplied the servicing energies are economized and the way is paved for the attainment of self-sufficiency and enhanced productivity. Therefore, about 20 executive units shall be created at the county level;

2. Required service units not mentioned at the county level for economizing on resources shall be created at the level of districts—located in one of the counties in the district. Such services include road building, construction and judicial court services;

3. The first phase of planning and designing takes place at the city region level (shahrestan) in the following manner: all statistics, proposals, operational reports and lists of the requirements of villages shall be prepared at the levels of county and district by village and district councils. Once these collected data are integrated they are sent to the city region's Designing and Planning Offices. The latter will review the data and prepare the necessary projects by taking into consideration all the timing and locating criteria and by considering the possibilities and priorities. The projects will then be sent to the provincial governments for final review. The city region offices shall independently approve and implement some of the projects. In addition, the governor shall put into effect through the lieutenant governors and operational groups the projects approved by the governor general's office. The councils shall play an effective part in the preparation and formulation of projects and in supervision over the projects at all governmental levels and at the county level, and even in the actual execution of the projects.

4. Specialized education complexes at the level of training technicians and more highly specializing experts as required in the region shall be set up at provincial and city region centers so that the material as well as employed specializing human resources available in cities may be used for training and securing the required human resources of the various parts of the city region (by training experts in educational complexes in the city region);

5. At the provincial level, the staff sections of each general department shall be set up to integrate the collected data, to design and plan, and to supervise and evaluate. The staff sections shall function under the supervision of the governor general and in cooperation with the relevant deputies of the governor general. They shall not interfere in the operational activities except in cases necessarily instructed by the governor general and in such cases as the nature of the work involves them in the operational area as well;

6. At the national level, all the ministries shall be exclusively engaged in staff work. Each shall be in charge of the overall coordination, designing and planning, high supervision and evaluation, and in charge of the final phase of the implementation. They shall, while attending the regular ministerial council meetings, integrate and schedule the projects and estimate the necessary appropriations on the basis of the relevant criteria. Then they shall formulate the budget with the help of the Ministry of Finance and approve the projects and submit them to the Prime Minister for implementation. The Prime Minister shall put the projects into effect through governors general and governors;

7. At all governmental levels, measures have been taken to guard against overlapping of the functions of the executive departments and units and of technical sections. The principle of assigning the duties to the specialists has been kept in view. Also, in order to optimize the utilization of the expertise and the resources of some sections and ministries with near-similar duties and with the needs of the similar lines of expertise, we have merged these sections and ministries. On this very basis, the Ministry of Road and Transport has been merged into the Ministry of Housing and Urban Development so that by using the same experts, greater service may be rendered for road building and for observing the urban development criteria in rural renewal so that the standard designs and plans in public works may expedite rural development.

8. The Ministry of Commerce has been divided into the Ministry of Domestic Trade and the Ministry of Foreign Trade. Because of the crucial importance of creating an effective distribution network for consumer goods, of striking a balance between consumption and production, of maximal utilization of land and sea transportation and of public warehouses all over the country and of the cooperative societies for production, distribution and consumption tied in with a nationwide plan, a Ministry of Domestic Trade is to be established in order to put an end to the current chaos. All export and import operations shall be carried out on the basis of a scientifically correct program and with a perspective on the foreign policy of the country and on the basis of the ratifications of the Majles. These considerations call for the establishment of a Ministry of Foreign Trade to undertake foreign trade operations. Therefore, the sale of petroleum and petroleum products is also assigned to this ministry.

9. The Ministry of Industries and Mines: Because of urgent need for the integration of all industrial activities due to the interrelationship of various industries as far as primary and intermediate commodities and capital and consumer goods are concerned, all the industries and mines shall come under the supervision of the Ministry of Industries and Mines. The Minister of Industries and Mines shall appoint supervisors for various industries such as steel, petroleum and petrochemicals, and for other heavy and light industries.

10. The Ministry of Education: Due to the need for integrated planning of and for a linear coordination among the various levels of education from preschool to postgraduate, all these activities shall be planned under one minister. Sport training and matters related to physical education shall be handled by this ministry also;

11. The Ministry of Economic Affairs and Finance: Part of the functions of the Planning and Budget Organization in the phase of budget formulation and allocation shall be incorporated into the staff functions of this ministry;

12. The Ministry of Labor: In the light of the fact that there are functional similarities and also with a view to the fact that all employment affairs should be coordinated, the Organization for Employment Affairs is disbanded and all its personnel and functions will be transferred to the Ministry of Labor. Thus any job candidate shall refer to the recruitment department of the Ministry of Labor and any governmental or nongovernmental organization shall use the Labor Ministry's Recruitment Department as a clearing house for their recruitment purpose. Each job candidate shall be issued a recruitment book with a serial number. The book shall show a work record and an employment status of the worker at any given time and at any place. The same book shall be used for entitlement to unemployment benefits and retirement pension under Principles 28 and 29 of the Constitution. Thus no element of the labor force will be found without a clear employment and living status, nor will it be found to be drawing more than one salary from more than one employer. The formulation of the laws and procedures of employment and the coordination of its various affairs shall be the responsibility of the Ministry of Labor and its various provincial labor departments while their enforcement shall be the charge of the city region labor departments. Generally speaking, the execution of affairs shall be delegated to the lower levels while a greater proportion of planning and decision making shall progressively be made at higher levels.

13. The Ministry of Interior: This ministry shall have the responsibility for coordinating the implementation phases of all national plans and for unity of command. Fortunately, the grounds have been prepared by some of the bills approved by the Islamic Revolutionary Council for the formation of the provincial technical councils and of the rural development coordination councils at the provincial and city region levels, and for the formation of recruitment centers in the provinces and for the formation of health planning task forces as well as those for activating the small industries in the provinces and city regions.

14. Water Resources and Distribution Facilities Ministry: One of the biggest problems of the country is to meet the water shortage and to maximize the utilization of the surface, river and underground water resources and to recover and filter urban sewerage water for use in agriculture; to supply water for drinking and farming; to create irrigation networks and to build dams and the relevant facilities. These problems justify the establishment of the said ministry.

15. With a view to Principles 152, 143, 110, 157, 158 and 8 of the Constitution, and with regard to the nature of the ministries in question, the proposed design is as follows: The Minister of Justice shall perform his duties under the supervision of the High Judicial Council and shall estimate and secure its finances through the Ministry of Finance.

The Ministry of Defense shall work under the High Council of Defense and obtain its finances from the Ministry of Finance. As regards foreign policies, a High Council of Foreign Policies shall be set up to oversee the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

16. Formation of the High Council of Foreign Policies: By virtue of Principles 152, 143, 110 and 113 and by considering the nature of the work of the said council, it is suggested that its membership comprise the President, the Prime Minister, a Mojtahed [religious jurisprudent] familiar with international affairs and representing the Velayat-e Faqih [Religious Guardian-Jurisprudent], an expert on international economics, an expert on international politics, and an expert on international defense--each delegated by their respective ministries.

17. The High Council of Religious Direction or the High Council of Islamic Guidance shall be established by inference from the provision of Principle 8 of the Constitution and on the orders of the Leader at the time of the Provisional Government and on the basis of the wish of the majority of the deputies of the Islamic Consultative Assembly (Majles) and as required by the perceived nature of such a council. Its composition shall be as follows: 1. a Mojtahed, well informed on all guidance and educational matters, representing the Velayat-e Faqih; 2. a qualified person suggested by the High Judicial Council (Judiciary); 3. a qualified person introduced by the executive branch; 4. a qualified person proposed by the Islamic Consultative Assembly (Legislature); 5. a qualified person representing the Revolutionary Guards Corps. To implement the provisions of Principle 175 of the Constitution, the Radio and Television, publications and propaganda and the mass media shall be directly supervised by this council. The Ministry of Guidance Affairs and Islamic Propaganda shall be overseen by the High Council of Islamic Guidance, and the Endowment Organization, too, shall be part of the said ministry. It should be further noted that the latter four ministries shall coordinate their budget formulation with the Ministry of Finance and the other ministers while the final decision shall rest with the Islamic Consultative Assembly.

18. The High Economic Council: By virtue of Principles 43 and 44 and with a view to the need to formulate a coordinated general economic policy at the national level and to coordinate the economics of the country with the foreign policy formulations, a High Economic Council must, of necessity, be set up under the supervision of Velayat-e Faqih comprising of the following members: (1) the President of the country; (2) the Prime Minister; (3) the Minister of Commerce; (4) the Minister of Industries and Mines; (5) the Minister of Agriculture; (6) the Minister of Finance; and (7) a Mojtahed specializing in economic affairs and representing the Leader. Bureaus of Economic Experts shall work under the High Economic Council. These bureaus prepare the preliminary plans and the overall policy of the nation's economy on the basis of the data supplied by all the ministries. The bureaus shall also forward to the Prime Ministry and the relevant ministries the projects approved by the High Economic Council.

Regarding the Reconstruction Campaign

At the levels of the district and the country and where there is a shortage of manpower, the Bureaus of Planning and Evaluation at the city region and provincial levels and in the capital shall draw on the forces of the Reconstruction Campaign as far as possible. On the other hand, since the employment identification cards under this new system eliminate the permanent employment arrangements and give priority to temporary employment, and since wages would be rated according to expertise, experience, knowledge, need, merit and efficiency and would be payable on a purchase order basis, all forces shall have a campaign posture and,

God willing, all the employees in government organizations shall, under all circumstances work like campaigners.

National Mobilization

In order to implement the national mobilization project in as complete and expeditious a manner as possible, and in order to create a 20-million strong army, to prepare the basis for the equitable distribution of the public provisions, to establish a strong and integrated information network by the people themselves, and to enable the people to take meaningful and planned part in the supervision of network affairs and in occasional implementation thereof, a separate plan has been prepared. The latter makes for the creation of real People's Councils conforming to the Islamic principles. For its nature, the National Mobilization network shall be under the direct supervision of the executive ranks.

Islamic Guidance and Propaganda

At various administrative levels the elements of Islamic guidance shall be embodied in the planning and coordination offices, while at the lower levels these take executive form for guiding the people to grasp the Islamic culture and the political, social, economic and ideological issues prevalent in the world and in the community of nations. They shall have the responsibility of the mass communication at their own levels.

This plan provides for national inspection of satisfactory performance of affairs down to the district level.

Executive Deputy

It is the duty of this government authority to assist the Prime Minister in implementing the projects and programs approved by the Council of Ministers and transmitted to the ministries concerned. Other deputies shall assist the Prime Minister in handling and expediting the various projects and programs at a ministerial level. It is noted that the planning and controlling of the maritime communications (shipping, navigation, etc.) shall be the responsibility of the Ministry of Foreign Trade. The religious assertive and prohibitive guidance to be given the government by the people shall be channeled through the representatives of the councils at various levels. Administrative departments, too, shall guide their operational lines in keeping with their organizational ranks.

FATE OF NAPOLEON'S, HITLER'S ARMIES PREDICTED FOR IRAQIS

Tehran ETTELA'AT in Persian 26 Oct 80 pp 1,2

[Text] Modern history records that invading armies, without exception, have been defeated or destroyed. Examples are Napoleon's and Hitler's armies, both of which were annihilated on Russian soil.

"Khuninshahr" ["The City of Blood," formerly Khorramshahr] still continues to put up resistance. All newspaper headlines read: "Khuninshahr Puts Up Heroic Resistance In The Face Of An All-Out Attack By Infidels" and "Despite Complete Occupation, Khuninshahr Continues To Put Up Fierce Resistance." Many people wonder: Will that city which has put up such a heroic and historic resistance in every of its corners fall to the Iraqis ? Will other border cities fall in the hands of the enemy ? Will the plan for the so-called 'Free Khuzestan and Arabestan' be announced ?! And finally, in view of all these losses, will Iranians be defeated? The answer to all these questions is a categoric "no!" Because of history's record: Islam has always triumphed over satanic forces. There is plenty of talk purporting that border towns may fall in Iraqi hands. In this article we can comment only succinctly on a few aspects of that eventuality.

1. Iran's border towns now exhibit Karbala-like characteristics and recall the wars waged by Imams. That is why it is not the sheer numbers of the combatants involved, but their moral values which is the determining factor in the Iran-Iraq conflict: despite the masses of Iraqi troops, with all their materiel, who have been dragged to the battlefield forcibly, through intimidation, or in a state of intoxication, Iranian war-torn towns have been putting up a fierce resistance and are still entrenched in strongholds ~~under~~ the heaviest blows from gunfire and bomb explosions. This fact confirms the Koranic verse: "With God's intervention, small groups can triumph over huge armies."

This triumph is not due to Iran's material facilities and military forces, although, in terms of magnitude, they are superior to their Iraqi counterparts. Rather it is due to the impact of values created in the hearts and minds of Iranian troops and masses. As during the wars waged by Imams "the Imams, accompanied with armies, have risen to attack the infidels and have never shown any weakness, apathy, or wavering despite considerable losses and suffering which was their lot in their divine mission. And God likes those who gallantly and stolidly wage war against the forces of evil."

2. Furthermore, we must generally bear in mind that the current war is not a very classic one: the coexistence of revolutionary, guerrilla, and partisan tactics has prevented the Iraqi troops from unhindered movements and a classic military operation. Indeed, the current war consists of various fronts, each of which is governed by particular conditions. When we hear news about the border areas, we must make it a point to find out to what specific front and particular locality that news pertain.

Consequently we can rely completely and definitively neither on Iraqi attacks nor on their "positional advances:" for various reasons, Iraqi troops have often been able to initially invade a town or an area, only to fall on their knees and flee in the face of heroic assaults by the soldiers of Islam. Under such circumstances, how can one talk of the "fall" of Khuninshahr and of the adjoining area ? In general how can one consider Iraqi troops as victorious simply because they have reached and invaded a locale ?

3. Let us suppose that Iraq's scattered forces have finally managed to invade a town or an area. There can be only three possibilities:
(a) The Iraqis will continue to attack;
(b) the Iraqis will remain in their positions;
(c) the Iraqis will retreat.

Possibility (a).- This is not feasible:first of all Iraq wishes only to occupy certain strategic border points so that it can rely on them to establish a base allegedly aimed at weakening, dismembering, and toppling Iran's central government, thus ridding America of its big "pain in the neck." But apart from that, Iraq is simply incapable of continuing the war. Iraq has not yet occupied even the few points that are closest to its borders. Moreover, it has lost thousands of lives and billions of dinars in damages. Its military forces, economic facilities, and vital supply routes have been destroyed. If Iraq continues the war, it will destroy its own army and bring about the downfall of the Baath government. By now the Iraqi army if fully aware that a virtual hell awaits it in every inch of the Iranian soil; the Iraqi army is equally well aware that its "overlord," the U.S. army, is quite mistaken in indulging in fancies such as visions of Iraqis advancing towards Tehran and other cities !

Obviously, with the continuation of the war, the fatigue, pressures, and losses of the Iraqi army (which is not enthralled with war) are bound to mount and, as a result, the Iraqi army will become war-weary and "war-wise." It is well known that two of history's most powerful armies, those of Napoleon and Hitler, have been decimated and annihilated in a like fashion on Russian soil. Furthermore, there is a considerable amount of awareness and awakening among Iraqi masses, which is snow-balling and spreading. And, as Imam Khomeini has said: "Most likely, a revolution similar to that of Iran will soon sweep Iraq."

Possibility (b).- One must bear in mind the fact that to hold on to an invaded area is considerably more difficult than to attack and simply invade it. History recounts that conditions prevailing at the time when an army attacks and invades an area are never the same as those when that army decides to stay on and keeps occupying it. Examples are: the British army during the colonial era; America's imperialist army in Vietnam; and the Soviet army in Afghanistan (subsequently the official Afghan representative at the United Nations denounced the Soviet invasion).

If the Iraqis are able to temporarily hold on to a locale, they shall see -- as they have no doubt already seen -- that its continued occupation entails considerably greater losses than those they have so far sacrificed for imperialism's sake ! The Iraqis may invade cities all right, but then the Iranians will surround those cities and clobber the Iraqis on land and by air, making it impossible for the Iraqis to defend themselves. Thus, Iranians will transform every war-torn city into a graveyard of thousands of American mercenaries, and will annihilate the enemy. Such a sucess will certainly rank as the most novel and extraordinary military operation in recent modern history.

Possibility (c).- If the Iraqis are defeated, there will be no more raison d'etre for Iraq's Baath government. Unfortunately Saddam's insane regime continues to be an American lackey and is bent on fighting on until the whole Iraqi army is decimated. We say "unfortunately" because we do not wish to see the Iraqi soldiers killed. However, under the circumstances, we shall be forced to crush the Iraqi troops and their leaders.

In any event, Iranians shall be victorious: in addition to achieving martyrdom, we shall triumph because our ideals and principles are noble, lofty, and durable. In other words, "all our actions are motivated by our creed." As for the Iraqis, whether they invade an area or not, they are doomed to defeat because either Islam's heroes will liberate that area through repeated attacks or, like Napoleon's or Hitler's troops, the Iraqis will be buried in the snows of Western Iran, will suffer considerable losses and an ignominious defeat, and will be forced to retreat. And the Iraqi people will topple the Baath clique and stop the war.

LISBON PAPER REPRINTS QADHDHAFI 2 OCTOBER INTERVIEW

Lisbon EXPRESSO in Portuguese 5 Nov 80 (International Supplement) pp 1-5

[Apparent text of interview with Libyan Chief of State Mu'ammar al-Qadhdhafi by EPOCA journalists Francesco Frigieri and Mauro Galligani on 2 October 1980 in Tripoli: "World War III Is Imminent"]

[Excerpt] Question: Never, Colonel al-Qadhdhafi, have the Jamahiriyah and its leader been so much at the center of international life as now. Politically, the plan for a merger with Syria is at an advanced stage; economically, there is the often threatened and always unilateral forecast of an increase in the price of oil; in military activity, there is the idea, as reported by much of the Western press, of an attack against U.S. military bases, wherever they are in the world.

Do you not believe, Colonel al-Qadhdhafi, that your importance is getting out of proportion to your country's real prospects and influence?

Al-Qadhdhafi: My role is closely in keeping with my country's needs and the contribution which it wishes to make to the plan for unity of the Arab nation. The fact is that outside Arab unity the Jamahiriyah is like a fish out of water--that is, outside its natural element.

Question: Let us discuss the merger with Syria, Colonel al-Qadhdhafi. How do you believe that the plan can succeed, since it is a matter of two countries which are over 1,000 km apart and which have been living for many years with two different economies, since Syria in an almost constant state of war, and since the Jamahiriyah is perhaps in the year 2000 of its pastoral civilization but is in year dot of the technological era?

Al-Qadhdhafi: These arguments seem to be idle and unconstructive, typical of the doctrine and interests of colonialism and traditional weapons against the plan for Arab unity. You are Italian, aren't you? Well then, if Italy had flinched at such obstacles during all the wars of independence of the last century, you would not have achieved unity today. And if it is true that history repeats itself, why should we act differently?

Israel Thinks Only of Attacking

Question: You have said, Colonel Al-Qadhdhafi, that if the struggle against Israel is not resumed as quickly as possible by the entire Arab nation, you would be prepared to join the Fedayeen.

Is that so? And do you believe, bearing in mind the policy of blocs, with the United States and Russia dividing up the world between them, that a widespread resumption of the war in the Middle East could be possible without interference?

Al-Qadhdhafi: As far as the first part of the question is concerned, I did not say that: I said, translating literally, that if the Libyan people did not accept unity with Syria, I would be determined to join the Fedayeen personally, to make my personal contribution to the struggle for the liberation of Palestine.

As far as the second part of the question is concerned I believe that, when a new war between Arabs and Israelis breaks out, if the superpowers' policy decides to interfere, this war will be transformed into a world conflict, and the blame will rest entirely with the superpowers. Take note: Palestine's protracted occupation by the Israelis is the outcome of the interference of the two blocs--of the United States and the USSR, together with France and Britain--which in order to maintain a hybrid status quo throughout the Middle East region guarantee the State of Israel objective protection and encourage its aggressive and colonialist policy: it will therefore be with them that the responsibility for a third world conflict will rest.

U.S. and USSR Squadrons Out of the Mediterranean

Question: I do not believe at all that the USSR is currently protecting Israel but, since you have always maintained that the Mediterranean is a lake of peace, I will ask you: In your opinion, the U.S. squadrons should be expelled from our seas, but should those of the USSR also be expelled?

Al-Qadhdhafi: Out with both of them. However, I would like to emphasize that, if World War III breaks out, we Arabs will not be responsible.

Question: I hope that no war will break out, but especially that no world war will break out, Colonel Al-Qadhdhafi.

Al-Qadhdhafi: Yet, in my opinion, it is inevitable.

Question: Inevitable, Colonel?

Al-Qadhdhafi: If Palestine continues to be occupied by the Israelis, if the Arabs act to liberate it and if the United States intervenes to prevent this, how can a war fail to occur?

Question: The liberation of Palestine does not necessarily imply the kindling of a world conflagration, Colonel Al-Qadhdhafi. That could only happen if the USSR intervenes militarily against the United States--something which in principle seems highly unlikely.

Al-Qadhdhafi: If the United States intervenes, Russia must necessarily intervene.

Question: Western thinking in this respect is rather more elastic, Colonel Al-Qadhdhafi....

Al-Qadhdhafi: Western thinking is seeking to drown its own fears in indifference. But I say: Pay attention, since the occupation of Palestine and consequent U.S. behavior constitute the backcloth for the outbreak of a colonial war....

Question: For the probable, hypothetical outbreak of World War III....

Al-Qadhdhafi: No. World War III will certainly break out.

Question: And when do you forecast that this war will happen, Colonel Al-Qadhdhafi?

Al-Qadhdhafi: When the Arab peoples are militarily ready.

Question: Theoretically, Colonel Al-Qadhdhafi, they are ready now, because the Arabs' superiority in numbers and arms over Israel is an obvious fact.

Al-Qadhdhafi: This means that the tragedy is near....

Question: Is the war near, Colonel?

Al-Qadhdhafi: Of course, or do you believe that the Arabs do not have the right to liberate Palestine?

Question: That is not the point, Colonel: what I wish to point out carefully is that at this moment you, in your capacity as Libyan head of state, are maintaining to a Western journalist the inevitability of a very imminent world conflict resulting from a Middle East crisis which is already virtually under way in many respects. Since this statement by you will resound in the four corners of the world, I would like to repeat to you once more, Colonel Al-Qadhdhafi: Are there not various nuances in your way of expressing yourself which I am perhaps unable to perceive and which make your reasoning less dramatic and more feasible?

Al-Qadhdhafi: The meaning which you have perceived is the correct one: the Arabs must liberate their land and war is inevitable. Only if the United States changed its policy and if the Palestinian people saw their demands satisfied could the conflict not break out. But that is impossible....

Question: Why impossible?

Do you not foresee a peaceful solution to the Palestinian problem, Colonel Al-Qadhdhafi?

Al-Qadhdhafi: Yes, but only if the Palestinians could return to their homeland....

Question: I desire this, Colonel Al-Qadhdhafi, just as I desire that World War III should never happen.

Al-Qadhdhafi: All of us desire these things, dear friend. But desiring is one thing and reality is another. I repeat to you, once more, that the responsibility for the conflict will rest entirely with the Americans and Israelis.

Malta? Italy Does Not Guarantee Its Neutrality

Question: Colonel Al-Qadhdhafi, you are head of state and leader of a people, you have a family and you have affections: so you know that this dramatic analysis of yours which forecasts times of war will provoke anxiety and fear throughout the world. Are you certain, I repeat to you once more, that you do not wish to alter anything of what you have maintained so far?

Al-Qadhdhafi: The essence of what I said is correct. Certainly our concern for international peace is great, and our readiness to do everything possible to preserve it is also great. But we are unable to change U.S. policy and to end Israeli occupation of Palestine peacefully. Therefore....

Question: Relations between the Jamahiriyah and Italy, Colonel Al-Qadhdhafi, are not at present the happiest. The Italian press and the Western and European press in general frequently accuse your country, and you personally, of decisions connected with their respective national sovereignties. In order to finally end all doubts, I ask you to answer three questions: Is it true that Italian and European terrorists of rightwing or leftwing ideological inclinations have stayed in Libyan training camps? Is it true that you personally intervened in the revolutionary committees to make them stop executing Libyan citizens who had taken refuge abroad and had not obeyed your orders to return to their country? Is it true, with respect to the Saipem II [Italian oil platform] incident, that your latest decision is to seek in the first place to drill on the Medina banks, even despite the danger of a direct military confrontation between Libya and Malta and Italy, which is a guarantor of the latter's neutrality.

Al-Qadhdhafi: This matter of terrorism and of the training camps for terrorists on Libyan territory has now become an obsessive refrain, unsupported by a single shred of evidence. I will put a proposal to you: If there is anybody in your country who has information that these camps exist in our country, I authorize him to come here, show us where they are and I myself will accompany him there. And if it is true that there are terrorists where he says, I authorize him to call me a liar and [words illegible], you will have the biggest scoop of the year. However, I must tell you that those who at home maintain that there are [words illegible] Libya [words illegible], especially when they assert that I personally have been to visit them. It is a matter, in fact, of the camp in the forest of [words illegible]. I attended an international meeting of boy scouts, whom I greeted. [words illegible] seriously, I do not mind telling you that it is our forces which need military training and that we sent our young men to the countries which supply us with arms--France, Britain, Russia and also Italy--to learn how to handle them, and then they teach others.

If this is our objective situation, how do you suppose that we can find the time, the means and the desire to train rightwing and leftwing terrorists? If we had these means, do you not believe that logically our foremost concern would be to train our own people? Moreover, by the same token, we cannot train your red and black-and-red terrorists because their ideology is diametrically opposed to ours. With respect to this matter, I wish to assure you once and for all, we are extremely strict. As far the revolutionary committees are concerned, the problem of the executions of the refugees abroad is true: I personally intervened with the committees to make them stop these actions.

As far as the Saipem II issue is concerned, I wish it to be known, firmly and officially, that we do not in fact wish to be the first to drill at Medina--on the contrary. We wish to wait until the international courts' verdict is known. However, allow me to make a polemical observation: It is not true that Italy is a guarantor of Malta's neutrality. In fact it is we who are among the countries which have objectively guaranteed that neutrality....

Question: But were you not recently on the brink of a rift between the Jamahiriyah and the Malta government?

Al-Qadhdhafi: It is you who are saying that... and then allow me to tell you that those who do not possess something cannot promise it to anybody....

Question: What do you mean, Colonel?

Al-Qadhdhafi: That Italy, which is a NATO member and in fact almost a U.S. colony, cannot bestow neutrality on itself and subsequently guarantee Malta's neutrality....

Question: It is clear that you do not have a very favorable opinion of my country, Colonel Al-Qadhdhafi....

Al-Qadhdhafi: It is the pure truth; why are you offended? Libya, which is a real member of the nonalined countries and which is truly neutral and nonalined, can speak of neutrality and give Malta real guarantees. Italy, on the other hand, belongs to a military pact and therefore does not have an independent policy. How can it speak of guarantees for another country's neutrality?

Question: The demand for guaranteeing this neutrality stems from Maltese Prime Minister Dom Mintoff's invitation and not Italy's request, Colonel Al-Qadhdhafi....

Al-Qadhdhafi: This is political chicanery which enjoys, let me tell you, very little credibility....

Question: Let us turn now to your thinking, Colonel: In the green book, in the Third World theory, you assert that you have identified the Bible of the new era. But the state toward which you are aiming does not spring crystal-clear from your philosophy. What state is the state of utopia, in fact?

Al-Qadhdhafi: What state of utopia? In Libya, the state which springs from the teachings of the green book is currently being practiced....

Question: It is being practiced, yes, but not achieved. The Jamahiriyah, Colonel, is making gigantic strides in its process of transformation, but the goal is still very far away. Do you believe that it is possible to reach it within a reasonable space of time?

Al-Qadhdhafi: It must be clearly understood that in Libya, as the green book advocates, power is in the hands of the people through the congresses and the people's committees; I believe that this is an objective reality. It does not seem to me a distant goal that the regular army, in accordance with the Third World theory, is destined to disappear in order to be replaced by the people themselves. And that homes should belong to those who live in them and that in industries the workers should become bosses and partners and not employees, as state of the masses envisages; it seems to me that this has already been abundantly achieved here in the Jamahiriyah....

Question: It is true, Colonel Al-Qadhdhafi; posters with the slogan "partners and no longer employees" appear on all the walls in the country. But who pays for losses when they occur under this partnership system?

Al-Qadhdhafi: The whole of society. Or do you believe that losses must be borne only by the weakest?

Question: In an economy which is undergoing transformation, Colonel Al-Qadhdhafi, society cannot pay for the losses if there is no natural endowment....

Al-Qadhdhafi: So you mean that only the poorest should pay for them....

The Entire World Will Soon Be Like the Jamahiriyah

Question: Colonel Al-Qadhdhafi: Let us set aside populism: you can afford the luxury of not being pragmatic, because the oil allows you to undertake plans for various reforms....

Al-Qadhdhafi: On the contrary, the poorer the country, the greater its need to implement this theory....

Question: But it would be unable to pay for the losses and would rapidly go bankrupt....

Al-Qadhdhafi: What I am saying is that in your present society, it is the weakest--the workers and the consumers--who pay for the losses, while capitalist industry always increases its incentives. All this should be eliminated and the losses, if they occur, should be paid for by the entire community. For instance, the Jamahiriyah we have extipated the trickery represented by the fragmentary distribution network: we have eliminated the small, medium and large businesses of every kind and set up large community supermarkets, where the goods pass directly from the producer to the consumer. This eliminates the middleman and hence exploitation. Thus the Third World theory is already being implemented in one of its aspects.

Question: That is possible in the Jamahiriyah, Colonel, but it is more difficult in other countries....

Al-Qadhdhafi: The entire world will soon be a Jamahiriyah

Question: The entire world, Colonel Al-Qadhdhafi?

Al-Qadhdhafi: Yes, the entire world.

Question: In your address at the symposium on philosophical thought, organized at the teaching faculty of the Al-Fatih University in Tripoli (13-20 September—ed), you harshly criticized positivism, linking pragmatism, existentialism and Marxism together. Identifying pragmatism as the philosophy of U.S. capitalism, existentialism as the Western doctrine and Marxism as the dogma of the East-bloc countries, you resolved the problem "tout court," by attributing the same trends in contemporary thought to currents which in fact have very few points of contact. Do you not believe that your address reveals, above all, an intensification of your personal stance of a religious nature?

Al-Qadhdhafi: In speaking at the Al-Fatih symposium, I did not proceed or act in accordance with religious inclinations but in a strictly scientific manner. I did not speak as an Arab and Muslim but objectively, dispensing with pragmatism, existentialism and Marxism. Moreover, it is clear that the traditional doctrines have never resolved mankind's problem: thus we find ourselves today at the beginning of the work confronting us to perform this task, since pragmatism, Marxism and existentialism have failed resoundingly as philosophical currents. It is, therefore, necessary to seek a new doctrine, and this doctrine can only be that stemming from the green book....

Question: Let us now talk about Islam: Are you convinced that Christians and Jews are an integral part of Islam? Does not all this seem to you a little too much? You have encouraged the translation of the Koran into many languages, but you have not been spared criticisms in this respect. Do you deem them justified?

Al-Qadhdhafi: From the philosophical viewpoint, all believers are Muslims, even the Christians and also the Jews since, from the viewpoint of God, they could all be Muslims since they believe in God. But if they can all be regarded as Muslims, each is free to follow his prophet, and so there are those who follow Moses, there are those who follow Jesus, and so forth....

Question: There is only one God?

Al-Qadhdhafi: Exactly, and the Koran does not oppose this interpretation but generously accommodates the deeds of these prophets in its pages. In fact Muhammad's followers recognize Jesus and Moses, just as they recognize Muhammad. If they did not recognize them, their religion would be impoverished. For its part, Christianity, with very little charity, consigns Muhammad to the depths of hell.

As far as the translation of the Koran is concerned, this has proved to be a very important factor, because Christians and Jews have had the opportunity to become acquainted with it, and through it to understand their religions better. Why? Because in the Bible, which is a popular romance more than a book of God, in addition to true stories there are also incredible lies: thus I personally learned about Moses, Jesus and Mary through the Koran and thus, like myself, Christians and Jews have had the opportunity to learn the real truth through the Koran, translated into various languages. The Koran is the word of God, whereas the other holy books are words of men and not of God; therefore, here lies the deepest difference, here lies the importance of having translated the Koran.

Women Are Not Regarded as Human Beings

Question: Let us return to the green book, Colonel Al-Qadhdhafi: You maintain that democracy is joint government by all equal men and that only when the masses attain power will they become strong and really govern. But are you convinced that it is, in fact, the people who govern in the Jamahiriyah? Or rather, are you not, Colonal Al-Qadhdhafi, the only man who can give orders in the entire country?

Al-Qadhdhafi: May I laugh? Do you permit me to laugh without offending you? In fact it is true that I manipulate the facts to lead the people: my presence in the Jamahiriyah is not detrimental but beneficial. I am seeking to increase the people's power and am striving to this end and not the reverse.

Question: The green book speaks of feminism and related problems: can you explain them to Western women?

Al-Qadhdhafi: I believe that half the world, which is represented by women, is living in a state of complete subjection: I assert that women are slaves throughout the world. The East, where women are most misused, has its counterpart in the West where domestic practices stifle women's innermost nature: in practice, the state of slavery is the same. I believe that in the West, women can gain no rights unless they become men and abandon their own selves entirely, and that is an injustice which demands revenge. In the East, moreover, women are often not even treated as human beings but like any other kind of chattel. This is not even an injustice but a crime which is made light of. Therefore, the world must experience a real feminist revolution which will have the success which it rightly deserves, so that women will be respected without being forced to beoome men or being treated like a chattel.

Question: I think that, as far as women are concerned, your charisma will henceforth be unassailable, that henceforth you will be the idol of women all over the world. But let us pass on to a problem of concern to all mankind: it is true, colonel, that the Jamahiriyah is preparing to have its own nuclear bomb?

Al-Qadhdhafi: I would like to reply officially to this report through your magazine: the Jamahiriyah has no nuclear bomb and is not about to have one. But I would like to enquire in this connection: why does the world not pay attention to all the nuclear devices that already exist instead of bothering so much about the Jamahiriyah's hypothetical nuclear bomb? We are worried about all these nuclear devices and all those which the members of the so-called nuclear pool are constructing day after day: man's very existence is imperiled by the excessive presence of bombs under the control of a few arrogant countries. So why deceive world public opinion, why draw attention to an unlikely Libyan nuclear bomb instead of drawing attention to the American, Russian, French, British, Indian and Chinese nuclear bombs already snug in the arsenals; We want to destroy all these bombs which infest the planet and create no more. Having established this principle, what technical capability do we have for manufacturing this bomb?

Question: Well, it appears that you do not lack the capability, Colonel Al-Qadhdhafi: a few months ago a specialist magazine published in the United States carried an advertisement in which the Jamahiriyah asked for nuclear technicians for a nuclear complex which was being constructed in the desert.

Al-Qadhdhafi: What complex in the desert? The advertisement probably refers to the engagement of science teachers for the Al-Fatih University in Tripoli. Perhaps the world wants to stop us using nuclear energy for teaching and peaceful purposes?

Question: No, Colonel, only for bellicose purposes....

Al-Qadhdhafi: I am telling you that we need teachers for university faculties and not technicians to stockpile nuclear bombs. As for the rest, it is reactionary propaganda aimed at stifling our technical progress.

Question: I know that you do not like talking about your private life, but to Western public opinion you are too public a man to have the right to a completely private life.

Is it true that you have married four times and have six children? Is it true that you often hop into an old Peugot and drive around Tripoli and Benghazi without an escort, in order to ascertain that everything is going well in the country?

And, if so, do you not get the feeling that in the Jamayiriyah the people are bored, that they pass their spare time just loafing around without the slightest incentive?

Al-Qadhdhafi: Believe me, I don't have four wives....

Question: I am happy for you, Colonel Al-Qadhdhafi. You would have at least four problems piling up....

Al-Qadhdhafi: I have only one wife and the problem, as you call it, although only one, tends at times to mount up of its own accord. I have five children, not six. The first is named for my eldest uncle, who was the chief of my tribe, and is called Sa'd, which means fate. The second is Mu'tasim Billah, which means literally one who seeks the protection of God. The name of my little daughter, 'A'ishah, which means life, is the unforgettable name of my late mother. I have another boy, Sayf al-Islam, whose name means sword of Islam, and the last is called Muhammad, like the prophet, also the name of my old father, whom I love and respect as one of my closest advisers. As for the other things you mentioned, it is true that I drive around Tripoli and Benghazi, as I do around all the other cities in the Jamahiriyah: I know that the security services tear their hair when I manage to elude them, but the outcome of the operation is satisfactory because I can see that all is well in Libya, that the people are truly free to do what they want to do and that they can spend their free time as they wish. My dear friend, there are no repressive laws in the Jamahiriyah....

Question: Perhaps, Colonel, there are no ways of spending free time....

Al-Qadhdhafi: Who put that idea into your head? Perhaps there is a difference between what you want in terms of recreation dynamics and what the Libyan people want. I do not believe that the people are bored, as you say. The Jamahiriyah does not have a government which imposes a certain kind of life: the people are autonomous, they are able to control their lives as suits them best.

Question: Colonel Al-Qadhdhafi, hitherto it has been difficult for the Arab nation to dispute your charismatic leadership: the star of the aged Khomeyni may, however, eclipse your role. Is that possible?

Al-Qadhdhafi: On the contrary, I am happy to find Khomeyni on the world scene. To me Khomeyni is a father, a kind of grandfather: after all, we are of the same origin....

Question: Origin in what sense?

Al-Qadhdhafi: From the same Qabilah, that is, from the same tribe. I repeat, I am very happy that Khomeyni exists: I hope that he can go on performing his valuable role for a long time to come.

I Like Garibaldi, the Force Behind the Revolution

Question: Colonel Al-Qadhdhafi, who is the person who has most influenced your political, military and religious life?

Al-Qadhdhafi: There have been many. Those whose historical role I have respected must include Sun Yat-sen, founder and first president of the Chinese Republic in 1911 and the man who forced Emperor Pu-yi to abdicate. I read his biography and was impressed by the clarity of his actions and his thinking and fascinated by the way he managed to destroy a corrupt and ineffectual monarchy through the foundation of the Tong Meng Hui, the United League, based on the three principles of the people.

As for Italy, I made a profound study of Mazzini, Garibaldi and Cavour. Garibaldi was the force behind your revolution, which you call the "Risorgimento" if I am not mistaken. Cavour was the brains, Mazzini the guiding light.

When I was young I learned a lot about Abraham Lincoln, a genius who was able to become a celebrated lawyer without attending a university. If I am not mistaken he found some legal texts in an abandoned attic and read them in the forest, sitting on a tree trunk. During the war of secession he used to send written orders to his commanders. On rereading these texts I confess to thinking many times that, if I had been in the recipients' shoes, I would not have had the courage to carry them out. Another great man in every way was Gandhi, a person whom I admire and appreciate for his calling, which he put into practice; a man who always lived for others. As you can see, I like humility and self-denial sublimited in work.

Question: A little while ago it was reported in the West that your army's 6th Brigade, stationed in Tobruk, had mutinied and violent action had to be taken to restore order. Is it true? If not, are you sure that the people of the Jamahiriyah are all behind their leader, as propaganda would have us believe?

Al-Qadhdhafi: It is not true. Nothing happened in Tobruk. I know that I run the risk of becoming tiresome, but I can see that I have to keep on repeating it. The army does not have a predominant role in the Jamahiriyah's political sphere: in fact it is the people's component which has a weightier role than the military. Having established that, I will say that in Tobruk an NCO and three soldiers were corrupted by the Egyptian secret services. The latter used two Italian economic agents who abused the trust and privileges they had been given by the people of the Jamahiriyah. They were discovered, they tried to escape but were caught. And that's it.

Question: Was it corruption or a plot?

Al-Qadhdhafi: I repeat, it was a provocative act organized by the Cairo secret services. Little was actually achieved, so much so that when we took those whom the West imagined to be conspirators we also captured the code they were using. Nothing unusual there.

Question: The war between Iran and Iraq modifies the plan for unifying the Arab people: who, in your view, is objectively responsible for the conflict? Khomeyni, with his anachronistic intolerance, or Saddam Husayn, with his desire to perform a police function in the Arab Gulf on orders, allegedly at least, from the USSR?

And what efforts have you made to get the warring sides to restore peace?

Al-Qadhdhafi: I think that this fratricidal war--fratricidal because it is being fought between brother Muslims--was stage-managed by the United States and Israel. I do not believe the USSR has interfered in it. On the contrary, I think that the Soviet leaders were taken by surprise when hostilities broke out.

Question: Is that your personal belief?

Al-Qadhdhafi: I think that it is, above all, a political reality rather than a personal belief.

Question: In the West one is led to believe the opposite: that it was the USSR which pushed Iraq into war.

Al-Qadhdhafi: But why should it do that? The Iranian stance is favorable to the USSR in that it is opposed to U.S. policy.

Question: You are forgetting the problems of the 30 million Muslims living in the USSR, who are urging Moscow to help topple the Khomeyni regime and calm the religious ferment in the country....

Al-Qadhdhafi: I do not see how Russia could oppose a revolution which is fighting against colonialism....

Question: Unfortunately, Russia opposes many other things, Colonel Al-Qadhdhafi.

Al-Qadhdhafi: I am not Russia's defense lawyer. The information I have is political. Information I am inclined to trust.

As for efforts to resolve the conflict, at the very beginning I sent messages to the parties involved, and at the next Arab countries' foreign ministers conference we will try to resolve the conflict in a way that is most in keeping with the urgency of a solution.

I Have No Income, I Eat, Drink and Dress Myself

Question: Colonel Al-Qadhdhafi, I think you are au fait with the latest Italian political events, the Cossiga government resigned, a major factor in its resignation being its attitude toward the Fiat management which demanded the dismissal of 15,000 workers. Therefore, since the Jamahiriyah has 10 percent and even, some say, 13 percent of the shares in the Turin enterprise, since it is, at any rate, in relative, a major shareholder, what is your view, Colonel Al-Qadhdhafi, of the Turin situation?

Al-Qadhdhafi: Certainly what is happening at Fiat is in clear contrast to the principles expressed in my green book: we are on the side of the workers under threat of dismissal; in no way do we agree with the action of the Turin enterprise management, despite being shareholders.

Question: If the Fiat workers decided to occupy the enterprise how would you react, Colonel Al-Qadhdhafi?

Al-Qadhdhafi: But we are asking them to occupy the factory....

Question: Would you repeat that, please....

Al-Qadhdhafi: I will emphasize what I was about to say, and I want this message to reach the management: they should occupy the enterprise until what they deem a positive solution is found. The people of the Jamahiriyah give them their moral support and put the weight of their shareholder involvement behind them.

Question: Talking about workers, what do you earn a month?

Al-Qadhdhafi: I try not to have an income: all I need is to eat, drink and dress myself....

Question: But you have a family, and that requires you to have an income....

Al-Qadhdhafi: I will say that the Jamahiriyah permits me to provide for my family's needs.

Question: Colonel Al-Qadhdhafi: You are forever saying that you live for your people, that you belong to your people and that you act only for your people. So you must be well acquainted with the people of the Jamahiriyah and their fundamental needs, earnings and outgoings. Can you tell me, then, what a public bus ticket costs in Tripoli?

Al-Qadhdhafi: ...maybe one piaster..... No, two piasters.

Question: Yes, two piasters, Colonel. But this reply was prompted by one of the interpreters....

Al-Qadhdhafi: Yes it was, I can't deny it. When I said the price was one piaster I was thinking of specific classes, like students, soldiers and old people who can claim a 50-percent discount....

Question: Let us accept that, Colonel. But moving on to a more serious argument, do you not regard as excessive the 15 billion-lira war damage claim made against Germany and Italy? And don't you think that a claim going back 35 years is a bit late?

Al-Qadhdhafi: I don't think it is excessive. As regards its lateness, it is not a remedy with a fixed term or a food product which goes off after a certain time. Even today children in the Jamahiriyah are getting killed as a result of playing with objects abandoned or hidden during the war. Is there a time limit on this? No. Reparation is a right which does not lapse.

Question: Do you contemplate the possibility of making an official trip to Italy in the near future?

Al-Qadhdhafi: I want this trip to happen soon, as soon as we have agreed on the procedure for reparation in connection with war damage.

Question: I do not see how there can be an agreement on the basis of a 15-billion claim.

Al-Qadhdhafi: But the damage has to be compensated for....

Question: If you want recognition in principle I think it would be difficult to deny you. But if it is money, I seriously doubt, Colonel Al-Qadhdhafi, whether the question can be resolved quickly....

Al-Qadhdhafi: It is not, I repeat, so much a matter of money as of reaching an agreement.

Question: I cannot imagine what kind of agreement, Colonel. Maybe, instead of money we could give you, at most, Sicily or Sardinia, or Tuscany if you prefer....

Al-Qadhdhafi: You like to play games. But let's imagine that we went to Italy and did the same as you did here.

Question: Perhaps it would be best then to reach an agreement.

Al-Qadhdhafi: You see, you too think that an agreement is best....

Question: One final question, Colonel: Deep down, are you a happy man?

Al-Qadhdhafi: I am profoundly preoccupied with fate, with the future of the world which is currently full of problems and injustice; of political and economic problems; of violence by the strong against the weak, by the rich against the poor. The current situation is not a happy one, the future is full of unknown quantities, mankind is sitting on a keg of dynamite which could be detonated in an instant. What can you do to be happy? You can be happy at the level of your own family or people, but you cannot be happy in absolute terms. Therefore, I am not.

ALGERIA'S PLAN TO ENCIRCLE MOROCCO OUTLINED

Casablanca LIBERATION in French 10-16 Oct 80 p 5

[Text] Recently three Algerian airplanes landed in Mali. A large quantity of arms was off-loaded. These arms are not destined for Mali, but for a POLISARIO base situated about 150 km north of Bamaka. The transport of this war materiel was accomplished with the full knowledge of the Mali authorities. The Malian Government knows of this base. The Algerian Government supplies it with arms, munitions and men recruited in the region. It is very important.

There is an airport right on the Mauritanian-Malian border whose purpose is to receive the Libyan or Algerian planes that are resupplying the POLISARIO with arms. This airport has already been mentioned in the press. Its operations are no longer a secret.

In Mauritania, a natural port was used for launching attacks against fishing boats operating in Moroccan territorial waters, and to receive the kidnapped fishermen before they were sent on to Algeria. This port was bombarded and destroyed by Moroccan air power.

But other sites on the Mauritanian coast continue to be used for the same purpose.

Mauritania is a pool of manpower for the enemies of our territorial integrity. The recruitment campaign which has been held there for several months has significantly changed the physiognomy of the POLISARIO. Presently, at least 60 percent of its active troops come from Mauritania. The latter is crammed with attack bases. The activity of POLISARIO there is increasingly intense, to such a point that it is legitimate to pose the question: Who, really, is in charge in Mauritania? The CMSN [Military Committee for National Salvation] or POLISARIO?

At Las Palmas, on the Canary Islands, the Algerian camp has connections which enable it to carry out the inspection of trawlers.

On the high seas, there are floating bases that take an active role in these acts of piracy. The Affair of the Cuban boat is one example of this.

And, naturally, the heart of all this is located in southern Algeria. Right where Algeria has set up the bases from which military operations against Morocco are launched.

What can one deduce from all this?

Algeria is sealing Morocco off. After diplomatic isolation, it is trying to encircle Morocco and to weave about it a webbing of military attacks. This strategy is not new, but its continued escalation presents serious threats to the security of our country and the safeguarding of its territorial integrity.

It is true that Morocco's military position has much improved. Especially since the start of the large-scale sweeping operations undertaken by the FAR [Royal Armed Forces] starting in March 1980 in the Ouarkziz. For about 5 months, the enemy was unable to act on the ground. The fighting which resumed in early September shows that the FAR's initiative is thwarting our enemies and obliging them to acknowledge heavy losses. While the foreign forces of aggression are losing morale more and more, and their numbers are dwindling, the bravery and the good morale of the Moroccan forces have suffered no erosion.

On the contrary, the depth and firmness of their love and concern for their country gives them inexhaustible force when they go into battle: the pursuit of the sweeping operations in the northern region of the Saharan provinces has facilitated the destruction of several enemy bases, of stores of supplies, and the cutting of several roads used by armed bands coming from Algeria. The FAR's apparent objective in this region is to shut off the border definitively, and thus to deprive POLISARIO of any chance of infiltration.

However this may not be enough to lead automatically to the final defeat of our enemies. The face of the war will change, but the Algerian camp does not give the impression of wanting to put an end to the war it is making on us. The forces of aggression which it has set up all around Morocco prove it is going to continue a bellicose policy. It continues to field an army composed in large part of Mauritanians in order to make people believe in the Saharan origin of the mercenaries. It is equipping the army with increasingly sophisticated armaments.

One hundred twenty-eight [-mm] Stalin organs that fire 21 rockets simultaneously with a range of up to 28 km, 33-mm rapid fire artillery, "SAM-9" aerial missiles more powerful than the "SAM-7," etc. For the moment, the concentration of fighting in the Oued Draa region is the main act. Destroying the enemy in this region will greatly weaken the bases in Tindouf. But it is essential not to lose sight of the other aspects of the Algerian strategy that rest on the diplomatic and military encirclement of Morocco. It is this encirclement that must be broken.

BOURGUIBA CALLS FOR PROMOTION OF AGRICULTURE STOCK-RAISING

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 31 Oct 80 p 1

[Text] The council of ministers held its weekly meeting at the palace of government at the Kasbah yesterday morning, Thursday, 30 October, under the chairmanship of the chief of state.

Following deliberations, Mr Fouad Mebazaa, minister of information and cultural affairs, made the following statement:

"At the request of the president of the republic, the minister of agriculture made a presentation on stock-raising.

"The minister made a special note of measures taken in accordance with the recommendations of the Supreme Champion with respect to the importation of sheep to be raised in the various regions of the country.

"The president of the republic put special emphasis on the importance of stock-raising for the economy of the country and recommended sustained effort toward development of this sector in order to meet our dairy product needs.

"The chief of state also underlined the necessity of promoting sheep-raising and importing new strains able to acclimatize themselves in both northern and southern Tunisia.

"He recalled in this connection the need to develop and improve pasturage in order to bring about both quantitative and qualitative increases in animal production.

"The minister of planning and finance delivered remarks about directions in the next decade of development and the objectives of the Fifth Plan.

"In his presentation, the minister noted especially the increases in the volume of investments and underlined the necessity to continue the effort in order to build savings and accelerate the pace of growth in industry.

"The chief of state highlighted the necessity of reducing consumption and in particular consumption of imported products and of promoting exports in order to free up additional resources for our development effort.

"He also recommended hastening the completion of major job-creating projects in the industrial and agricultural sectors."

We also note that the presidential entourage arrived, at about 1000, at Government Square at the Kasbah, where the chief of state was received by Mohamed Mzali, the prime minister, Habib Bourguiba Jr., special adviser to the president of the republic, and Mongi Kooli, deputy prime minister and director of the PSD [Destourian Socialist Party].

In front of the palace of government President Bourguiba saluted the flag while a military band played the national anthem.

After having reviewed an army detachment present in his honor the chief of state shook hands with members of the government and then stopped to respond to the ovation of the citizens who were massed in Government Square to acclaim the Leader of the Nation.

President Bourguiba was accompanied from Carthage Palace to the Palace of Government by Allala Laouiti, head of the special secretariat for the chief of state and by M'heddeb Rouissi, governor-president of the council of the District of Tunis.

INTERVIEW WITH ECONOMIC MINISTER

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 23 Oct 80 pp 4,5,7

[Interview with Mr Abdelaziz Lasram, Tunisian minister of national economy, date, place, and interviewer unspecified]

[Text] The next development plan is being prepared. It is hoped this one will see the definitive take-off of our national economy. What will be its main directions?

In an interview with LA PRESSE, Mr Abdelaziz Lasram, minister of the national economy, responds to this question as well as to others related to various aspects of Tunisian economic life.

Mr Lasram, in his answers, stresses the importance that will be given to the development of machine and electrical industries and underlines the need for Tunisia to strengthen cooperation with the countries that have reached a level of economic development comparable to our own, especially the countries of the Maghreb.

Employment, tourism, the API [expansion unknown], the Equalization Fund, decentralization, standaridization of industrial products, energy, and diversification of products and markets are also subjects of great importance which the minister of national economy was kind enough to discuss.

[Question] Tunisia is getting ready to launch itself into a turning point in its development which should lead it to the attainment of a new stage in the fields of industry and tourism. Can you, Mr Minister, at this point in the preparation of the Plan, clarify for us the broad directions and perspectives of industrial development?

[Answer] The new Plan will be oriented basically toward industries, but much more sophisticated industries than those realized during the preceding phases. If, in fact, the first Plan in some fashion served to put to use Tunisia's raw materials, to exploit them to the maximum, or at the very least to improve the exploitation, and the second served to create what could be called the substitution industries--that is, those that were appropriate to create in order to satisfy the needs of the domestic market--the third will rather be oriented toward machine, electrical, chemical, and even agricultural industries. Agriculture being, in our opinion, one of the factors for possible development.

The Plan being prepared will thus be centered on industrial development. We will continue to consolidate the sectors wherein we already have achieved good results: I am thinking in particular of heavy chemistry that we succeeded in developing, and whose technology we have mastered, such as phosphoric acid with all the products and the variations of production and the phosphate derivatives. In this connection, without false modesty we can state that in this field Tunisia is perhaps the only country in the developing world to set and reach the goal of transforming on site on the order of 75 percent of its phosphate. This is an absolutely astounding figure, which proves that our country has acquired the necessary technical mastery. At the beginning, phosphate was sold in its raw state. Then we went to super-simple then to super-triple, then to phosphoric acid all the way to DAP [expansion unknown]. Next we will go on to a certain number of products which will give us a very wide range of Tunisian products that will be flowing in good conditions into the international market. One must also not forget that in the field of fluorine Tunisia has also logged good results.

The tourist industry is also a successful sector which we intend to strengthen. Tourism in fact offers not insignificant development possibilities, which we should exploit, since Tunisia is in a stage which requires the exploitation of all available resources. Nevertheless, we have set ourselves limits, as this sector should not take up more than 4 percent of our PIB [expansion unknown].

But, beyond the consolidation of sectors where we have succeeded, such as tourism and chemical industry, we should also search out new paths, for, given Tunisia's need for jobs and income, we are obliged to produce more in order to be able to meet all our import needs. The production structure is such, in reality, in our country, that we remain dependent on foreign sources for supplies in several products such as milk, wood, coffee, and a certain number of equipment goods indispensable to the smooth progress of the economy.

What can we produce to meet our import requirements?

We think that the machine industry can be one of the fields where Tunisia could care out a development path, this industry being one of the basic, fundamental industries with vast potential for development.

We are thus in the process of examining the possibilities and seeing what there is in our country that could contribute to development of this sector.

We are aware of the fact that this enterprise necessitates technology transfer. Are we in a position to do this by ourselves? I think not. Events have unfortunately shown--as have the many negotiations in the framework of the North-South dialog--that things were not so simple, or so easy. So we think that we should join with countries that have reached a level of development comparable to ours, both in the economic sphere and on the social, with whom we have multiple and unique ties, whether geographic, linguistic, racial, or religious. We must strive for what we call development of relations with these countries, for horizontal inter-industrial exchanges that can be the basis of a start of technology transfer. If for example we put together the technologies of the Moroccans, the Algerians, and the Tunisians, we will not perhaps reach that of the Europeans, but all the same we will have climbed several steps nearer. Up to now each of these countries has followed a different path, but at the present time there is an awakening going on, and this could be a new force throughout the Arab world. We sense the birth of a political will and of determination by the masses to push for more horizontal cooperation than before, which would first of all give us access to new technologies through inter-industrial exchanges among our countries, and on the other hand would constitute a more solid front when we show up for these or how difficult negotiations with the industrials, and by means of which we try to see that the industry created in Tunisia will not be a simple assembly industry or conditionnement [translation unknown] industry, but real industry.

So, to summarize the main directions we are following: maintenance of development in the fields which performed satisfactorily during the preceding phases, that is to say both the exploitation of necessary resources in all their forms and their maximized elaboration in our country, and the strengthening of the tourist sector by establishing for it rather ambitious targets which however are easily within our grasp, without for all that making it a critically large part of our PIB; and next the search for new industrial callings, particularly in the fields of machine-industry and electrical industry, which can be value-added [enterprises] that do not necessitate raw materials. I can say that, along with agriculture, industry is the master-key by which we will either succeed or fail in our development, and our pay-off will come at the end of the decade just now started.

What is also important, I would say in conclusion, since we are speaking of directions, is that we are counting on the private sector to come up with the largest share of the effort in this domain. We think that the Tunisian state has already made sufficiently great efforts, has done the basics, has invested much in the production sectors, and we think that presently the industrials can fulfill their role much better than they have up to now. They should not devote themselves solely to substitution industries, conditioning, and assembly. They should also try to orient themselves somewhat toward real industry. In order for them to do this, the government presently intends to put at their disposal sufficient means, through the famous development banks that are going to be created and which are certainly going to serve to support and enhance development activity in the field of industry.

Real Industry Is That Which Adds Real Industrial Value

[Question] You just made a distinction between what you called assembly industry and real industry. Could we know what you understand by real industry?

[Answer] Real industry is that which adds real industrial value and not just economic added-value. It is industry when an element properly its own is introduced. There is an example a professor gave me once and which illustrates maximum added-value. This watch weighs 50 or 100 grams and as pure steel is worth about 2 cents. After having been worked, this steel is resold at 300 dinars. This is perhaps the ultimate in technological elaboration. The worst example would be that of a man who gets a drumful of perfume concentrate and empties it into bottles, by mixing it with water. There you have two extremely contrasting images to compare the two kinds of industry. So a real industry should bring technology to bear. To make a piece of machinery is to introduce a whole new art, a whole technology which necessitates a whole structure which becomes definitively established. And here, I think that what has been done by way of efforts allows us to hope this country will have access to this kind of industry. It is obvious, for example, that the chemical industry, which is not after all so elaborate, is a real industry because the initial product quite as much as the technology used is 100 percent Tunisian, and so is the value-added, almost entirely, with the exception of accessory materials. Textiles is also a not insignificant industrial field. I could cite you many other examples. Thank God Tunisia has them.

If, therefore, we have decided to opt for machine and electrical industries, it is exactly because they are sectors where the value added, the human value, and the part played by human hands and heads is important. Now like others Tunisians do not have many raw materials, so we are obliged to choose industries adapted to the situation of our country.

We consider presently that Tunisians are good workers and good technicians, and that education and vocational training in Tunisia have been well developed. We think, therefore, and I hope with good reason, that the machine and electrical industries are perhaps the only industrial fields where the value of the individual makes the difference, whereas in other fields to succeed one must have a big market, or capital, or cheap materials. These sectors are thus especially well adapted to the Tunisian man who remains our principal capital.

But as I already said, it would be difficult for us to guarantee substantial development in this sector without engaging in industrial exchanges with our neighboring countries. The reciprocal values-added that could be achieved would enable much progress to be made.

This is also the object of our continual negotiations with the European countries. When we receive the big leaders of the French, Italian, or German economy, it is these very problems that we discuss. We tell them that this is a part, a small facet, linked to Tunisia, of the North-South dialog, which we are trying to develop.

Our success or failure will depend therefore on the cooperation we will have been able to establish with our horizontal partners, and in particular with our Arab Brothers, on what we are going to accomplish with the Arab countries with which we have major economic ties, and above all on what the Tunisian as an industrial and as a worker can show by way of technological mastery and capacity to absorb, because in the last analysis, it is not solely the role of the administration to undertake these technological negotiations; it is rather the role of industrial leaders to make direct contacts either with their buyers, or their sellers, their partners or associates. I said elsewhere, in the last UTICA Congress [Tunisian Union for Industry, Trade, and Crafts], the same thing. We are banking a great deal on the activity of Tunisian chiefs of enterprises, small and medium-sized, to develop this aspect which could in the Tunisian context be one of the most visible battlements.

[Question] One doesn't hear much said these days about small and medium-sized enterprises? Is this just coincidence, or in reality have other paths been chosen?

[Answer] I have said a great deal about small and medium-sized enterprises during the last UTICA congress. We want these industries to continue to develop. We want a new wave of young Tunisian industrials not content to limit themselves to being traditional suppliers, not reluctant to go to Algeria or Morocco to go see on site the new possibilities their counterparts can offer in these countries. They should be organized by sector for greater efficiency.

By virtue of their size and because of the human relations that can be developed in them, we consider the small and medium-sized enterprises as very supple and flexible enterprises, and encouragement of them is a part of our design. It is also the goal of JOPRODI [expansion unknown]. We are also considering amending the '74 laws to adapt them better to the needs of our investors.

Jobs Remain a Priority: But Not at Any Price

[Question] Doesn't this option of calling for industries with much more technology risk limiting the possibilities for creation of jobs even while this remains our top priority, and even while the Fifth Plan, though based on job-creating industries to a greater extent, has not reached all its goals in this area?

[Answer] Yes. Jobs remain an undeniable and indisputable priority for us. Nevertheless it is obvious that without technology transfers, jobs will cost so dear that we will not be able to create more of them. If we create jobs in a field where there is practically no value added, the jobs will bring no real enrichment to the country. This is the case of the person who takes two sub-assemblies, assembles them, puts a screw in each side, and delivers the final product to the consumer, deducting his dime for the trouble. This is an economic, not industrial, added-value: he buys the product at reduced price and retails it on the Tunisian market at a better price. Such employment is in the last analysis very costly and it would perhaps be more rewarding to eliminate this job without a counterpart and buy a product of better quality at a better price abroad, taking a profit from the delays in the settlement of the transaction.

Employment, along with decentralization, remains our principal objective. But the transfers of technology and real industry are a necessity if the intention is to create a minimum of added-value in order to be able to engender income. The national income being a total of added-values that are created, we must have as much as possible to be able to continue to export certain products and have industrial exchanges with the outside world. Jobs remain our priority. But not at any price.

The Work of API has Been Beneficial Overall

[Question] While we are on the subject of industry, we would like to know what you think of the API. In the 7 years that the Agency for Investment Promotion [API] has existed, it has contributed to the creation of several industrial projects. Do you think it is time to take somewhat of a fresh look at its orientation, at its policy?

[Answer] The API has rarely been described properly. API is the Tunisian government, the Tunisian administration. Many people seem unaware that API grants no permits at all, that it is the minister of the national economy who does it.

It is an entity which was created for a specific purpose: that of investment promotion. That means that the agency is an entity which receives background information, which gives out guidance, which informs people, which makes certain studies to encourage people to locate in one region or another. Its administrative council, which is composed of representatives of various departments concerned, was conceived in this way out of concern to facilitate the activity of the agency so that the investor, from the moment he is going to invest, finds himself dealing with one sole interlocutor and is not obliged to pay 15, 20, 30 visits to customs, to the tax office, to the directorate of commerce, to the employment office, etc., as was the case in '62, '63, and '64 at the time when I was in the administration. To avoid all these steps and all these procedures, and in order to make investment attractive and not forbidding, the government created the agency, whose role basically is to make conditions adequate to facilitate investment. It is thus totally an amanation of the administration, and as I said it has no power to make decisions, since these decisions are inoperative until signed by the minister of the national economy.

One must say that up to now the agency has played its role well: the number of projects that have been launched during the previous plan is there for testimony. It enabled industrials and also several organizations to make contact much easier with Tunisia and to have a precise understanding of the requirements for locating there. Over the last 7 years it has made itself a valuable partner to Tunisian industrialists, and foreigners have found it a first-class partner. It is only justice to say this: it has often been said to me, and our partners have regularly confirmed this to me. So I can say that the work has been beneficial overall. Ultimately it serves simply to paint a picture of the government's decisions [on development and investment], of its policies and of the policy of the Tunisian legislature which put in place the laws that it applies. Its success or failure is the success or failure of the policy of the government, since it only implements the policy dictated to it. Is it not clear?

The API Is the Extension of the Administration Whose Policy It Implements

[Question] Yes. You probably think that in posing this question I was making an allusion to the fact that certain industrialists, certain investors, whether rightly or wrongly, say that this agency has become somewhat of an impediment, that it sometimes acts as a "brake" or merely an additional layer of red tape, etc. and that finally, the purpose for which it was created is not always attained. It is said that it is a little state within the state. What do you say?

[Answer] But this is not true, to the extent that as I told you permits can only be accorded by the minister. So all the agency can do is present the files to the government. On the other hand, the very composition of its administrative council is the best guarantee that it cannot become a state within the state, since it is itself the state, the administration, in concentrated form. So I would tell these people who say that it has become an additional intermediary that it is the only intermediary, in reality there are not two.

Before there was an infinity of entities that had to be dealt with. Today, when they go to the agency they meet at the same time the ministry of the economy, obviously, since it is its creature, the central bank, the ministries of planning and finance, interior, the sanitation office, the industrial loans agency, etc.

I think that it would not have been possible to obtain so many permits with the old system that I know so well.

The real problem is not the agency, it is the present regulations. Are they, or are they not, well adapted to Tunisia's needs? Have they fulfilled their purpose? The agency is only a tool, which one can modify at will. It is as if you were to say, in the same way, that the import licensing service, or the STEG [Tunisian Gas and Electric Company] are states within the state. It seems possible from the outside, but on thinking it out thoroughly it appears impossible. It is a very cutting judgment if I were to employ the term, for nothing in reality or in the regulations justifies such a statement, to the degree that those responsible each assume their own responsibilities. This is an important point. But it remains no less true that the agency is an extension of the administration, whose policy it implements. Its success is obvious, since it has channeled many investments. The judgments it is possible to make on investments are ultimately judgments which bear much more heavily on Tunisian laws, that is to say law 74 or law 72.

If Law 72 Is To Be Revised, It Will Be to Strengthen Assistance to Exports [Question] Given recent tendencies, presently visible in the developed countries, toward more protectionism with regard to products, and especially manufactured products, coming from the developing countries, don't you think that the revision of laws such as law 72, basically intended to encourage exports, is a necessity in the present state of affairs, in order to adapt these laws to the new situation?

[Answer] I would tell you that if I were to revise them, it would be to strengthen assistance to exports. Law 72 was often presented not as it is but as a law which brought foreign investors to Tunisia. Now the very first function of this law was that of developing an export mentality in Tunisia. Because we cannot live solely in a market as thin as the Tunisian market. I would like to say that the Tunisian government wants to more exporters among Tunisian industrialists. We should therefore strengthen existing laws in order to encourage people to export.

One should really call Law 72 by its proper name: it is not a law to try to bring foreign investment into Tunisia; as it was conceived in the minds of the Tunisian legislators, it was destined to promote exports.

For the rest, if we analyze the enterprises that benefit from law 72, we will observe that more than 50 percent are solely Tunisian, 25 percent are Tunisian in partnership with foreigners, 25 percent are foreign. This is approximately the order of scale. These are the figures, therefore, they should be thrown into relief once and for all. Often, people do not know that enterprises such as ICM [Maghreb Chemical Industries], SEPA [expansion unknown], or SOGITEX [expansion unknown] of Ksar Helai were brought in within the framework of Law 72. This law is above all an export law.

There, I would say that we did not get results faster than anticipated, even though nonetheless we have arrived today, within the framework of law 72, at the exportation of electronic components to Germany. This is not an insignificant step. It is not exactly everything we could have hoped, but it is already a first step. What we should do through this law, what we can develop, is above all that which I already outlined. These famous horizontal inter-industrial exchanges with countries at the same insustrial level as ourselves, in this case certain countries such as Morocco, Algeria, and other countries in the Middle East, brother countries to whom we are attached by ties of friendship.

Now you can pose the question of whether we have succeeded with Law 72 and foreign investors, in realizing the technology transfers we were seeking.

If Export Markets Are Diversified, Product Diversification Is Automatic

[Question] In its annual report for 1979, the central bank draws attention to the low level of diversification which characterizes both our exportable products and our export markets. What actions is the ministry taking in this field?

[Answer] It is true that we do not have a diversification list identical to the European list, but our exported products are relatively diversified. I already cited the example of phosphates which, barely 10 years ago, were exported crude and which are now exported in 10 or 12 different forms. I can give the example of fluor-spar and textiles, which are exported in different forms. Textiles run the gamut from Indizo design to lingerie, including shirts, jackets, and hosiery. So one must not be too pessimistic and admit that we have a certain amount of diversification, of course nothing in the same league as the Europeans, but which is certainly among the best to be found in countries of the Third World. And it is just here that we arrive at the real problem; the diversification of our exports is in fact tied to the diversification of the countries with whom we work. So long as we continue to export to countries that are much more industrialized than us, and who have a standard of living and an industrial level much higher than ours, it is obvious that we will only be able to export a very few products in which we have an obvious specialty such as phosphates, textiles, oranges, olive oil, the sun (if one can count the sun as an exported product), etc. The day when we finally address ourselves to countries that have an industrial level similar to ours, we will very quickly see appearing an immense and very broad diversification, of products traded. And so, if we are talking about machine and electrical industries it is precisely because they make possible the achievement of total diversification, for it is not possible to find a field where there is more diversification than that. So the problem is basically one of no longer being tied to the markets of the developed countries and of moving out of the framework of a North-South trading relationship in order to try to have a horizontal relationship, with countries on the same level. By thus diversifying export markets, product diversification comes automatically. If in fact we come to make inter-industrial exchanges, if for example we and three or four other countries produce between us all the spare parts for an automobile, then we will have at least 120 to 150 products for trade. If we come to exchange the components manufactured in Tunisia, in Algeria, and in Morocco for the purpose of assembling an automobile, we will very quickly be trading several hundred products.

And this is precisely one of the objectives of this Plan, and a supplemental means of industrialization.

Standardization: A Complex But Necessary Problem

Along the same lines, Mr Minister, there is the question of standardization, which assumes great importance both for the protection of Tunisian consumers and for safeguarding the image of the trademark "Made in Tunisia." Where are we at this point in standardization of Tunisian industrial products?

[Answer] We are convinced of the importance of this question, and we are in process of examining it, and presently commissions are meeting under the aegis of the National Center for Industrial Research.

This is a very complex problem in two respects: that of exportation, and that of internal consumption. We have not even achieved the requisite standardization in wholesale marketing, to cite only one example. We are not even to the point of being able to exhibit our oranges in standardized crates, whereas in Europe, or elsewhere, the apples, fruits, or potatos are classified in three or four categories.

We are attempting to standardize at the level of industrial products, but this is not an easy task.

Standardization remains, in any case, a necessary step.

Decentralization Requires a Minimum of Resources Which We Lacked at Independence

[Question] After years of development, some regions of Tunisia have for all practical purposes remained on the fringes of this great effort at progress which has brought more benefits to the coastal regions. Is a new direction being considered to spread out development activity more generally and to make it profitable to all the regions, especially to the hinterland?

[Answer] It is obvious that during the preceding plans the objective was first of all to establish industrial projects and to create jobs. We must not throw stones at those who preceded us, because it must be recognized that Tunisia was obliged to begin its industrialization from the existing infrastructure. We were obliged, in fact, to construct industries where there were ports, electric current, telephones, roads, schools, etc.

People often have a tendency to believe that Tunisia at its independence found itself in a situation like the one we have today, which is, of course, absolutely wrong. Now thirty seconds' relfection suffices to make on realize that this is a basic notion. Tunisia has invested much time in becoming what it presently is, and much effort has been made to decentralize the universities, endow the country with a road network, make electricity and running water widely available, and build housing, and schools. All these projects throughout the republic are thus the building blocks for a restored equilibrium in the country.

At the start it was necessary to begin with what already existed, and this in a way aggravated the imbalances that existed. But it was inevitable, for one had to choose between remaining in absolute poverty while awaiting the inevitable end, or beginning by beginning.

Now if we had not begun, Tunisia today would be in bankruptcy and would not have the means to cope with anything at all.

Today, Tunisia has become a country which does have a minimum of resources that make possible remedial action. To redirect investment, industry, and the migratory flow of the people requires political determination and a great deal of money. The political will exists, and we have had it for a long time, but one must also have resources.

Nothing is more difficult in reality than to reverse the direction of the flow that has become established from the countryside to the city. It is a universal phenomenon and not one unique to Tunisia. And nothing is more difficult than to lead investment away from the centers of consumption instead of toward them. In some countries the governments grant subsidies that in some cases represent half the investment.

It is thus policy which requires great resources: the installation of industrialized zones which will not be sold for a long time (big investments risk) therefore, remaining unproductive. The introduction of electricity, for example, etc. And one must get everything prepared and then await the arrival of the investor.

As for us, we have chosen another path which, in my opinion, is the right one, up to a certain point, besides which the government and the president of the republic himself, on certain historic occasions at Gabes, Bizerte, etc. have made the decision to make an effort. And this effort has been supplied by the public enterprises which have implemented a policy of decentralization. If you look at Tunisia, you will see that enterprises such as SOTIMACO [expansion unknown] for example are located throughout the republic. This company is established at Jendouba, at Kasserine, at Gabes, and at Medenine right now. If you look at the industrial zone at Gabes or Bizerte, you will conclude that most of the enterprises installed are more or less big-money ventures.

The president even chose, right after independence, to locate the famour cellulose factory at Kasserine. Who, at that time, would have thought it possible to locate a factory at Kasserine?

So the government has made some efforts to promote decentralization. But it is obvious that if we want there to be real movement, we must introduce real incentive measures that will enable people to go to these regions and on this point the government is in the process of studying several general measures to make things go better. People should understand once and for all that the construction of a mega-city like Tunis, or like what Sousse or Sfax are in the process of becoming, can represent a factor for imbalance, even for danger, and that it is in their interest, perhaps not immediately but in the medium term, to leave for other regions.

The government is presently engaged in researching the entire question in the context of integrated development and of real decentralization for the benefit of the regions. It will do all it can to lead the way toward a real balance among the different areas and I think that results will start appearing in a year or two.

The Equalization Fund Is an Instrument of Transfer To Benefit the Economically Weak

[Question] In its annual report, the central bank criticizes the pricing policy followed by the government, especially with regard to equalization costs, and calls for its revision. What do you think about this, Mr Minister, as the number one man responsible for this sensitive sector of the economy?

[Answer] Yes, there again we have a big problem. The equalization fund has been and is still a big topic of discussion. What is it we should equalize? What should not be equalized? It is obvious that the government has a price policy which is the result of a whole series of factors: there is a link between prices and wages, and several particular products are considered to be sensitive elements that should not undergo the normal cost fluctuations. I am thinking especially of sugar, which is consumed in great quantity by the Tunisian populace, of bread and its derivatives, and of olive oil. These are basic elements in the diet of our compatriots. Considering how concerned the government is with the purchasing power of the people, it is led to get involved in prices in the country.

We would naturally prefer not to have to get involved, but as the law of supply and demand often does not get the job done, we cannot just let things happen as they will, like some people would wish. If the conditions of supply and demand, competition, and distribution chains were right, we would not have to intervene, either on the price of products I was just speaking about or on the price of other products that go into what could be called the pantry of the Tunisian housewife. If everyone played his part well: the producer, the intermediary, the transporter, the wholesaler, the retailer, and the consumer, it is obvious that we would not have any need to intervene to keep things from getting out of hand.

In general, we do not like to intervene in market mechanisms where it has been shown everywhere in the world that whenever such intervention is too sweeping, the products disappear. Examples in many countries testify to the truth of this.

We want personal initiative to continue to prevail, because it is the best guarantee of good quality, good service, and the honest play of the laws of supply and demand. But it is also essential that these laws be the same for all. When you go into the street and see two children or two people arguing, and one is very weak while the other is very strong, you arbitrate, you separate them to prevent the stronger from crushing the weaker. In the present case, this is our role.

We are obliged to stop the fighting when we see that, unfortunately, that it is often the weak who lose. These are the consumers, poor consumers, weak consumers because poorly informed: they buy any old thing, at any old price, and don't try to protect themselves. So we are obliged to defend them.

With respect to the equalization fund, we are keeping up our efforts, because we must, because there can be no question of allowing international prices that can affect olive oil, sugar, or cereals to interfere in our economy.

We are a serious country, with a planned economy, with a planned policy, and we cannot allow outside convulsions to whip around our economy with full force. It is a question of sovereignty. Perhaps at the end of a year or a year and a half we will modify the price of a product, because we know it has definitively stabilized. But presently, if the increase in sugar costs had been passed on, it is obvious that the price would have gone up by two or three times, which is unthinkable. And what will one do afterwards, when the price comes down again? It's a problem, isn't it?

Thus the equalization fund is an instrument of transfer, so to say, for the benefit of people with weak purchasing power. It is above all an instrument of control and regulation to maintain a general equilibrium in prices. We cannot allow certain imported products to come in freely without national control to act on our market and upset our overall policy.

This is the first element. The second: we would like to leave everything else in peace. Only when the rules of the game are broken--as was the case during the last Ramadan--do we intervene, and only in such cases will we intervene. That comes pretty close to how I should define our policy. This being so, what we would like to see in the industrial area when the conditions of competition are completely met, is that there should be a system of self-regulation and of relative freedom that allows people to try to do better on prices and quality.

The Problem of the Fund is One of Balance, Not Conception

[Question] The deficit of the Equalization Fund is growing each year, and arrears at the end of 1979 were estimated at 150 million dinars. Don't you think that, if the principle of the Fund is good, its operations should be reviewed?

[Answer] The fund is certainly in deficit, but it is a deficit that was accumulated over several years. This does not mean that the principle is bad. There may have been some decisions made over the years that were not good. Perhaps we should have increased prices by 20 or 15 percent to expunge the deficit. The problem of the fund is one of balance, not of conception. When we reach a certain point, and in the framework of the policy of the government, when the revision of the price of certain products becomes necessary, we will inform the public, we will say: here it is, these prices have changed in such-and-such a way; there is simply no way to keep them at this level any longer; we must raise them because the fund can no longer sustain them.

But the fund accumulated deficits because these revenues were not as large as its outlays, not because the decisions made were bad. It is an accounting problem. The fund is indispensable if we are to avoid finding ourselves starting off with a certain policy in a given year only to have the economy thrown completely up in the air because three months later some crisis over the Suez Canal or the Panama Canal results in the price of a product tripling.

The fund is an indispensable instrument of re-equilibration; in its absense we would have an economy like those of the 16th or 17th Centuries, completely free, where prices are subject to triple and then sink back down.

Equalization expenses exist; in the last analysis they are a reality. But the real equalization does not appear just in the fund; it is elsewhere. There are many hidden equalizations. The Tunisian state or the national community has other means in addition to the fund to promote equalization. It does it through energy, which it delivers cheaply to the country. And this is of a much greater order of magnitude.

Energy: Exploit All Our Potential and Keep an Eye on Consumption

[Question] Regarding energy, are we ready for the future? Isn't it time to arm ourselves to deal with the problems that could confront Tunisia if it were to become an importer of oil?

[Answer] It is obvious that if energy sources stay what they are now, and in general these sources do not change with great rapidity, Tunisia will in a fairly short span of years become an importing country and could find itself confronted with several problems, if the necessary measures were not taken to deal with the situation.

Presently, there are two lines of action: the first, which is the most important, consists in identifying all possibilities for substitutes for energy presently utilized, that is for fuel, all the petroleum derivatives. We are presently undertaking a very big research effort on minerals such as lignite that if proved to be in sufficient quantities could be used in power plants. As an example, East Germany uses lignite to run all its electric power plants, and uses it in chemistry and in all sorts of activities.

We are also contemplating as a possibility the utilization of the natural gas found in Tunisian water or in the earth and which, in light of the increase in oil price, is becoming a particularly promising product at present. Here, we must move forward and accelerate the research. We are really putting our shoulder to the wheel.

Certainly there are other sources, such as solar energy, wind, and uranium, which we have in not insignificant quantities in our phosphoric acid; and we can see the possibility of extracting close to the equivalent of 100 to 110 tons of uranium.

We have therefore a whole series of things to do, and the government has decided, in this field, to accelerate the pace so we can be prepared for the days ahead which, if we move too slowly, will be very difficult.

The second element is consumption. Tunisia's consumption is growing at an annual rate of 16 to 17 percent, which means that consumption is doubling almost every five years. So this is very simple to calculate: in 5 years we will consume twice as much; as presently we consume nearly half of what we produce, in 5 or 6 years, which is practically tomorrow, we will find ourselves importers; and at that point we will find ourselves on the receiving end of all the crises we presently see due to the increase in oil prices: in other words, they will represent a debit on our trade balance, rather than a credit as at present.

So here we owe it to ourselves to keep an eye on our consumption, which is constantly rising, as even countries much richer than Tunisia, that have great supplies of energy, such as the United States to cite but one example, have succeeded in the last year in lowering their consumption by about 1 percent. How did they do it? By a policy of energy economy, certainly, but above all by a deterrent price policy. There is no deterrent but price.

Often, when one speaks of deterrence by price, people think of the automobile. Now in fact automobiles do not make up the biggest consumption. It is industry. How much fuel do we consume to produce a kilowatt, or a ton of cement, or a ton of steel? How much fuel is needed to go so many kilometers in our cars or trains? So there are ways to economize energy in these various fields. If we do not follow an ad hoc price policy, we will encourage people to waste energy [sic].

Consumption by private motorist is relatively marginal in Tunisia, by comparison with the rest of industrial consumption. So, through a price policy, through raising prices, we must aim first of all at reducing waste and second at making it profitable for investments to be made in the field of substitute energy sources of which I spoke before.

Presently, prices in Tunisia have no relation to world prices. If we were importers of fuel and gas oil, we would be paying three times the price at which we sell them to our compatriots at present. We should think about these problems.

Presently, America and Europe are shivering in winter because heating has been limited to 20 degrees [C.] because of the increase in the price of energy.

So sooner or later we must have a policy in this domain, and we have already begun to lay the foundations. It is obvious that we must not proceed in massive jumps: it could have traumatic or unhealthy effects on the Tunisian economy.

But we should nevertheless proceed, perhaps in homeopathic increments (you will excuse me for using medical terminology), until Tunisians are acclimatized to it. If we don't then on the day we go into deficit on energy products, our economy will be put in a catastrophic situation. One bright day we will find we have to pay 4 or 5 times dearer. Just imagine the indirect effects this could have on industry!

So we must invest very quickly in sectors where we can hope to find substitute sources, including petroleum research. This is also a reason for attracting foreign companies.

Many people ask why are we not doing the research ourselves. It is in our interest to attract the very highest technology, because our sub-stratum is very complex: it is volcanic, very fissured, and very divided-up. The foreign enterprises on whom we are calling to come work in Tunisia have very refined technology that would be very useful for us in trying to find the necessary quantities.

But it is obvious that we can do nothing if we don't have a policy of raising prices as close as possible to world prices. Gradually, to be sure, but ineluctably.

Tourism Is an Important, but not Fundamental, Element of our Economy

[Question] Regarding tourism, there is a controversy: some say it is a fragile sector, but its revenue in hard currency is on the order of 250 million dinars per year. What are the prospects for this sector?

[Answer] As I already said, we must first of all not allow this sector to reach proportions that would make it a fundamental element of the economy. The tourism sector is the second largest factor in our trade balance (if we put it in commercial terms), but it only represents 4.2 percent of Tunisia's PIB.

When you consider that agriculture is 18 percent, and that industry is 26 percent, you bring it back toward its real impact on the country. Tunisia, thank God, is not only a tourist country. Tourism is an important sector in our external resources-jobs balance, but it is not a fundamental element of our economy. Moreover, 1.4 million tourists at 8 or 9 nights per tourist is not all that much. I'll always remember the very good comparison given to me by a Tunisian at a meeting, when he said: there is 1 million of them and 6 million of us, and they consume 5 times as much as we do, so they are eating as much food as we do in the country; only he forgot that the Tunisians spend 360 nights a year in Tunisia, while the tourists spend only a week, and that, whatever the latter consume, one would have to multiply the figure for Tunisians by 365 and that for the foreigners by 8 to get an idea. So tourism is not as decisive a factor as some people think. And I think we have in the country sufficiently strong social structures and a sufficiently well-organized administration, and that Tunisians have attained a sufficiently high level of civilization to be able to sustain some tourist development.

After all we are not Zulus, that the shock of tourism should kill Tunisia. We are not people who have nothing: we have historical social structures, and I think that tourism has not completely denatured us, even if there are certain aspects that may seem negative to us. Tourism has not changed the Tunisian in a fundamental way, either in terms of consumption, or in social terms, or in any other terms. One would have to be looking for an argument to deny this, I think.

We are, however, convinced that this sector should remain at its present proportions, even if it constitutes for us a significant source of supplemental income that helps Tunisia continue to buy things such as equipment goods essential to its economic progress.

Another aspect which is perhaps a technical aspect is more dense development of what we have already acquired. We have made very large investments in infrastructure. What we are considering in terms of the number of beds during the next Plan is aiming more at utilizing money we have already spent rather than making new outlays. We have put in gas mains, electricity, we have built refining stations, roads, zones have been improved. Nevertheless, the network remains too thin at present, and we think it is possible to intensify it and to achieve at a marginal cost a much greater profitability of investment and more intense exploitation of the zones already created.

What then is the future of tourism in our country? People have been predicting catastrophes ever since I was involved in this sector (and I go back a long time in the ministries, as functionary and then as official). But time after time Tunisia has been saved by miracles: once it was the crisis in Spain, another time the crisis in Cyprus, and the sector continues to advance.

There is often a tendency to forget that tourism is the most heavily national sector. When you take a Tunisian hotel, and you see what is there, (apart perhaps from some vertical hotels that use several elevators) you will realize that in its totality it is more than 80 percent made up of Tunisian products.

The furnishings industry, for example, was developed in Tunisia thanks to tourism. The same for artisanry, plumbing, etc. The rebirth of agriculture in the tourist regions has also been achieved thanks to tourism. So many sectors have benefited from the development of tourism.

On the other hand, what other national investment can parlay 6 thousand dinars into nearly 2 thousand dinars per year in [hard] currency? Such is the case with tourism. Neither steelwork, nor agriculture can do as much, not to speak of the collateral effects on sectors such as trade, restaurants... which tourist consumption creates.

[Question] Isn't that precisely the fragility of this sector? Though it only represents a tiny portion of the PIB, it has spill-over effects that, in case of crises, could make themselves felt on all the other sectors?

[Answer] This is quite right. It is a sector that, when it weakens, creates a slump. But one must still take two other elements into account. First of all, there is internal tourism, which is beginning to take a significant place; it represents already more than 6 percent and will certainly grow over the next few years, especially since hoteliers have become aware of its importance. On the other hand, we have diversified our touristic sources. We are presently seeing arrive people from the Middle East, Algeria, etc. Our Arab brothers are beginning to represent a not insignificant potential. Then, we have tremendously diversified our European sources. At the beginning, we were dependent on two nationalities. Today, we have a very wide range.

I think that, in light of all these factors, the tourist sector, just as all the other sectors of the Tunisian economy, remains more or less dependent on external circumstances. Tunisia, as I said, needs money to import products. Now, by virtue of its size, and by virtue of its situation, external elements represent 24 to 25 percent of the total resources at its disposal, that is, Tunisia exports almost a quarter of what it produces. Thus, Tunisia in the last analysis is dependent on its trade with other countries. Touris is one of these elements of dependence, but it is not the only one. We do not consume all our oil, all our vegetable oils, all our phosphate, or all our phosphoric acids. Touris is thus not an isolated case, and its fragility is neither greater nor less than that of the other export sectors. If we were only to create development industries when there was no risk, nothing would have been built in Tunisia. We are thus obliged, we are condemed to take risks in order to develop.

The Maghreb Countries Should Coordinate Their Positions in Negotiating With the EEC

[Question] Relations between Tunisia and the EEC in recent years have been characterized by the train of protectionist measures taken by the countries of the Community. What are the prospects for these relations, especially in wake of the visit of Mr Francois Poncet, the French minister of foreign affairs, to Tunisia?

[Answer] It is really the visit of Mr Davignon, the EEC commissioner for industry, which is the most important factor. With France, we have special bilateral relations which Mr Poncet's visit has reconfirmed, and we are very satisfied. The French have been our mentors ever since we started negotiating with the Community, but it is with Mr Davignon that we have negotiated and exposed our problems.

I think that we have arrived at a profitable basis for compromise which takes account both of their concerns and our interests, that is to say, we have reached agreement to confront concretely our differences in perspective and to avoid to the greatest extent possible creating unexpected shocks in our relationship. This, I think is a very major breakthrough.

We do not intend to impose our policy on Europe, and I think that Europe in turn does not intend to impose its own on us, but we said to Europe: "If we are to continue to maintain the relations we wish to maintain, it is necessary that you take into account our point of view and our concerns. If you agree to this, I think that, being broadminded men, we will arrive at an understanding with out. Give us this much, and we will be on our way."

This is an important thing, but it should not make us rest all our hopes on Europe. As I already said, we should try to cooperate with countries at the same industrial plateau as ourselves, countries that have the same concerns as we. I will cite, as a very visible example, the fraternal countries of Algeria and Morocco. It is obvious that if we coordinate our positions, and this moreover has already been accepted both in Rabat and Algiers during the visits of Mr Mohamed Mzali, we will have improvement. If we ourselves make sufficient efforts to show that we are disposed to help each other, initially, (it is said that well-thought-out charity begins with oneself), I believe that the Europeans will be more broadminded toward us. But if we continue to walk each on his own path, to say: "You gave to them, why won't you give us as much?", and if each tries to pull all of the scant covers to his own side of the bed, since the biggest part of the covers has gone to Spain, or to a certain other country, it is obvious that all three of us will find ourselves naked.

Tunisian-Algerian Cooperation...Harmonizing Efforts and Benefiting From Each Other's Experiences

[Question] Bilateral cooperation between Tunisia and Algeria has just been launched: what, in your opinion, are the sectors where this cooperation could be most concretely strengthened?

[Answer] With Algeria, exactly as with Morocco one might add, we have just had negotiations which have brought to light the very preoccupations I just mentioned. We constate that we have made much progress and we are going to try experiments in cooperation, in coordinating our efforts and in exchanging our respective experiences.

The visit of the Prime Minister to Algeria resulted in important and immediately realizable decisions. Thus, we agreed to exchange visits of delegations at the level of sectoral leaders. Quite recently, a large Tunisian delegation went to Algeria to hold discussions with the sectoral chiefs in the machine and electrical fields, and the results obtained are especially significant and encouraging, and should enable our economic exchanges to reach a new dimension.

So serious things are moving forward. A large joint Tunisian-Algerian commission is also scheduled quite soon.

We are going in the same direction, and with respect to the Maghreb, there only remains to work out a few political problems.

ECONOMIC MINISTER DISCUSSES ENERGY FUTURE OF COUNTRY

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 29 Oct 80 p 5

[Text] The work of the Franco-Arab colloquium on new energy sources began Sunday at Sousse under the chairmanship of Mr Abdelaziz Lasram, minister of the national economy, who on this occasion delivered a presentation on Tunisia's energy situation.

After having welcomed the participants to this colloquium organized by the Franco-Arab chamber of commerce, Mr Lasram described the concerns of Tunisia, which, according to current predictions, is going to see its external trade in the energy field undergo a reversal of sign toward the negative between the beginning and the end of the Eighties. Also, in the next 10 years energy could become the ocuntry's biggest import, if new resources are not discovered, thus explaining Tunisia's interest in the overall problem of energy and in this colloquium in particular, the minister said, describing in this connection the two sides of the energy balance: resources on the one hand and utilization on the other.

Resources, first of all: the ministers said that Tunisia's oil production (5.5 million tons in 1980) will experience a decline in the future, whereas availability of natural gas will increase starting next year thanks to the quantities of natural gas that is to be set aside for Tunisia from the Algerian gas that will transit through Tunisia on its way to Italy.

"However, we must start looking now at the exploitation of new energy sources in order to reduce the preponderance of hydrocarbons," Mr Lasram said, underlining the fact that Tunisia believes the next step is to use imported coal for production of electricity and to intensify prospecting for lignite. The minister noted that the demand for energy reached 2.5 million tons in 1979, for an increase of 11 percent per year during the course of the last decade.

The minister continued next to speak of actions undertaken by Tunisia in the context of energy economy.

These actions, he explained, are aimed at getting a better understanding of the ultimate destination of the energy consumed under different forms in order to identify the sectors that consume the most energy, in order to establish an indispensable reference point for making coherent energy decisions.

Regarding new energy sources, the minister posed several questions which, he believes, the experts are needed to answer and which dealt with the necessity to move forward with the exploration and utilization of wind, solar, and other forms of energy.

For his part, Mr Jean Pierre Pruteau, French secretary of state with the minister of industry emphasized the special character of Tunisian-French relations in particular and of French-Arab relations in general, before giving to the audience a summary of the policy of his country on energy matters.

He said that France, which considers the development of new energy sources to be a necessity for the world and for peace, has developed a plan which would enable it by 1980 [sic] to reduce its invulnerability of energy, and to convert to new forms of energy.

France, he said, is trying to support international dialogue and concertation in order to free up prospects for adjusting supply and demand, to define a mechanism, of price adjustment, to develop research on new energy sources and to support coordinated action between the producers and consumers for the benefit of the most disadvantaged countries.

Before that, in opening the colloquium, Michel Habib-Deloncle, president of the Franco-Arab chamber of commerce, and Bourhan Dajani, secretary general of the federation of chambers of commerce, industry and agriculture of Arab countries, both highlighted the importance of the discussion which will be launched on new energy sources, both for the French side and the Arab side.

They also mentioned the emergent problems of the progressive exhaustion of sources of oil, the impact of this phenomenon on the future of humanity, and the necessity for both sides to establish dialogue and cooperation beneficial to both parties.

KOOLI OPENS COORDINATION COMMITTEES CONFERENCE

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 29 Oct 80 p 4

[Text] Mr Mongi Kooli, deputy prime minister and head of the party, who presided yesterday morning at the opening of the conference of the secretary-generals of the coordination committees, made a speech on this occasion in which he analyzed the important role incumbent on the coordination committees, especially at a time when the party is settling down to prepare for the congresses of Destourian cells. He emphasized that all efforts should be bent toward strengthening the activity of the party and intensifying efforts in order for the PSD [Destourian Socialist Party] to remain the channel for mobilization of all energies into the battle for development which the party has undertaken to wage with unshakeable determination.

Determination To Surmount Problems and Obstacles

Mr Mongi Kooli stressed that the battle for development is a long-range effort. Achieving victory over under-development depends on the determination of Destourian militants and their resoluteness in surmounting problems and obstacles, because it is true that in order to achieve the objectives of our next development plan we must take into account a whole set of factors both internal and external.

General Mobilization and Constant Vigilance

The head of the party added:

"It is important for us, at the time when we are readying ourselves to launch ourselves into the third decade of development and to draft the broad lines of the Sixth Plan that will be at the heart of the next party congress, to take into consideration the external factors. We must also look far ahead into the future. By looking clearly at our resources and our potential. By doing this, the congress will be prepared to define our broad options in matters of development."

After reviewing the main chapters of the plan that will be clarified further in the course of the party congress next spring, Mr Mongi Kooli noted that the PSD is assuming a fundamental role in meeting the conditions for the success of the development plan, remarking that it is necessary to improve the social climate and to mobilize all useful energies through the Destourian cells.

Gamble on our Abilities

Analyzing the meaning of authentic democracy, the head of the PSD underlined that democracy does not mean weakness and toleration with respect to destructive political currents. By rejecting all election fraud, we offer the same opportunity to every citizen, in the framework of the law.

"Nevertheless, it is our right, or rather, it is our duty, to endorse only those in whom we have confidence, those who are faithful to the orientation of the party and its options.

We are only gambling on those who are intelligent, competent, imbued with shining and respected high moral values," the PSD leader said.

The Party's Interest Above All

Mr Mongi Kooli also exhorted the secretary-generals of the coordination committees to put the party's mission above all personal considerations and to take into account only the party's interests, reaffirming the need to examine all questions with due deliberation, wisdom, and far-seeing vision, and not to hesitate to use the tool of uncertation.

"Taking an oath is a practice to which we must return for joining the party and getting a membership card.

"The card should be issued individually, and we should hardly be fearful of limiting the number of members. The party can accept being a minority if this minority is sincere, faithful, and committed," he said, exhorting the secretary-generals to continue the work of administering the budgets of the cells and districts and to keep ever in mind that the party only asks for what the Supreme Champion and the sacred principles have inculcated in us.

MZALI URGES DOMESTIC, FOREIGN POLICY IMPROVEMENTS

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 29 Oct 80 p 4

[Text] Mr Mohamed Mzali, secretary general of the PSD [Destourian Socialist Party], brought to a close Monday evening at Party House at the Kasbah the conference of secretary-generals of the coordination committees whose deliberations lasted the entire day Monday.

At the start of the meeting, Mr Mongi Kooli, director of the party and deputy prime minister, welcomed the secretary general of the PSD and thanked him, on behalf of all the participants, for having brought together the secretary-generals of the coordination committees who thereby would have the opportunity to profit from his counsel at a time when the party is on the threshold of the third decade of development and while it is preparing to hold its congress which will have to lay out the broad lines of the Sixth Plan.

Mr Mongi Kooli next gave a comprehensive summary of the work of the conference and the conclusions and recommendations that resulted from it.

Mr Mohamed Mzali made a speech on this occasion at the beginning of which he reiterated his congratulations to the secretary-generals of the coordination committees and expressed to them his satisfaction with the results that crowned the latest meetings of the party coordination committees.

He next declared that he was confident about the future of the party: "I have absolutely no doubt," he said, "that the secretary-generals of these coordination committees will remain attached to the moral concepts and the ethos of the party and that they will not spare any efforts to see that the PSD remains the object of the respect and consideration of the popular masses by virtue of their exemplary conduct and the creative and intense activity they manifest."

The prime minister also mentioned the favorable climate which reigns today in the country, about which the secretary-generals of the coordination committees unanimously expressed themselves as being well-pleased. He exhorted the latter to continue with activities to preserve this climate and to consolidate this foundation by preaching the good word in accordance with the directives of the president of the republic.

"This peaceful climate," he said, "constitutes in our eyes the protective shield against anything that could threaten our sovereignty, and at the same time the best guarantee of the ultimate devotion with which we are proposing to pursue the prize of development in the course of the next decade.

"The government of Tunisia, under the aegis of the Supreme Champion, works unceasingly to improve the climate inside the country and to consolidate our network of friendships abroad, and it has made in this field some appreciable gains."

The prime minister reviewed achievements and projects contemplated for the future in this perspective. He was especially pleased at the understanding and cooperation that now characterize relations between Tunisia and its Maghreb neighbors. "Prospects for economic interaction between our countries are extremely encouraging, and the future of industrial complementarity is most promising. Besides, we are in the process of moving firmly toward economic integration on the scale of the Greater Arab Maghreb," he added.

Mr Mohamed Mzali also spoke of efforts that have been made recently toward consolidating Tunisia's position with respect to friendly countries, laying special emphasis on gains made in tightening the bonds of friendship and cooperation between the PSD and the European socialist parties.

The prime minister also reviewed the results of the visit just made to Tunisia by his French counterpart, Mr Raymond Barre. In this connection, he mentioned the profound impact that this visit had in reinforcing the bonds of friendship and cooperation between the two countries.

Mr Mzali also dealt with Destourian activities and with the necessity of redoubling efforts in order to consolidate the party's position and to increase its impact on all the populous [social] classes.

"Our work on development," he said, "is a labor of a socialist and popular character that implies that the Tunisian General Federation of Labor must be a strong and democratic organization to play its part fully, in the struggle for development alongside the party, which intends to remain ever faithful to the popular line established by the Supreme Champion, and faithful also to his message on mobilization of energies, safeguarding the regime, and bringing the people together by means of persuasion."

Mr Mohamed Mzali recommended to the secretary-generals of the coordination committees to devote themselves selflessly and enthusiastically to the elaboration of their programs of activity in all ways so that all sectors of the populace and all categories of the young can have the widest chances for fruitful work and effective participation in the nation's advance toward development, invulnerability, and prosperity.

ARAB INSURANCE SYNDICATE FORCED TO SUSPEND OPERATIONS

Paris AN-NAHAR ARAB REPORT & MEMO in English 13 Oct 80 pp 7, 8

[Text]

An Arab maritime insurance group set up in opposition to Lloyd's of London has been forced to suspend its operations because of a refusal by Lloyd's to provide it with essential reinsurance cover. Insurance sources told this newsletter that Lloyd's had offered only a small fraction of the $1 billion which the Arab War Risks Syndicate would need as a minimum to start business next January.

To put this figure into perspective, the sources said that the Iraq-based syndicate could expect to earn between $10 and $12 million in its first year of operation; by comparison, annual premium income of Lloyd's is about $4.8 billion. These estimates were based on rates prevailing before the outbreak of the war between Iraq and Iran.

With supertankers insured for up to $100 million, and with anywhere between 15 and 20 vessels queueing up to load at large terminals like Saudi Arabia's Ras Tannura, insurers could face a bill of $2 billion as the result of a single air raid, the sources added.

The proposal to set up the Arab War Risks Syndicate (AWRS) was made after Lloyd's declared the Gulf a war zone last year and doubled premiums on tankers to 0.05 per cent of the hull value. It was estimated that this would cost Arab owners an extra $85 million. The London group subsequently rescinded its decision, which had followed a warning from the US State Department that an attempt might be made to hijack or sink an oil tanker. Charges were levelled, however that the West was waging "economic warfare" on the Gulf nations and insurers from Bahrain, Iraq, Oman, Qatar, Saudi Arabia and the UAE went ahead with plans to create their own syndicate in opposition to Lloyd's (An-Nahar Arab Report & MEMO, February 18). At least 31 companies have now joined AWRS, which is still in the process of being established, under the Chairmanship of Mustapha Rajab, recently retired Chairman of Iraq Reinsurance and current Chairman of Arab Reinsurance of Beirut.

Mr Rajab visited London last month for talks with local brokers on the reinsurance needs of AWRS. Sources here said that the Arab group hoped that Lloyd's would provide at least 50 per cent of the reinsurance, but Lloyd's was willing only to cover excess of loss reinsurance, a "tiny fixed proportion of risks," as one broker put it.

Without the backing of Lloyd's, AWRS "will be in no position to offer insurance on the scale originally offered," a source said, adding: " The Arab war risks pool has suspended operations."

There is still talk of an Arab boycott of Lloyd's, but sources in the insurance world believe that most shipowners will continue to do business with the London group, because its members have so far left no-one uncovered in the Gulf.

On October 6, Lloyd's announced a new increase in war risk rates, which now stand at about 1.5 per cent of the value of each vessel plying the waters of the Gulf. Before the outbreak of hostilities on September 23, rates averaged 0.0375 per cent of hull value. The rates are reviewed daily and will no doubt rise steeply if the war continues. It is recalled here that at one stage during the Vietnam war, Lloyd's quoted a premium of 10 per cent on a ship bound for Saigon.

A confidential Lloyd's survey revealed that, before hostilities broke out, there were 486 vessels either in or bound for the Gulf. Several are believed to be trapped in the Shatt-el-Arab waterway, in the heart of the war zone, but none has so far been reported sunk. The rates generally quoted by Lloyd's no longer apply to vessels bound for either of the belligerent states.

The general conclusion here is that only London has a sufficiently flexible and developed market to offer the necessary cover to shipowners.

A spokesman for Iraq Reinsurance here said that Mr Rajab's talks were only "provisional." The Chairman of Willis Faber, A R Taylor, who was involved in talks with Mr Rajab on another occasion about six months earlier, said that his company refused to discuss "commercial transactions in which we may or may not have been involved."

Insurance specialists here said that Lloyd's might be trying to take advantage of the war in the Gulf to squeeze out its competitors, but they added that this was not necessarily the case. The group obviously had an interest in securing the best terms for itself in any reinsurance deal, they said.

Commenting on the efforts of AWES to establish itself, one expert said: " This proves that you cannot run a pool for one area, let alone the area most prone to have a war."

NOTION OF ESTABLISHING SCHOOL OF RELIGIOUS RENEWAL ADVANCED

Sharjah AL-KHALIJ in Arabic 15 Aug 80 p 3

/Article by Dr Muhammad 'Imarah: "The Notion of a Modern Religious Renewal School Will Illuminate the Nation's Path"/

/Text/ With Muhammad (on whom be God's peace and blessings), God rounded out the sequence of his prophets before mankind.

Since Islamic law is the final religious legal system, it has been decided, in Islam, that "renewal" is an inevitable necessity, except in the case of Islamic law, which is unique to and distinguishes this religion and makes it superior to the religions which preceded it!

Before the completion of the prophetic call and the divine mission, when apostacy, superstition, sects, and additional beliefs were transgressing against divine law and obliterating its features, or societies were developing and going beyond their limits, the divine guardian of man dealt with these emergencies with a new religious law which a new prophet brought to mankind. However, after the completion of the process of the prophetic call and the divine mission through Muhammad's eternal law, and the grant of permission to man to make "intelligence" and "wisdom" (philosophy) proof, in the company of "transmission" and "divine law," of the discovery of the correct path, "renovation" of religion and religious law became an inevitability, since it alone would perpetuate the purity of religion and allow religious law's innocence of heresy, superstition, sects and additional beliefs to endure. In addition, it was the unique means to determine new provisions of religious law which new developments and changes in man's status required and demanded as a result of the constant development which the passage of time and changes in place created!

Because the prophetic call and divine mission were completed with Muhammad (on whom be God's peace and blessings) and with Islam, there arose the inevitability of "renewal" within Islam and the unique nature of Islamic law came into existence with the statement of the prophet (on whom be God's peace and blessings): "At the start of every hundred years, God will send to this nation someone who will renew its religion."

Indeed the prophet of God--on whom be God's peace and blessings"--stipulated that renewal is "relevant" and "possible," in fact a "requisite" for faith, which is an affirmation from the heart. He told his companions "renew your faith." When they asked him "Prophet of God, how shall we renew our faith?" he said "constantly say 'There is no god but God!'" Then the majority of the thinkers of Islam came and stipulated that "faith" waxed and waned in accordance with the action of its practitioner and the purity of his conceptions, that is, that it was in a state of movement, renewal and renovation.

With the passage of the eras in Islam, "religious renewal" became a relevant matter, indeed a purpose and a desired objective--especially when apostasy, superstitions, sects and additional beliefs accumulated to the point where they almost obliterated the essence of religion and defrauded its essential beliefs, and when the developments of life postulated new phenomena which demanded that the provisions of religious law derived from the "advice and general issues" which Islam contented itself with determining, concerning the affairs of the world, be in harmony with them, lest religion seem deficient in keeping constantly abreast of advanced life!

This subject continued to be relevant, and a purpose and desired objective, until paralysis afflicted our Arab Islamic civilization when the effects of dominance by the army of Mamelukes, who were strangers to the spirit of Arabhood and the rational nature of Islam by virtue of race, capability and constitution, appeared in the state of our civilization, and renovation and individual judgment ceased.

We consider that those who acquiesced in the nation's progression down this path, after declaring the deficiencies and shortcomings and the closing of the gate to individual judgment, ceased mentioning new names in this series of the imams of renewal--those whom they mentioned like beacons whom God had provided for this nation, at the beginning of each Islamic century, so that this nation's religion might be renovated. In the sequence of men who renewed the religion, these historians have mentioned:

1. 'Umar ibn 'Abd-al-'Aziz, 681-720, at the start of the first 100 years of Islamic history.

2. Imam al-Shafi'i Muhammad ibn Idris, 767-819, at the start of the second century.

3. Ahmad ibn 'Umar ibn Suraij al-Baz al-Ashhab, 854-918, the judge of Shiraz, at the start of the third century.

4. The judge al-Bagillani Abu Bakr Muhammad ibn al-Tayyib, 950-1013, at the start of the fourth century.

5. Imam al-Ghazali Abu Hamed Muhammad ibn Ahmad, 1058-1111, at the start of the fifth century.

6. Imam al-Fakhr al-Razi, Abu 'Abdallah Muhammad ibn 'Umar, 1149-1210, at the start of the sixth century.

7. ibn Daqiq al-'Id Muhammad ibn 'Ali ibn Wahb, 1228-1302, at the start of the seventh century.

8. al-Siraj al-Balqini 'Umar ibn Ruslan ibn Nusayr, 1324-1403, at the start of the eight century.

9. Shaykh al-Islam Zakariya al-Ansari, 1423-1520, at the start of the ninth century.

10. Shams-al-Din al-Ramli, 1513-1596, at the start of the tenth century.

In spite of the observations we and others have on the fact that the names of these eminent authorities, and not others, were specified to be the most prominent renewers of Islam, they all, since al-Shafi'i, were Ash'aris, indeed Shafi'is! However, the purpose in making the citation here is to point out that historians of the Islamic renewal stopped at that date, that is, at the Mameluke era, when the negative elements of the latter, under the dominance of the Ottoman dynasty, were perpetuated. They did not give mention of knowledge of individual judgment and renovation and did not refer to effects of therenewal or individual judgment which was witnessed on the intellectual life of the nation, and thereby declared the paralysis and degeneracy which has afflicted our Arab civilization since that date!

This paralysis continued to be a curse hanging over the life of this nation and its civilization until the start of the modern era, until the school of religious renovation became crystallized: this was organized specifically about the philosopher of Islam, the awakener of the Orient and the inspirer of its modern resurgence, Jamal-al-Din al-Afghani (1838-1897).

While al-Afghani lit the torch of religious renewal and opened the door to it, then became immersed in political action against colonialism and tyranny, Professor Imam Shaykh Muhammad 'Abduh, 1849-1905, was the most prominent imam of this modern school of renewal of Islam. His emphasis on issues of liberation of the Moslem mind and renovation of the Islamic religion made it possible for him, along this road, to accomplish the greatest achievements which our nation has realized in its modern era, namely the achievements which caused this nation to live with a foot in the modern era!

The Notion of Renewal

It is worth pointing out that the expression "renewal" means more than the expression "change" or "development". "Change" and "development" do not require the connection of "the new" to "the old." If there is a link or connection, there is no rule specifying what aspects of "the old" must be preserved in "the new" and in what manner this "preservation" and "permanence" must occur. As for "renewal," that means "the elimination of anything which has affected principles, general issues and basic features and is in opposition to their spirit and their objectives, thereby revealing the purity of these principles and restoring them through rational individual thought so that they may do their work concerning matters which newly arise and matters which are new and are newly created in the real conditions of life." It comprises a return to the truth of the self, and a search for inspiration by factors and features of stability, with new added matters to deal with what is new, in the context of principles and fixed matters, so that its civilization may achieve a harmony which will turn its present state into a developed extention of the genuine features and the essential elements of permanence of its old structure. This is what the expression "renewal" means.

In the light of this truth, we can understand the position of the modern school of religious renewal, the giant contribution of Imam Muhammad 'Abduh, and the manner in which this position and contribution stand apart from the positions and contributions of other intellectual currents. This school represents:

The middle position, that is, the truth which lies between the two forms of folly!

The third way, that is, the moderate way which lies between the two forms of extremism!

Harmony between the elements of permanence, principles and variables which life presents and transcends.

The genuine nature and the contemporary nature, in accordance with the expression which is in common use among us these days.

It happened that this school of renewal has said:

No to the current of "westernization" whose adherents have sought it--the colonialists, their partisans, and those who were "dazzled" and overwhelmed by the grandeur of European civilization when they compared it with the backwardness of the Mamelukes and the Ottomans. This school /of renewal/ saw in "westernization" a matter which transcended "renovation," saw the forcible uprooting of a venerable nation from its profound origins, and also saw in it a cultural co-optation which turned this nation into a "cultural sideline" of the colonial West which supported the oppressive state of affairs that colonialism created when it turned this nation, with its situation and its resources, into a "sideline" of the /world/ economy. It also saw in it a real oppressive danger to the spirit of Islamic Arab civilization--a spirit which struck a balance between "religion" and "the material world," "spirit" and "body," "Islamic law" and "wisdom," "transmitted truth" and "knowledge," and so on and so forth, and was threatened by the aggressive material character of the caravan of the movement of "westernization!"

No to the thinking of the dark ages which represented stagnation and decadence, as well as apostasy against the features of the civilization of the Moslem Arabs in the era of their renaissance, which gave the colonialist enemies of this nation broad scope to invade its homes, with an onslaught of the land and the mind together!

It was in the context of this confrontation with the thinking of the dark ages that the school of religious renewal's criticism against the superstition and charlatanism has taken place, Sufism has turned into at the hands of the "Sufic orders," and the paralysis, divorcement from reality of life, and distance from beneficial and necessary sciences which have befallen al-Azhar--whether these sciences were the sciences of the ancients or of the moderns!

Renewal, Westernization and Paralysis

Thus the school of religious renewal, and the great architect of its structure, Imam Muhammad 'Abduh, took this clear, decisive stand against the two currents which divided the nation's public at the start of the century of its awakening and resurgence, especially during the second half of the 19th century. They presented the distinctive new position and drew up the third platform for the nation and the reform movement. They wished this nation a modern cultural renaissance which was firmly linked to its cultural principles and features of permanence and was impregnated with the religious spirit which characterized the leaders of this nation throughout its long history, without letting this impregnation reach the point of a "priesthood" or "religious power" in which religious leadership would tyrannize the powers of the people! They wanted this renaissance, in inspiration and revival, to depend on "transmitted truth" and "knowledge" alike, seeking the aid of the legacies of the forefathers, those who preceded the era of degeneration, and the discoveries and knowledge of those who came later, in crystallizing the new style of the Islamic Arab civilization which struck deep roots into history!

Concerning this distinctive cultural position, which is represented in the third way which this school of Islamic renewal drew up, the great architect of its giant structure Imam Muhammed 'Abduh says:

"I grew up, as every member of the great public of the middle class of Egypt's population grew up, became involved in what they were involved in, and soon became weary of continuing with what they had become habituated to. I rushed impulsively to seek something they did not know, and stumbled on what they had not stumbled upon, calling for the best of what I found, appealing for it, and crying on high to summon:

"Liberation of thought from the restrictions of tradition, understanding of religion in the manner of the nation's forefathers before the disputes arose and a return of the acquisition of learning to its initial sources, considering that to be part of the balance of the human intelligence which God has set forth to bring learning back from its excesses and alleviate confusion and disorder so that God's wisdom would be realized in the preservation of the order of the human realm, so that in this manner he would be considered a friend of knowledge, a seeker of the quest for the secrets of existence, calling for respect for the proved facts and demanding they be relied upon in the culture of the spirit and the reform of work--all this I considered to be one issue.

"Reform of the styles of the Arabic language in composition, be they in official correspondence or in the body of what the newspapers publish, essays or translations from other languages, or communications between people.

"Distinguishing between the right to the obedience of the people, which the government possesses, and the right to justice from the government and the ruler, which the people possess. If the ruler must be obeyed by the people who are in error and who are dominated by their appetites, only the advice of the nation in word and deed will bring it back from its error and put a stop to the oppressiveness of its appetites.

"In appealing for this, I differ with the opinion of the two great groups of which the body of the nation is composed--those who seek the sciences of religion and their ilk, and those who seek after the arts of the age and their ilk!"

It was through this distinctive stand and this special platform that the giant contribution of the school of religious renewal in this nation's "battleground of civilization," the battleground in which this essential, focal issue was raised, and remains raised, took place.

Who are we? Where will we start from? Where will we be going? Where do our roots and our cultural affiliations lie? In the liberal West? In the authoritarian East? Or do our cultural roots and affiliations lie in the distinctive Arab Islamic civilization which our nation forged centuries ago?

Today, with the intensifying debate between the answers the various intellectual currents offer on this focal, essential issue, with the emergence of the call for "Westernization" in its liberal or its authoritarian form and with the intensifying oppression of those to whom Islam means only paralysis, ossification, and the appeal to cast the present and future in the mold of the past--and the past of the dark ages at that--the need to offer the notion of the new school of religious renewal to the masses of this nation so that it may illuminate its path is growing intense!

INTERNATIONAL MOSLEM BROTHER ORGANIZATION CONDEMNS SYRIA

Cairo AL-DA'WAH in Arabic Sep 80 p 52

/Article: "Statement by the International Organization of the Moslem Brothers"/

/Text/ Thanks be to God; peace and blessings be on the prophet of God, his family and companions, and those who have called out his message, have been led by his guidance and have progressed with his traditions to the day of judgment.

Following that: the Moslem Brothers' call arose more than half a century ago. Its primary goal was to establish God's religion on earth, strengthen his almighty Islamic law among mankind, liberate all the places where Islam dwells, unify the nation of Islam under the banner of the Koran, and uplift it materially and spiritually, in accordance with the book of God and the sayings and doings of his noble prophet, on whom be God's peace and blessings.

A great Islamic movement arose to achieve this objective, combining words of truth, directing efforts toward the good, raising generations in piety, mobilizing the nation for efforts on God's path, and embracing the defense of the causes of Moslems everywhere, foremost the cause of Palestine, warning the Islamic world of its gravity at a time when most people were ignorant of it and offering the best of its young men to liberate it when all were shrinking from sacrifice.

It is no wonder that the forces antagonistic to Islam, domestically and abroad, have gathered together to oppose the road to movement, trying to obstruct its progress, seeking the aid of their agents who revolve in their universe and follow their orders, and bringing on the objects of this call the worst type of torture, maltreatment, dispossession and killing. However, God prevents anything but his light from being realized: the movement emerged from its successive torments purer in essence, more intense in strength and firmer in resolve, its enemies met with failure and disgrace, and all who were sincerely genuine and all who were liars and agents became revealed to the people.

Today this movement, in beloved Syria, is facing a new trial at the hands of the Nusayri rulers who are apostates of Islam, as distinguished religious scholars headed by the Sheikh of Islam, ibn Taymiyah have decreed--rulers who are vindictive toward Moslems and agents of the enemies of Islam, who handed the Golan over to Israel, who broadcast the fall of al-Qunaytirah before it actually fell, who exterminated the inhabitants of Tall al-Za'tar, who cooperated with the separatists who have made common cause with Israel inside Lebanon, and other things which history has recorded, in addition to the things they did during their tenure in rule in the country in the form of corrupting morals, wrecking the economy, destroying freedoms, twisting the people's will in order to create subordinates at the hands of the trade unions, and so on and on and on.

These rulers, who are still taking the money of Arabs and Moslems in order to seek their aid in fighting the usurper Zionism, but are actually taking it in order to fight Syrian citizens without firing a single shot at the chest of a usurping Zionist, have killed many of the best scions of the people, have expropriated freedoms, have turned the beloved nation into a great prison, have shown contempt for distinguished religious scholars, have taken mosques by storm, have killed those who have built them up, have observed no sanctity in them, have crushed the heroic army which was one of the strongest of Arab armies, have destroyed the Syrian domestic economy, have fought against the devout, have fuelled the fire of dissension among the classes of the people, and have killed even their old colleagues in the party. They even are wreaking vengeance against many intelligent people who are members of their faction, out of their overdone tyranny and shedding of blood.

The International Organization of the Moslem Brothers stands with all its power alongside the combative Syrian people who have risen up in rebellion in defense of their sacred possessions to protect their religion, values and freedoms against the dominant factional regime which wishes to eliminate the Syrian Islamic personality and impose its dominance upon it.

The International Organization of the Moslem Brothers also stringently condemns the brutal acts which this tyrannical regime is carrying out against the Syrian people in general and the Moslem Brothers in particular in the form of violating women's honor, killing old men, children and mothers, brutally torturing detainees, and conducting mass killing of prisoners, as happened in the prison of the Municipality of al-Raqqah, where Rif'at al-Asad killed more than 150 prisoners, and as also happened in the slaughter at the Palmyra Prison near the city of Hama, which has become a widespread scandal, in which machine guns opened fire and killed no less than 1,000 of the cream of the Syrian people, scholars, doctors, engineers, teachers, senior officers, professionals and university and secondary school students!

What is most amazing is that the Arab and international media do not refer to these vile events at which ears cringe on hearing of their terror, at a time when the International Commission on Human Rights has condemned them more than once, as have some trade unions in Syria itself and elsewhere and the Conference of Arab Lawyers which met in Morocco.

The most recent surprise this arbitrary regime offered to the world was the decree whose likes no one has heard of in ancient or modern times, which is the death penalty for anyone belonging to the Society of Moslem Brothers! They were not content with this--rather, they gave warning through threats, admonitions and killing to members of the Moslem Brothers wherever they were.

The International Organization of Moslem Brothers announces that these threats will never scare any Moslem Brothers because they have pledged their lives to Almighty God and believe that no one will die before his time "Say that nothing except what God has foreordained for us will afflict us."

Let these domineering rulers know that Moslem Brothers everywhere will never stand with their hands tied in the face of any aggression against any of them. They are able, with God's help, with God granting them success, to return blows with like blows, exercising his almighty words "To those who have triumphed after their oppression there will be a way, but the way for those who tyrannize people and covet land unjustly will be a painful torment." That is a saying of glorious God.

May God's prayers and God's peace be upon our lord Muhammad and his family and companions.

God is most great, and to God be thanks.

SPECULATION ON DISAPPEARANCE OF AFGHAN DIPLOMAT

Karachi JASARAT in Urdu 21 Sep 80 p 3

[Editorial: "Where Did the Afghan Diplomat Go?"]

[Text] According to a report, the first secretary of the Afghan Embassy, Mr Qayum Mansur, has been missing for the last 2 weeks. The Afghan Embassy claims not to know anything about him except that he was seen last at a reception given by the Russian Embassy on 8 September. He was to leave on a plane bound for Kabul on 9 September but he did not board the plane. His sucessor is already in Islamabad.

A news item in a local daily tells us that when Pakistan's Ministry of Foreign Affairs inquired about Mr Mansur, they said that Mr Mansur had not requested political asylum from Pakistan and that they did not know of his whereabouts.

This news item is brief and arouses curiosity; it therefore requires some explanation due to its importance. The disappearance of a diplomat cannot remain unnoticed by the media, especially when that diplomat belongs to a nation at war. There can be several implications of this event.

The basic question is: What is the attitude of other diplomats at the embassy? Did they report his disappearance to the local police or the Foreign Office of the Pakistani Government? If not, then it is clear that this disappearance was prearranged with the approval of the Afghan Government and the embassy here is trying to downplay it.

The reasons for this disappearance need probing. It should be kept in mind that Mr Mansur was due to depart for Kabul on the 9th of this month, a seat was reserved for him on the plane and he attended a reception at the Russian Embassy on 8 September. His presence at the Russian reception indicates that he was not undisposed toward the Russians nor was he considered oppressed by the Russians, therefore he was not in need of political asylum. The statement issued by the Pakistani Foreign Office stating that he did not ask for political aslym supports this hypothesis.

However, the question of the officer's disappearance is still before us. If the Afghan Embassy does not want to look for him the Pakistani Government should.

It is appropriate for our government to issue a statement based on its information to alleviate concern among the people.

Our Foreign Office must be equipped with information to explain this incident satisfactorily. What are the reasons behind the mass transfer of diplomats in Afghan embassies? This side of the story requires special attention because only recently Nasir Hussayni, an Afghan diplomat stationed in Paris, requested political asylum from the United States.

Karachi JASARAT in Urdu 18 Sep 80 pp 1, 6

[Article: "Afghan Ministers Sentenced to Death for Deception; Came for Negotiations, Requested Helicopter and Siege."]

[Text] Rawalpindi, 17 September (Reported by Mukhtar Husayn)--More details of the death of two Afghan ministers and 90 soldiers in Paktia have been uncovered. According to the information received, Mujahidin made two demands of the ministers, Fayiz Mohammad and Nazar Mohammad, when they negotiated at Sayyed Khel. According to the first condition, Afghanistan was to be declared an Islamic nation and Russians were to leave the country. The second condition demanded two military divisions stationed at Paktia be given to Mujahidin and Kabul's independence from Russian occupation. Fayiz Mohammad refused both conditions and tried to buy the Mujahidin with money. Since it was time for worship the meeting adjourned. While most people were busy praying, Fayiz Mohammad and his group went toward the river. They informed their bosses on a hidden wireless set that negotiations had failed, and advised besieging the place. They also asked for a helicopter for their escape. The Mujahidin heard this conversation and a bloody battle ensued in which 90 soldiers accompanying the ministers were killed. The remaining 100 surrendered. Fayiz Mohammad and his followers were taken before a panel of judges and were sentenced to death according to the Islamic law for treachery.

OPPOSITION PARTIES TO FORM NATIONAL FRONT IN EGYPT

NC041248 Beirut AL-SAFIR in Arabic 1 Nov 80 pp 1, 7

[Excerpt] Cairo (AL-SAFIR)--Political circles in Egypt expect that the establishment of the Democratic National Front of political parties and personalities which radically oppose President al-Sadat's regime will be announced in the coming few weeks.

Contacts among the parties (public and secret) and national figures have ended in agreement on the need for this front and the importance of announcing its establishment and exercising its activities. The founding members of the front, who will not exceed 15, are expected to issue a statement to the Egyptian people defining the basic aims of the front.

The founding members of the front will decide in the coming few days whether to declare themselves as a preparatory committee of the front and call on the national parties and personalities to join it on the basis of a 5-point program--which is toppling the existing regime and forming a national government to conduct free, democratic elections of a constituent assembly to draft a new constitution--or announcing the establishment of the front and opening it to the national parties and personalities that accept the front's program.

The proposed program of the front consists of a preamble and a diagnosis of the comprehensive crisis gripping the Egyptian society. The program lists four manifestations of this crisis. These are the economic crisis, the political rights and freedoms crisis, the national independence crisis and the crisis of confidence between the people and the authority, dishonesty and corruption of the regime.

The program also indicates that the establishment of a constituent assembly and the accomplishment of a constituent assembly and the accomplishment of its tasks will open the door to the implementation of a six-point program:

1. Liberating the will of the Egyptian citizen through the establishment of a parliamentary regime.

2. Ending corruption and bribery.

3. Adopting a policy of economic and social development.

4. Liberating Egypt from all forms of foreign military, political and economic domination.

5. Liberating all the Egyptian and Arab territories as well as Arab Jerusalem.

6. Returning Egypt to its leading position in the Arab homeland, the Islamic world and the nonaligned movement.

The program includes elaboration on each of these six points.

The leadership of the front (or the preparatory committee) will include representatives of all the main opposition political parties (public and secret), apart from the Labor Party, and all the national political currents (the Nasirites, Marxists, Nationalists and Democratic Nationals), apart from the Islamic current, the majority of which still refuses any alliance with the Nasirites and Marxists.

The opposition political circles in Egypt expect the establishment of the front to lead to a new violent and suppressive police campaign against the national forces in Egypt.

TEHRAN ORGAN DERIDES REAGAN, BUSH, KISSINGER

Tehran TEHRAN TIMES in English 6 Nov 80 p 1

[Text]

TEHRAN — Reaction in Iran on the election success of Ronald Reagan as the new president of the United States of America indicated a stoical, unruffled response reinforcing the nation's steely stand against the forces of imperialism, and predicating that the movement of the Islamic Revolution will continue its sweep across the world.

A national radio commentary on Ronald Reagan's victory was preluded by statements that changes in theoretical standpoints in Western nations reflected in shifts at the hustings were only palliatives to the ever increasing economic, political and cultural malaise which Western nations were struggling to swim against.

The commentary broadcast Tuesday soon after the announcement of election results said that it will not be long before imperialism is shattered from the word. It said this was a natural corollary to the increasing knowledge of the oppressed of the world that the very essence of the system was flawed. Flawed because of its servitude to special class interests which sought economic and political domination through colonialist policies in the world. It said that this made for an escalation of conflicts and a deepening of the gap between classes in societies within their own countries and throughout the world where imperialist domination was strong.

Scoffing at the mechanics of Western political systems, the commentary said that it was basically a game that politicians and diplomats had created, adding that changes such as the one from Carter to Reagan was just so much play in this superficial game.

In more satirical vain the commentary said that Ronald Reagan suited the part in the play, being a former Hollywood movie actor rather than an experienced politician. Then it went on to debunk likely Reagan seconds in the white House, calling George Bush, the Vice-President a former Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) man and Henry Kissinger, a Republican who may very likely be an advisor to the president a master mind in the U.S. Zionist lobby.

Leading on to the crux of the issue the commentary said that the election victory spelt the death knell of even the semblance of liberalistic policies which the Carter administration appeared to follow and would now surely lead to a more militaristic trend in its approaches to the world political situation.

Reagan, the radio said, had in his campaign statements increasingly stressed militaristic policies which he vowed to follow if elected and had affirmed that he would be never a party to a recognition of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO), calling it a terrorist group. The Reagan victory will mean a swing towards a more assertive Zionist policy, the radio commentary said.

Whatever the changes predicted for the United States, the sweep of world revolutionary movements which had received an impetus from the Islamic Revolution in Iran will not be impeded, the radio said. Quoting Iran's Revolutionary Leader and the Founder of the Islamic Republic, Imam Khomeini, it said, "America can do nothing." In these stubborn words there was a message for the oppressed of the entire world, the commentary said.

As a concession the commentary referred to shifts in the policy positions that Ronald Reagan had made during his campaign speeches and statements. It described these to tutoring of Ronald Reagan by more seasoned diplomats and political advisers in keeping with the realities of world trends today. The commentary said again that these trends were succinctly epitomised by Imam Khomeini who said that the "idols of the world were being broken" and that it will not be many more years before imperialism falls in ruin, a movement which neither Ronald Reagan or political theoreticians of any dye can hold back.

REAGAN'S POSSIBLE MOVES ANALYZED

LD100815 Kuwait AL-SIYASAH in Arabic 6 Nov 80 p 1

[Article by Ahmad al-Jarallah: "The Change That the Americans Wanted"]

[Text] According to statistics, one-third of those who voted for President-Elect Reagan voted for the new presidency out of a desire for change. It appears that the world has gotten tired of truce. What is desired is decisiveness by America and Russia.

Of course, not all that Reagan said during the election campaign can be taken as binding U.S. policies. When he enters the White House and says that he wants to reinstate Nationalist China (Taiwan) and withdraw U.S. recognition of the PRC he will be told that now is an unsuitable time to anger Beijing, which is no longer the town of Mao Tse-tung. Also Beijing is preparing to build factories costing billions and is in need of U.S. technology. Also China is still the strongest adversary of the Soviet Union.

With regard to the Middle East the new U.S. president will be told that the Arabs are now a real power and no longer tolerate U.S. arrogance. They have been patient and during the election campaign they tolerated all the nonsense and abuse of the U.S. electoral platforms but they are in control of the nerve of the U.S. stock exchange and own the oil which is important for the United States and its industry. They have proved that they are ready to die when it is a matter of their dignity, as is evident in what is happening now between Iran and Iraq.

Statistics experts said yesterday that one-third of those who voted for Reagan wanted change, but the change that Reagan declared might mean a new Hiroshima, which might not be important for Reagan whose age is verging on the eighties. [As published]. But there remains something more important called U.S. strategic interests.

LEADER OF ISTIQLAL PARLIAMENTARY GROUP DISCUSSES ACHIEVEMENTS

Rabat AL-'ALAM in Arabic 23 Oct 80 pp 1, 5

/Article: "Our Brother Faysal al-Khatib, Deputy Chairman of Unity and Egalitarian Group, Reviews the Results of Istiqlal Group Activity after 3 Years of Practice"/

/Text/ On the occasion of the inauguration of the new Chamber of Deputies session, we asked our brother Faisal al-Khatib, deputy chairman of the unity and Egalitarian Group, to provide us with the results of the group's activities during 3 years. Herewith is the first part of this comprehensive review of the group's activity and the results of parliamentary practice in general:

Three full years of activity in the current chamber of deputies have elapsed. We believe that this period is sufficient for seeking to ascertain the results of the activityof the Chamber of Deputies and determine whether it has proceeded in a direction aimed at actually implanting democratic life in our country.

Before all else, one must mention some basic facts, not out of a desire to calumny, the love to criticize, or the ardor to stress and repeat previous positions, but out of the consideration that these facts should have an objective effect on the course of the Chamber of Deputies in its work:

1. The Istiqlal Party was unique in devoting itself legally to contesting the official results of the 3 June 1977 elections before the relevant political and judicial sources, on grounds that these results produced a numerical majority which did not truly express the premises of political thinking in Morocco.

2. The members of the "winning" numerical majority ran for office on personal bases, not as part of a specific political organization or electoral program which was capable of being debated before the electorate. Although this "majority" exercised its members' political rights to discipline within a specific political organization, following the official announcement of its "victory," the political program of this new organization has not yet received the confidence of the voting citizens.

3. All the rebukes and criticisms directed by the Istiqlal Party against the official results announced on 3 June 1977 constitute a political and legal position regarding these results, and consequently do not prevent /us/ from dealing with them while being present in the confines of the parliament, on grounds that the existence of a "deficient" parliamentary institution exercising the rights of legislation and oversight over government activity is better that the lack of such an existence, in accordance with a viewpoint which concentrates on the need to develop political thinking and implant democratic habits in political behavior and on grounds that purifying the political and social climate of the country will be the fruit of a lengthy battle and struggle and that the Moroccan people, at their vanguard the cultural elite, must venture on its hazards to confront all the challenges which are in opposition to true democratic development.

From this, the difficulty of dealing with the current political balance is apparent. However, we prefer to face this difficulty with resolution, faith and forbearance, instead of declining to face it and leaving the country's powers and future exposed to various currents, tempests and dangers.

We, in the Istiqlal Party, do not consider that we are embarking on the hazards of "a democratic experiment." The country is not a laboratory for experiments, and must continue not to be one. Rather, we consider that the presence of the parliamentary institution is a political requirement for our country's growth, like the necessity for the presence of government or judiciary, administrative or security institutions, in spite of emphasis on our observation that the beginning was a "faltering step" which still needs to be rectified and that the coming legislative elections will be an opportunity to try to perform this "rectification."

After this prelude, which has been necessary in order to clarify the climate of political activity within the Chamber of Deputies, it is necessary to respond to the question some people are incessantly raising--either out of good will or a sort of request for knowledge of something, or out of ill will and the desire for revenge and exposure and to undermine domestic conditions. The two cases are a long-range political conception but are well known to everyone possessing a penetrating vision into the depth of things who perceives their background.

In either case, the question which is raised is, what has the Chamber of Deputies done to bring the country out of the economic and social crises it is suffering from?

The answer to this question does not require great scrutiny.

The crisis we are suffering from, from the economic and social standpoints, is in part a reflection of an international economic situation of growing severity, and in part the results of a policy and style of managing affairs which the country has followed since the early sixties; it is not one of the innovations of the Chamber of Deputies. Remedying its causes and results over the long range will be the joint responsibility of the government and parliament and also the responsibility of all political organizations present on the political stage, in view of the need to link the desirable to the possible and to spell out the tentative choices (I am not talking about ideological aspects) in the light of the available premises and resources and foreign and domestic circumstances which have a big effect on the type of decision which must be taken.

For example, there are two basic issues on which the future of development in our country depend.

The first is the war which was imposed upon us in the south of the country and the allocation of increasing credits which that requires for the sake of defending the country's identity and independence.

The second are the increasing costs of energy and oil resources as a result of the increase in domestic consumption on the one hand and the insane increase in prices of these materials, through the alliance of oil countries, in constantly continuing the increase in the prices of these materials on the international market, which has led to the constant impoverishment of the developing countries.

While the prices of oil materials in the international market are constantly increasing and in varying degrees influencing the economies of advanced and developing countries alike, the industrially advanced countries are less influenced by vicissitudes in the oil products market than the developing countries are, on the grounds that the countries producing oil and oil products reinvest the surplus of their financial revenues from the sale of oil materials in the industrial countries, and this inevitably leads to a stimulating of the labor market and an increase in the gross product of the industrially advanced countries, as contrasted with the situation regarding such developing countries as ours.

These premises, separately and in combination, perforce control the kind of policy which must be set forth in order to guarantee continued economic and social development, indeed, practical necessities sometimes make it mandatory, in such circumstances, that positions and measures be adopted which are not even in harmony with certain intellectual or ideological options--bearing in mind that political activity lies with the possible.

The Chamber of Deputies, with its well known present composition, is exercising its parliamentary tasks in the context of these circumstances, which are marked by the high costs and burdens of the war imposed upon us, the reflections of the international economic crisis, the problems which have been accumulated over many long years, and the financial costs their treatment, and the confrontation of their results, require--which are in excess of the limits of the resources currently available.

It must also not be absent from one's mind that the most numerous parliamentary group affects the trend of parliament's activities, either in view of the fact that guidance and operation of important economic sectors lies with the ministers who belong to this group, or in light of the internal contradictions which it suffers from, which causes an absence of decisive decisions on the guidance of economic policy in a manner which will respond intimately to the premises of the current crisis.

Now that we have finished giving a brief picture of the circumstances of the parliamentary activity of the current parliament, I consider it exceptionally necessary to furnish statistics to evaluate the results of the activity of the parliament and the efforts of the Istiqlal group within it to rectify the general conditions in the country.

It is clear that parliamentary activity is basically concentrated on the exercise of recommending laws, the exercise of oversight over government activity through oral and written questions, and in addition the guidance of government policy through votes on the matter of confidence in the government.

From the purely legislative standpoint, up to the end of last August, the government presented to the Chamber of Deputies, in addition to financial laws and the draft of the three-year plan, 62 drafts of laws, of which the Chamber of Deputies ratified 50, after most of them were amended and improved. These are provisions of varying importance, including ones related to the ratification of international agreements, drafts of important laws such as the draft law on legal defense, the draft law on the leasing of sites prepared for housing, the draft law establishing a higher council for accounting and regulating its fields of specialization, the draft law on bylaws for judges in the higher council for accounting, the draft law rectifying services performed in liberal education, the draft law organizing trade union elections in the Rio de Oro region, the draft law changing the law on the Board of Judiciary Aides, the draft law changing the law on military justice, and so forth.

There are still two /sic/ draft laws under the scrutiny of the Chamber of Deputies committees, including legislation related to the application of the system of real estate registration in northern Morocco, legislation related to the organization of the justice plan and the receipt and composition of documents, the draft law establishing an economic free zone for 200 nautical miles along the Moroccan coasts, the draft of an appropriations law, and the draft law encouraging real estate investments.

From the standpoint of union initiatives in the legislative field, there is a group of proposed laws issued by the deputies of various groups, numbering 84 by the end of last August, of which the Istiqlal's share was 21 (or 25 percent. These dealt with various subjects of concern to the development of the political, social and economic life of the citizens and expressed the Istiqlal Party's genuine concerns for the attainment of such development.

Thus the Istiqlal group in the Chamber of Deputies has set forth proposals of laws related to the abrogation of the 1935 Decree bearing on "obligatory respect for authority," restricting publication of AL-JARIDAH AL-RASMIYAH to the Arabic language, abrogating the group and territory courts, workers' participation in the profits of organizations, amendment of the penal code, amendment of the law organizing finances, the conveyance of unused, neglected lands owned by foreigners to the state or to groups, protection of the blind, the resistence and liberarion army, and the amendment of Chapter 11 of the law organizing finances. This gives proof of the diversity of the concerns and preoccupations of the Istiqlal parliamentary group--concernes and preoccupations reflecting the breadth of the scope of political and social activity of the Istiqlal Party.

In spite of the slow progress of the discussion in the context of the competent committees or parliament which the recommendations of laws issued by the Istiqlal group have experienced, this does not detract from the importance of the activity of the Istiqlal parliamentary group so much as it proves certain aspects of disruption in the progress of the institutions of parliament, for reasons which in no case are attributed to the nature or level of our parliamentary presence in the current parliament.

The quality and level of participation in the discussions; the mode of exercising parliamentary oversight over government action; the presentation of final conclusions on the effectiveness of the activity of the Istiqlal parliamentary group in particular; and the benefit of the progress of the institutions of parliament in general will be the subject of the coming treatment, with God's help.

PARDON FOR IMPRISONED TUNISIAN TRADE UNIONISTS DISCUSSED

LD121419 Paris LE MONDE in French 12 Nov 80 p 4

[Dispatch by Michel Deure: "President Bourguiba Pardons Most of the Trade Unionists Imprisoned After the January 1978 Riots"]

[Text] Tunis--On Monday 10 November President Bourguiba pardoned most of the trade unionists imprisoned after the violent riots which took place on 26 January 1978, who had already been granted conditional release.

This measure, taken on an individual basis, should in fact have the same effects as an amnesty but, when he announced it, Prime Minister Mohamed Mzali merely specified that "the effects of the verdicts passed fall within the pardon." In any case those who will enjoy this pardon should be able to recover their civil rights quickly. The presidential decision affects 10 members of the former Tunisian General Federation of Labor [UGTT] leadership, 6 of whom are at present members of the committee responsible for planning the forthcoming UGTT congress, and all the trade unionists who appeared before the regional courts, who number around 100 (note) (the exact number of trade unionists arrested, tried and sentenced after 26 January was never officially revealed).

"The head of state wanted to finally close the chapter of the painful events of 26 January 1978 and wanted all nationalist trade unionists to unite and serve the nation's higher interests," Mr Mzali said.

Mr Bourguiba is also meeting--but not fully--one of the main demands made by the former UGTT leadership who demanded that all trade unionists--"without exception"--be allowed to stand for office within the UGTT while the government's view is that, under the law, no condemned person can hold office unless he has benefitted from an amnesty. However, seven former leadership members, including former UGTT secretary general Habib Achour, still living under house arrest, have not received a pardon. Is that an obstacle? It is not generally thought to be and they will probably also be pardoned sooner or later, as Mr Mzali hinted when he said that the people pardoned on Monday only constitute "an initial group."

Whatever happens the gesture which Mr Bourguiba has just made and his avowed intention to finally close the "black Thursday" affair should help to ease social tension somewhat before the UGTT congress is held on 20 January. That congress should enable the trade union to regain an audience which it lost almost 3 years ago and to overcome reservations still shown in places despite the support given by a big majority of the former trade union leaders to the open policy which was introduced a few months ago.

PAPER CALLS FOR CONFRONTING REAGAN'S POLICY

CF101633 Sharjah AL-KHALIJ in Arabic 7 Nov 80 p 1

[Editorial: "This Is How Reagan Spoke; How Should the Arabs Reply"?]

[Excerpts] This is Reagan, the new man of the United States. He is insulting us all, regardless of our political views and ideas. He went so far as to insult Arab honor and dignity when he stood in front of the cameras yesterday to say that he will continue to pursue his election campaign policy "that the PLO is a terrorist organization," thus repeating the words of Meir, Rabin and Begin and all the clique plotting against Palestine's Arabism and the Arab nation's future. Reagan's statement yesterday reveals the intentions of his administration. If he doesn't recognize the PLO because "it wasn't elected by anybody," he is impudently rejecting the Arab summit resolutions which recognize it as the sole and legitimate representative of the Palestinian people. He is also rejecting the resolutions of the Islamic Conference Organization, the nonaligned group and the European countries which recognized its full rights diplomatically. Reagan also affirmed his disrespect for the United Nations, its affiliated organizations, and all humanitarian unofficial international organizations which recognized the PLO as the sole and legitimate representative of the Palestinian people in their homeland and abroad. If there is any explanation for this stand, it is simply that Reagan is telling all Arabs that he is "with Israel all the way."

Therefore, there must be a wise and responsible Arab stand toward the United States and its allies after Reagan's victory. It is a stand required politically. It is required principally from the Arab conferees who met in Baghdad and Tunisia and agreed on the "minimum decisions" in order to arise against the open challenge which Reagan declared yesterday, not only to face decisively the U.S. hostility declared by Regan, but also to take the historic opportunity which the current situation offers them so as to take the offensive against all their enemies, whatever their nationalities and identities.

The Amman summit which will be held shortly will face a knotty problem. It must decide whether to accept Reagan's words on the "terrorism" of the PLO or respond to the historic challenge and begin the required national strategy on the road to the total liberation of Palestine.

CIRCUMSTANCES OF NEW GOVERNMENT DESCRIBED

London AL-HAWADITH in Arabic 24 Oct 80 p 27

/Article by Sulayman al-Farzali: "The New Government in San'a': The People of the South Bet on Nasir While Those in the North Bet on the Sea!"/

/Text/ The people of Yemen have skills in the arts of politics, war, poetry and wit which are not to be ignored. Even the silence which Arabs have found fault among the Yemens for, comparing every silent person to "a delegate from the Yemen," conceals an ambivalence which is to be considered a skill in Yemen. It has been said that the most skilled of Yemenis in the modern era is al-Qadi 'Abd-al-Rahman al-Iryani, the former president, who entered into every conspiracy which royal Yemen, then republican Yemen, witnessed, reaching the execution square, indeed the execution mat, more than once only to come out safe and innocent. Perhaps the most skilful thing al-Iryani did in his long political life was to prefer safety, when he was sitting on the throne of the Hamid-al-Din family as president, and retire of his own accord. It was not odd that two of his successors, al-Hamdi and al-Ghashmi, in succession, met their death through a certain skill in conspiracy and killing.

No one knows exactly why governments in Yemen change. Governments generally change in order that conditions may change, except in Yemen, where conditions have no relationship to governments. Anyone reading Republican Decrees No 7 and No 8 issued this 15 October, appointing al-Qadi 'Abd-al-Rahman al-'Arashi and Mr 'Abd-al-Ghani Salih vice presidents and Dr 'Abd-al-Karim 'Ali al-Iryani the new prime minister, will realize how numerous and complex the laws and permanent and temporary constitutional proclamations issued in Yemen in the recent period are. The legal and constitutional preface to the decree is 10 lines and the decree itself is 10 words!

The Yemenis are wise to show disdain for the large number of laws in a country which has gone through many centuries in one. They say that the more the corruption of the government increases, the more the laws proliferate!

Some Yemenis attribute the latest change in government to the long life of the previous government which was headed by 'Abd-al-'Aziz 'Abd-al-Ghani. They say that 'Abd-al-Ghani's government spent 6 whole years "in power," from 1974 to 1980, the longest period any government has lasted in any Arab country, or even in any foreign country, which is the biggest proof of the stability Yemen is experiencing. However, others see proof of the contrary in that and say that the killing of two presidents in that period proves, in addition to instability, that a proliferation of years in power is the same as a paucity of them. Government in Yemen serves; it does not govern. Therefore also the proliferation of ministers is the same as a paucity of them. Although the new government contains more than 20 ministers in the form of respected professors and doctors, its strong man number three, and the three are military men. Heading the three strong men is Lt Col Mujahid Abu Shawarib, the deputy premier for internal affairs; then there are Lt Col 'Ali 'Atarab, the minister of the interior ('athrab in Yemen is a kind of herb), who has assumed this position in the place of Lt Col Muhammad Khamis--nicknamed in San'a' "the man who knows a lot," in view of the fact that he is in charge of national security, that is, intelligence--who has been given the Ministry of Local Administration. There is no doubt that this is the most important change in the Yemeni government. Some people consider it a demotion in rank for Muhammad Khamis; indeed, it is being whispered about in San'a' that this is preparation for isolating him and charging him with responsibility for previous events!

One joke the Yemenis tell of their new government is the statement--based on the names, not the personalities, of ministers--"the right name in the right place." Among the names bandied about in these jokes is that of 'Abdallah al-Kirshi, minister of public works, 'Ali al-Thaur, minister of foreign affairs, 'Ali al-Samman, minister of religious endowments, Muhammad al-Shalahti, minister of economy, Dr Muhammad Ahmad al-Kibab, minister of health, Fu'ad al-Aghbari, minister of development, and Ahmad al-Shajin, minister of state for People's Assembly affairs, whose name, among the Yemenis, has become "the al-Shajun /anxiety/ Assembly."

The al-Wazir family also has a finger in every pie in Yemen; Isma'il al-Wazir has become minister and has changed his portfolio. He was minister of justice in the preceding government and is now minister of civil service and administrative reform. The Ministry of Justice has fallen into the hands of a military man, Lt Col Muhsin al-'Alafi.

A Yemeni who was closely affiliated with the three professors at the beginning of the republican era (the three professors are al-Qadi al-Iryani, al-Nu'man Senior and al-Zubayri, who was killed in an ambush set for him as he was going about on a donkey proselytizing for the Party of God) states:

The conditions of Yemenis is better than the conditions of Yemen. While Yemenis complain of poverty, it is not because they are poor, but because "grousing is the key to a livelihood." They spend more storing up qat than the English spend drinking beer. Much aid is coming from the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia in direct form, and the Yemenis working in Saudi Arabia and the Gulf transfer hundreds of millions of dollars a month to Yemen. Even Saudi officials became fed up with the Yemeni demands one day and said "Our oil gushes forth in Saudi Arabia but flows into Yemen!"

The Yemenis also claim that their country is swimming on a sea of oil but that there is a conspiracy on the part of the companies, foreign countries and some Arab oil states deliberately to neglect exploration activities in Yemen for political purposes, in order to keep Yemen weak. When the Yemenis tell you about their alleged oil, they outwit the most proficient geologists. Therefore they are now optimistic over the appointment of Prof 'Ali al-Bahr as minister of state and chairman of the Oil Organization, on grounds that the sea ("bahr") of oil will become an actual fact!

It is a strange coincidence that no change takes place in San'a' without a similar thing happening in Aden. As soon as a new government was formed in North Yemen, the president of South Yemen, 'Ali Nasir Muhammad, announced a change in his government, as if there was a single motive force for events in the two countries, and this was proved categorically the day the two presidents of the two countries were killed on one day, perhaps in one conspiracy!

In North Yemen, al-Hamdi went, then al-Ghashmi went, before affairs were assigned to 'Ali 'Abdallah Salih, and in South Yemen Salim Rubay' 'Ali then 'Abd-al-Fattah Isma'il went before affairs were assigned to 'Ali Nasir Muhammad. The two Yemens fight with one another and talk about unity with the same enthusiasm. No two Yemenis /meet/ without talking about unity. In our meeting with 'Abd-al-'Aziz 'Abd-al-Ghani, the former prime minister of Yemen, at the same time last year, when he was on an official visit to Britain and the British authorities detained his private airplane, we asked him "Isn't there a middle solution in Yemen between war and unity, either war or unity?" In his opinion, that would not change the essence of the matter. Perhaps he meant that that would not change anything in the nature of the game.

The game in Yemen is complex. It has been said that al-Ghashmi was killed by the explosion of a bomb in a valise carried by an emissary of the Aden president. When unity talks were going on in San'a' last summer, it was said that members of the northern opposition in the southern delegation were killed under obscure circumstances. The opposition National Democratic Front, which is in exile in Aden, said that Dr 'Abd-al-Salam al-Damini and his two brothers were killed last 28 August under obscure circumstances. Thus union coexists with war and nothing is changed in the essence of things!

However, San'a', contrary to Aden, does not feel Arab isolation. In addition to the Saudi aid, North Yemen receives generous aid from Iraq, which has given favored status to the Yemeni Ba'th Party which the latter does not enjoy in the south, as it has become like a governing party in San'a', causing the left-wing opposition parties to take a negative stand toward it. Good relations between San'a' and Baghdad appeared at their most intense when the war broke out between Iraq and Iran. 'Ali Salih was one of Iraq's most intense enthusiasts, after King Husayn. It is said that Iraqi warplanes used Yemeni airfields after being moved from Saudi airfields.

The Yemenis, northern and southern, know that the game goes on and that change is not a means for stability but is the fuel for a new struggle. When Muhammad Salih Muti' was removed in Aden, the leader of the Aden opposition, "Abd-al-Qawwi Makkawi, who directs his attack against the South Yemeni regime from Cairo and Baghdad, said "The removal of Muhammad Salih Muti' can remain only an unanswered question. Every domestic political or party crisis has a repercussion. All wings will continue to fight among themselves as long as there is a struggle for power and partners continue to seek their share of the profits and spoils!"

al-Makkawi left the line open to 'Ali Nasir, on whom Arab countries like Saudi Arabia, Iraq and Egypt are also gambling. In this regard, "Abd-al-Qawwi Makkawi says, "However, what we are demanding is the boldness on "ali Nasir's part to declare the abandonment of Communism, declare the dissolution of the Communist Party, and abandon his connection to foreign subservience--on condition that all these policies be not tactical or temporary."

The North Yemenis do not rule out that this gamble on President 'Ali Nasir will bear fruit, but they prefer to bet on 'Ali al-Bahr!

PLO 'GOVERNMENT' IN LEBANON DESCRIBED BY ISRAELI PAPER

Tel Aviv BAMAHANEH in Hebrew 3 Sep 80 pp 16, 17

[Article by Hayim Raviv: "Lebanon or Palestine?"]

[Text] It is unknown to the general public. No one declared its establishment, however in a part of Lebanese territory it takes on a form--"a state within a state" under PLO adiministration, which considers Lebanon its most important and perhaps its last stronghold.

There are many signs of its state-like nature. The PLO has the most powerful military force in Lebanon if one does not take the Syrian force into account. (The PLO military force today consists of about 15-20,000 men). This PLO power was one of the factors which led to the disintegration of the administration in this country. There are two background factors in the creation of this military enclave in Lebanon: the ejection of the terrorists from Jordan in 1970 and the military confronatation between the terrorists and the Syrians during the civil war in this country. The Palestinian military force in Lebanon, which is completely subordinate to the PLO (with the Fatah as the dominant factor), is designed to serve three basic purposes:

* To preserve the PLO's maneuverability within the framework of the struggle between the internal forces in Lebanon and to protect the Palestinian population there;

"To build and consolidate military structures which will constitute the nucleus of the national army of the expected Palestinian state;

*To serve the effort of attacking Israel.

Besides the army, the PLO also has its own territory in Lebanon, which extends southward from the outskirts of Beirut to the Litani. In this region, the terrorists are virtually the only military force, especially since the Syrians evacuated their forces early in the year from the Tyre-Sidon region. One of the characteristics of this "state" is its control of movement to and from it by means of the terrorist roadblocks on its borders.

"The Government"--The PLO Executive Committee

In Lebanon the PLO maintains a complete system of "governmental" institutions--political, military, economic, social, and propaganda. The Palestinian government, in the form of the PLO Executive Committee, is located in Lebanon. As of now it consists of 14 members, and it meets about once a week, for the most part in Beirut, under the chairmanship of the PLO leader, Yasir Arafat. This forum generally discusses current, political, and security matters, and its decisions are dictated by the Fatah, the main group in the PLO.

Alongside the Executive Committee, which is a political forum, is a military body in the form of the Supreme Military Council. It is a kind of integration of the ministerial committee for security affairs and the general staff. This institution handles specific military matters, and it convenes especially against the background of events and internal tensions occurring in the Lebanese area. Its decisions are operative, and it is also headed by Yasir Arafat.

The legislative authority is the "National Council," which was to meet once a year but actually convenes once every 2 years. The last session of the Council, like the previous sessions, was to have been convened in Beirut, however for security reasons it was decided not to do so. The Council consists of 301 members dispersed throughout the Arab world, and its decisions are adopted by a majority, understandably held by the Fatah.

The PLO also has a "judicial authority" in Lebanon, which consists of a general prosecutor, military and civil revolutionary courts, and prisons. This authority's jurisdiction is limited to criminal and disciplinary matters. Its establishment in 1973 came about against the background of an increase in irregularities and crimes within the PLO establishment, and its function is based on laws established by its leadership and approved in 1979, such as the criminal jurisdiction law and the revolutionary penal law.

The revolutionary penal law encompasses all Palestinians whatever they are--activists and non-activists in the PLO structure--and also those who are non-Palestinians but who have committed by its definition a crime against the PLO. The law encompasses all crimes committed where there is a PLO presence and everyone who commits crimes outside the jurisdiction of the "Palestinian Movement." In such a case the guilty party is punished in accordance with the PLO jurisdiction law even though he is punished in accordance with the law of the country in which the crime took place.

The PLO bureaus and offices which support and operate the extensive diplomatic and propaganda apparatus of this organization throughout the world are located in Lebanon.

Alongside the political system, a system of PLO economic and welfare institutions is also being established in Lebanon. The most prominent enterprise in this area is "Samad," which is considered by some to be the nucleus of a future "Palestinian Federation of Labor," and some describe it as a concern. Samad provides employment for 3,000 Palestinians in Lebanon. As an economic enterprise, it represents a not insignificant source of income for the PLO.

According to a Palestinian source, the workers are represented at all echelons of the institution by means of revolutionary committees, and they also share in the management and profits and enjoy optimal social conditions. Samad combines within it 35 enterprises--for food and clothing commodities, textiles and plastics, furniture, toys, handicraft workshops, and so forth. It also has a section for military production which is responsible for "defense" production enterprises which employ many Palestinian engineers. This refers to workshops for artificial limbs which provide limbs and aids for PLO wounded, workshops for the manufacture of communications equipment, workshops for vehicle maintenance, enterprises for the production of television stands and parts, a publishing house, and so forth. Samad also has a section for agricultural affairs, which operates agricultural projects in African countries--Somalia, Sudan, and Uganda. More than 160 Palestinian engineers and technicians supervise 1,800 African workers in this framework. At this stage, this refers to six joint agricultural projects for the raising of poultry and livestock and for agricultural produce.

Samad, which was established about 10 years ago, also has its own publication and a department for motion pictures and information which produces documentary and feature films. In recent years Samad has had financial difficulties, suspensions of production for security reasons, and professional manpower problems. Because of these difficulties, it was forced to close some of its enterprises. Samad, which was first established as a charity association for PLO wounded, is now endeavoring to develop extensive commercial relations with a number of countries, especially with Arab countries and those in the Eastern Bloc from which it imports equipment and raw materials. Its enterprises have succeeded in introducing products into the markets of the Arab countries where they are duty-free. Until now Samad has participated as the PLO representative in 36 international exhibitions where publications on the Palestinian people's dress customs, history, and attachment to Palestine have been distributed.

There is no doubt that social and economic considerations lie at the basis for the establishment of this institution, however one must not ignore the political implications: the desire to establish an economic system which will become a nucleus for a future Palestinian state or as described in a PLO publication, "to establish a Palestinian revolutionary nucleus which will implement the economic independence of the Palestinian revolution on the territory of the liberated Palestinian homeland."

In this connection, it is known that an economic delegation from India will come to Lebanon in order to assist the PLO in building a Palestinian industrial foundation in this country.

The PLO also has its own "Kupat Holim" [Workers Sick Fund] in Lebanon, although it is limited to the families of terrorists who are serving in the PLO ranks--combatants, wounded, and captured. The Fund, which is based on PLO membership dues and voluntary participation, provides complete health services to all the eligible families, from examinations to hospitalization and surgery.

The main hospitals of the Palestinian Kupat Helim [Workers Sick Fund] in Lebanon are under the management of the Palestinian Red Crescent Association, and they are concentrated primarily in Beirut. Other medical centers of the Fund are in Sidon, Tyre, Nabatiyah, Al Biqa', Tripoli, Baalbek, etc.

Information in the Spirit of the Palestinian Covenant

The Fund membership is 2o to 30,000, and there is now an internal dispute within the PLO over the expansion of the membership and adding all the PLO people, and not only the activists, to the Fund. The PLO health services include, of course, also the Palestinian Red Crescent Association, which was founded a short time after the Six-Day War. This association maintains branches in virtually all of the Arab countries, and it has extensive medical services and broad ties with various humanitarian organizations thorughout the world.

Another body which belongs to the Palestinian establishment in Lebanon is the Institution for Social Affairs, which works primarily in providing welfare services to the families of the terrorists in the various factions in the areas of finances, education, and health. Families who breadwinners have been killed or wounded as a result of terrorist actions receive a permanent monthly allocation. According to a Palestinian source, eligible families who live in Palestine, read: Israel, also receive their allocation in a special way.

The institution provides education to the children of terrorists who have been killed or captured, from kindergarten to higher education. In Lebanon the institution has established 11 kindergartens which contain about 1,200 children, On the primary and intermediate educational levels, the institution provides assistance to students in countries where there are no free schools for the families of the casualties. The institution also provides grants for higher education for the children of those killed and captured, and in certain instances, the institution also pays the tuition of ordinary Palestinian students. The institution also provides free vocational training for the Palestinian youth by giving preferential treatment to the children of casualties and the captured. It conducts courses designed to eliminate illiteracy in the camps, and it distributed propaganda materials in the various Palestinian population centers. Another group which benefits from the institution are the retirees, those with a terrorist past. The institution also established a special cemetery for Palestinians.

The PLO leadership devotes special attention to the youth. Eleven years ago branches for youth and sports affairs, with their center in Beirut, were established in several Arab countries. In 1974 the Youth and Sports Federation, the purpose of which was to prepare a generation of young leaders, to foster a spirit of loyalty and sacrifice for the Palestinian movement, and to implant among the youth the historical and geographical attachment to Palestine, was established in Lebanon. The association maintains close ties with similar bodies in the Arab world and is now working for acceptance as a member of the International Youth and Sports Federation. Full membership is granted to those who satisfy certain criteria, however even those who are not Palestinian are permitted to join the sports clubs.

The PLO in Lebanon also has institutions for research, the press, and the radio. The Institute for Palestinian Studies is involved in theoretical studies on Israel and Palestine and distributes various propaganda publications throughout the world. There is a flourishing Palestinian press in Lebanon. The PLO itself has two main publications: FALASTIN AL-THAWRA (Revolutionary Palestine) and SHU'UN FALASTINIYA (Palestinian Affairs). The PLO's main radio station is in Lebanon and is called Voice of the Palestinian Revolution. It broadcasts 5 hours a day, and its broadcasts are directed at all the Palestinians in the region. Its "information" policies are based on the Palestinian Covenant, and its broadcasts include programs aimed at the youth who were born outside the Land of Israel: conversations with terrorists, lessons in the history of Palestine, acquaintanceship with the Arabs of the Land of Israel and the Palestinian homeland, and conversations with writers and poets on practical cultural subjects.

PLO OFFICIAL CRITICIZES JORDANIAN ATTITUDE

Kuwait AL-SIYASAH in Arabic 17 Sep 80 p 15

[Article: "Abu-Iyad: 'Our Relations with Jordan Require Immediate Review'"]

[Text] Yesterday a prominent Palestinian official in Beirut warned that "continuation of the relation between the Palestinian resistance and the Jordanian regime without precepts will lead to a catastrophe."

In an interview with the newspaper AL-SAFIR published yesterday, member of the Central Committee of the Fatah fedayeen movement Salah Khilf, "Abu-Iyad," admitted that relations between the Palestinian resistance and "the Jordanian regime in the present form will cause us various difficulties."

He added, "At a time when Palestinian officials are going to Jordan and sitting down with Jordanian officials during negotiations, Jordanian Intelligence is launching campaigns of police raids and arrests against the sons of our Palestinian and Jordanian people." Abu-Iyad said that this matter requires immediate review.

In his interview, Abu-Iyad talked about the European initiative with regard to the Middle East. He said, "Some Arabs don't want to use oil. Therefore, they resort to confirming the soundness of the European initiative in order to cover up their own positions. The truth is that the European initiative is part of American policy."

On the other hand, the Palestinian official asserted that the Palestinian resistance had "documents" proving the participation of the Lebanese Phalangist Party in an explosion which occurred in Bologne, Italy last month killing many people.

He said, "Terrorists from a number of West European fascist parties are being trained in training camps run by the Phalangist Party." He added, "Elements of these fascist parties are training to undertake demolition operations in West Europe."

French authorities have arrested a member of an Italian right-wing party on the charge of being connected with the Bologne explosion.

Abu-Iyad warned against the growing deterioration of the Arab position. He said, "If we, the Palestinian resistance and Syria, don't stand up and join together to meet the challenges, the Arab position will further deteriorate and retreat."

As for the attitude of the Palestinian resistance toward the recently proclaimed union of Syria and Libya, he said, "The resistance must take its place in this union, and it will certainly be at its heart."

FORMATION OF MAGHREBIAN LEAGUE FOR PEACE, SOLIDARITY

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 25 Oct 80 p 6

[Article: "A League for Solidarity and Peace in the Maghreb"]

[Text] The League for Solidarity and Peace in the Maghreb will be created as soon as its founders have completed the legal formalities required.

The idea of such an association, in response to the necessity for a revival of a common action for cooperation and rapprochement of the Maghrebian people, sprung in the minds of a number of Tunisian intellectuals following the Ninth Maghrebian Medical Congress which, for the first time in several years, had gathered Algerian, Moroccan and Tunisian physicians in Rabat.

Thus, at a meeting attended by Tunisian university professors and writers, journalists and lawyers, and officials of various social and economic organizations, last 28 May in Tunis, it had been decided to provide--not impromptu but as a carefully thought-out action--the conditions necessary to translate Maghrebian solidarity into concrete facts, every day, an idea which has long been dear to the Maghrebians but which changing circumstances have sometimes put sorely to the test.

Thus, and in memory of the relations which have been forged between so many Maghrebians for so long during the struggle for national independence, and as an homage to all the martyrs who have died for the cause of a unified and solidary Maghreb, the Tunisian founding members of the League for Solidarity and Peace in the Maghreb have felt it their duty to use all means available to revive and strengthen the spirit of inter-Maghrebian cooperation, regardless of all borders and ulterior motives, and on the basis of reciprocal equality and solidarity.

In addition, in the troubled times which the Arab nation is now experiencing, they consider that, now more than ever, there should be no question of insulting the future.

Thus the necessity for a permanent and ever renewed call to reason and to the union of minds and hearts, in a climate of peace and concord which is made imperative for more than one reason precisely by the sore test to which our Maghreb is put today.

On the basis of these principles, and in the light of experience, it thus became apparent that only a patient and unrelenting action, continued untiringly day after day, and going beyond the effects of prevailing circumstances, could bring us closer to these objectives which so imperatively condition our common fate.

It is, therefore, in this spirit that the by-laws of the League for Solidarity and Peace in the Maghreb have been prepared, and that its founding members have committed themselves to work. Their goal is to carry on any action which would promote peace and concord, and to encourage all good wills working in that direction, without any exclusion. At the same time, they intend to contribute to the preservation and strenghtening of inter-Maghrebian relations, by giving them the most privileged status, especially in the social, cultural and economic domains, so as to fulfill the deep-seated aspirations of our respective people.

In this case, the visits recently paid to Algeria and Morocco by high Tunisian officials with Mr Mohamed Mzali, prime minister, at their head, have probably warmed the heart of all Maghrebians. Through the concrete decisions which were made at the highest level, they have contributed to stress in the most outstanding manner the existing desire for understanding and rapprochement which each Maghrebian harbors at the bottom of his heart.

To help further concretize this desire, the call to mutual assistance and concord which we, in our turn, are now making must:

1) make use of all information and communication media, such as press articles, publications, periodicals, symposia and meetings;

2) further mutual relations, especially between the youth and cadres at all levels; this can be achieved by promoting the circulation of persons and the exchange of experiences, especially in the scientific, technical, economic, social and cultural fields;

3) finally, in our mutual interest, help promote cooperation between various agencies, organizations and institutions in the three countries.

With a view to helping in the progressive realization of these objectives, the founding members of the League for Solidarity and Peace in the Maghreb have also agreed to work toward the creation of similar associations in other Maghreb countries and, later on, to gather all these "regional" associations into a single Maghrebian federation; in the meanwhile, the Tunisian league would like to have correspondents in the three brother countries.

To this end, the founding members have formed a provisional enlarged board of directors with, as chairman, Mr Hamed Zeghal, former secretary of state to the minister of National Education and general manager of the Tunisian Agency for Technical Cooperation.

A wide range of people are represented on the board: it includes university professors, Drs Sleim Ammar, Abdelwahab Bouhdida and Mohamed Fantar, officials of large social impact organizations, Mrs Dordana Masmoudi and Mrs Souad Chater, Mr Ahmed Amara, a union official, member of the National Union Commission, Mrs Aziza Quahchi, president of the council of the order of pharmacists, writers representing the Tunisian writers' union, Messrs Mustapha Fersi, Abdelaziz Kacem, Ahmed Kedidi and Noureddine Samoud, heads of enterprises and representatives of economic and financial agencies, Messrs Habib Ghemim, Mokhtar Fakhfakh, Ali Boukkris and Mustapha Driss, lawyers, including Mr Rachid Sabagh, president at the Court of Appeals, and Lazhar El Karoui Chabbi, president of the order of barristers, physicians, including Dr Hamouda Ben Slama, assistant general secretary of the Union of Arab Physicians, Dr Hedi Mhenni, professor of pediatrics and medical journalist, Dr Rifaat Daly, demographer and an eager pioneer of family planning, and finally, representing the important press and information sector, Messrs Abdelwahab Abdallah, Abdeljelil Damak, Ridha Najar and Fethi Houidi.

The provisional board of directors of the League for Solidarity and Peace in the Maghreb, placing itself above all special interests, calls for all those who believe in the higher interest of an independent and solidary Maghreb to support the league in achieving its noble goals.

The league is expecting adhesions, letters of support and any other concrete forms of solidarity at its provisional headquarters in Tunis, at the House of Culture Ibn Khaldoun.

By that, it intends to underline how much the name of the great Maghrebian who Ibn Khaldoun was, engraved on the frontispiece of its headquarters, can symbolize the unity and perreniality of the Maghreb through the greatness and vicissitudes of its history.

GUIGA'S TALKS WITH SAUDIS ON COOPERATION RELATED

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 29 Oct 80 p 4

[Excerpts] President Habib Bourguiba, yesterday at 1810 at the Palace of Carthage, received Driss Guiga, a member of the Political Bureau and minister of the Interior. Mr Guiga stated after the interview that after his return from the Holy Places he had met with the Supreme Combatant, to whom he gave a report of the mission the chief of state had entrusted to him, as head of the delegation of Tunisian pilgrims.

Mr Guiga said, "I am eager to express my strong thanks to the Saudi authorities, who wrapped the pilgrims in great solicitude, despite the difficulties engendered by the gathering together of 2,000,000 Muslims during a very short period and in a place no larger than 20 km."

Concerning Saudi support for the development in Tunisia, the minister said:

"I had an opportunity to meet with King Khaled Ibn Abdelaziz of Saudi Arabia on two occasions: the first was when I presented to him wishes and greetings from the Tunisian president, government and people to the Saudi king, government and people.

"The second meeting with the Saudi sovereign concerned the relations between Tunisia and Saudi Arabia, especially in foreign policy following the statements made by an Arab chief of state, which troubled minds in Saudi Arabia, on the subject of the pilgrimage.

"In connection with bilateral relations, we mentioned section on cooperation for development, all the more so because the Saudi leaders have for a long time strongly supported Tunisia's development effort.

"That effort, thanks to Saudi aid, has been able to realize several projects. Saudi Arabia, with the agreement of the Tunisian Government and its concerned organs, especially the Planning and Finance Ministry, is currently engaged in drawing up other projects to be realized in the context of bilateral cooperation. I believe the symposium currently being held in Tunis under the chairmanship of Mansour Moalla, the minister of Planning and Finance, with the participation of business men, investors and representatives of Arab financial institutions--Saudi institutions in particular--will end with positive results for promoting Arab investment in the Arab world and and the future of relations between the Arab countries in general and between Tunisia and Saudi Arabia in particular.

BOURGUIBA'S COMMENTS ON ARAB INVESTMENT SYMPOSIUM REPORTED

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 30 Oct 80 pp 1, 5

[Text] Yesterday morning in the White Salon of the Palace of Carthage President Bourguiba received the participants in the symposium on Arab investment in the Arab world, which was organized in Tunis.

The audience was attended by Mansour Moalla, the minister of Planning and Finance, Abdelaziz Lasram, minister of the National Economy, and Lassaad Ben Osman, minister of Agriculture, as well as several ambassadors from Tunisia accredited in the Arab countries represented in the symposium.

At the beginning of the interview the chief of state shook his guests' hands one by one, wishing them every success in their work and a pleasant stay in Tunisia.

Addressing the participants next, the president of the Republic said, "I have followed with interest the work of the symposium on Arab investment, in which Mohamed Mzali in the opening session defined Tunisia's development needs."

The chief of state also expressed his pleasure at the seriousness that characterized the work of the symposium, and also the sincere desire to participate in the realization of development projects in Tunisia, pointing out that this margin of confidence is due to our country's stability, to its good intentions and also to its respect for pledges to pay its debts within the specified time. This has enhanced Tunisia's prestige and enabled it to enjoy a good image in the Arab world.

After emphasizing the disposition France has shown to form a Tunisian-Arab-French bank, the president of the Republic indicated that Tunisia desires to cooperate with the countries that are its brothers and friends in order to make its development objectives concrete, all the more so because it has no important oil wealth.

The chief of state indicated along that line that Tunisia is continuing to prospect its subsoil, emphasizing the promising horizons in gas production. He also brought up the good relations tying Tunisia to Algeria, recalling the common project to install the Algerian-Tunisian-Italian gas pipeline.

On the other hand, the Supreme Combatant underlined the measures taken by the government to rehabilitate the social climate by forming a national labor union commission chaired by the son of the martyred Leader Farhat Hached, and charged with preparing for the next congress of the Tunisian General Labor Union and the election of a directorate representing the workers.

"Tunisia, because of its characteristics, is the best guarantee of the success of the projects it envisages realizing in cooperation with you," added President Bourguiba. "My choice of Mohamed Mzali, that great man, for prime minister will contribute to strengthening that cooperation. I am optimistic about the success of the new plan, which I have entrusted to Mansour Moalla, one of the men best known because of their experience."

The chief of state also recommended activating the realization of the projects decided upon, especially those that concern the tourist sector. He also brought up the question of agricultural cooperation, particularly in the fishing and livestock raising sectors.

In conclusion President Bourguiba told of his conviction that Tunisia is still on the right path and that it will realize the objectives of dignity and progress to which it aspires.

During this interview Mansour Moalla informed the chief of state of the results of the symposium on Arab investment, and of the success that crowned the work, thanks to the participation of representatives of five funds and large investment companies in the Arab world.

Dr Abdellatif Al Hamed, general director of the Kuwaiti Development Fund, gave a speech before the chief of state in which he expressed on behalf of the participants in the symposium his thanks and gratitude to Tunisia for having hosted this Arab meeting and stimulated Arab cooperation, not only between the Arab chiefs of state and their governments, but also between the business men and the Arab peoples.

"Tunisia has particularities such as stability, wise leadership and good management, which can assure the inter-Arab cooperation the effectiveness expected of it," he concluded.

FORMATION OF NEW TUNISIAN-KUWAITI BANK PREVIEWED

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 30 Oct 80 p 6

[Article by Yahia Barouni: "The Forming of a Tunisian-Kuwaiti Bank With 100,000,000 Dinars in Capital"]

> [Text] The Symposium on Arab Investment in the Arab World ended yesterday morning after three days of candid and lively discussion. The closing session was marked by the signing of the agreement establishing the Tunisian-Kuwaiti Investment Bank, capital for which is 100,000,000 Tunisian dinars. The convention was signed on the Tunisian side by Mansour Moalla, the minister of Planning and Finance, and on the Kuwaiti side by Meiren Al Ahmad, ambassador from Kuwait in Tunis. Abdelaziz Lasram, the minister of the National Economy, and the participants in the symposium witnessed the signing ceremony.

In a speech for the occasion Mansour Moalla called this financial institution unique of its kind because of the volume of its capital and its future impact on Tunisia's socio-economic development.

Mansour Moalla pointed out next the speed with which Tunisia and Kuwait arrived at drawing up the convention, which, he announced, was decided upon by common agreement in the space of one hour.

In that same connection Mansour Moalla paid homage to his Kuwaiti counterpart, Abderrahman Al-Atiki, and to Badr Abdallah Rachid, the under secretary for investment and foreign economic affairs in the Kuwaiti Finance Ministry, for their meritorious efforts to translate the formation of this financial institution into a reality.

Mansour Moalla also paid ringing homage to Majren Ahmed Al-Hamad, who, he said, was the principal architect of the founding of the bank.

Mansour Moalla expressed the hope that the bank will be the link in a chain of jointly-owned Tunisian-Arab banks.

For his part, the ambassador from Kuwait, who signed the convention on behalf of the Kuwaiti Finance Ministry, wished the institution every success, expressing the hope that the Tunisian-Kuwaiti cooperation will constitute a model to be followed by the Arab countries.

Badr Abdallah Rachid expressed pleasure in his turn over the signing of the convention, which in itself, he noted, is "a beginning and not an end."

On the day before, a working session brought together the representatives of the Arab Development Fund and several Tunisian leaders. Abdelaziz Lasram, the minister of the National Economy, Lassaad Ben Osman, minister of Agriculture, and Brahim Khouja, secretary of state for the Transportation and Communications Ministry, in charge of PTT [Postal, Telephone and Telegraph], attended the session, in the course of which the participants listened to reports on the principal projects that Tunisia expects to realize under the sixth plan, in the financing of which Arab investors may participate.

Bureaucracy, a Curb on Investment

Arab deposits in Western countries could and should be partly oriented to the Arab world, but difficulties still exist, some participants stated. Bureaucracy and administrative sluggishness are problems afflicting a great many Arab countries. This symposium, therefore, should result in conclusions that would make it possible to surmount them. The speakers also emphasized the need to increase the contacts between Arab investors, so they can exchange experiences in this area. Tax legislation, import-export procedures, the capability of local contractors and other difficulties connected with simply tracing foreign legislation that is ill-adapted to the realities of the Arab world are so many problems to be solved.

To attract Arab capital deposited abroad, it is necessary above all to create a climate of confidence that can make investors feel secure and assure them a minimum of guarantee and gain, other participants in the conference said.

Speaking as part of the discussion, Mansour Moalla indicated that from 1974 to 1980 he has been in charge of financial institutions and for that reason has been able to see first-hand the negative repercussions of bureaucracy on development. "This is why," he said, "considering the importance of the planned projects, we will work together to relax the administrative formalities for the benefit of a better structuring of the Arab economies."

More Interest in Agriculture

This development action, which the mobilization of Arab investments is to be aimed at, other participants added, must be total and not limited to any particular sector. Agriculture deserves interest, because on it depends the solution to the rural exodus and the fulfillment of our nutritional needs. These investments, then, must have positive repercussions, on the economic as well as the social sector.

Investments Outside the Arab World: Similar Risks

With regard to Arab investment in the West, the participants who approached this theme stated that the risks are almost the same as those incurred in the Arab countries. In fact they include the same risks of losses (for example, the problem of deteriorating terms of exchange). Also, in the same way, nationalization and taxation risks exist in Europe and America, and all of this means, therefore, that stability can only be relative.

Upon the conclusion of the work of the symposium Mansour Moalla took the floor to summarize this meeting's work in 10 points.

Tunisia's new policy in promoting Arab investment is founded on reciprocal interest and gain.

The revision of our policy has resulted in all fields being open to Arab investment and joint Tunisian-Arab investment.

The conclusion to be drawn from this symposium is that it is necessary to put place legislation appropriate to Arab investment. It is likewise necessary to stabilize the Arab manpower in the Arab world.

Tunisia's desire to give priority to Arab capital when resorting to outside financing, this to be done within the framework of a financing plan now under study.

To structure the Tunisian-Arab cooperation by putting in place means of communication and organisms adequate for the continuity of that cooperation.

To prove the effectiveness of the Arab cooperation by the realization of profitable projects.

We express the hope that Tunisia will become a meeting ground for cooperation and an economic base for creating joint projects serving and strengthening Arab cooperation.

KUWAITI REPRESENTATIVE'S COMMENTS ON INVESTMENT SYMPOSIUM GIVEN

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 31 Oct 80 p 2

[Interview with Ahmed Douij, a representative of the Kuwaiti Real Estate Investment Consortium, in Tunis, by Yahia Barouni; date not given]

> [Text] As a spin-off of the symposium on Arab investment being held in Tunis, we met with Ahmed Douij, the representative of the Kuwaiti Real Estate Investment Consortium, who was kind enough to answer our questions on the Consortium's activities in Tunisia.

[Question] What are the Consortium's activities in Tunisia, particularly in the tourism area?

[Answer] The Consortium is currently in the process of developing five important tourism projects in Tunisia. The first is the "Nejma" hotel complex, which has already been built in Sousse. The other units being built are located in Tunis and Sousse. There is the Diar El Andalous, the Abou Nawas Hotel (which will be ready at the end of next July), the Tunisia-Palace (which is to be renovated) and the "Mechtel" Hotel in the Belvedere.

In the tourism field, the Consortium, through its branch, the CTKD [expansion unknown], is financing the various projects up to a limit of 30,000,000 dinars, for a total cost of 45,000,000 dinars.

Regarding the "Tunisia-Palace," the delay in the work is due to purely procedural questions.

[Question] During the symposium you stated that investing Arab capital in Arab countries is very difficult. What are the reasons for this?

[Answer] Actually, penetration of Arab investment into the Arab world is tough and very difficult. The investor has to have an unshakable will and unfailing patience, because he has to spend a very long time in discussions to convince the various parties. This does not mean he has to despair and abandon everything. On the contrary, he must confront these problems to smoothe them out, because there is no alternative solution.

[Question] What problems are hindering Arab investment in Tunisia, such as those you endured as a pioneer investor?

[Answer] Compared to other Arab countries, the difficulties in Tunisia are minimal. But this certainly doesn't mean that it isn't necessary to fight or close your eyes to them. They are almost all administrative because the desire to receive Arab investment really exists.

The difficulties are due in part to the administrative structures inherited from the colonial period.

The Consortium, through the experience it has acquired in Tunisia, has contributed to their solution and to establishing a certain climate of confidence.

[Question] Is the state of Kuwait a shareholder in the Consortium?

[Answer] Actually, the state of Kuwait participates in the Consortium's capital, encourages its activities and supports them. The Consortium is also active in Kuwait, where it has developed several corporations. It currently taps private Kuwaiti capital and others. As for our relations with the Arab Development Funds, they are not direct, but complementary.

[Question] After new fields have been opened up to Arab investment in Tunisia, does the Consortium envisage expanding its activities?

[Answer] We are very happy about that opening up, because we contributed to creating this new situation, which is favorable to encouraging Arab investment in Tunisia. The opening up of the agricultural sector is very important. On that subject it must be stated that investment does not mean appropriation of land, but the exploitation of land in the common interest, because the land has to remain Tunisian.

The Consortium does not plan to be occupied with this area because there are other Kuwaiti organizations that specialize in industry and agriculture. So our role will be one of making people aware, to induce those institutions to come to Tunisia.

The formation of the Tunisian-Kuwaiti Bank will also certainly contribute to the promotion of the industrial and agricultural sectors.

[Question] Doesn't the political climate in the Arab world discourage Arab investment from coming into the Arab countries?

[Answer] We, as a Consortium, are anxious to state that this climate has no effect on our determination to come and invest in the Arab countries. If we have to take this climate into consideration, we can't do anything but close up shop. It must also be stated that this climate isn't much different from that of other, non-Arab countries. The risk of nationalization, for example, is a danger that today has become minimal in the Arab world. In fact the problem is not one of the risks of nationalization, but rather one of administrative sluggishness. It is certain that change of regime does not appreciably change the investment situation, and that has already been true for several years.

Where Tunisia is concerned, we want to intensify the efforts to make this country an example to follow for Arab cooperation. An example of what can be accomplished by Arab capital if the right climate exists.

[Question] Does the Consortium propose to participate in financing Tunisia's next development plan?

[Answer] Actually, we intend to mobilize 10 percent of the capital intended for the tourism field, around 500,000,000 dinars. We hope the 10-percent figure will just be the minimum.

RESULTS OF ARAB INVESTMENT SYMPOSIUM DISCUSSED

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 28 Oct 80 p 5

[Article by Yahia Barouni: "Economic Difficulties To Be Overcome in Strengthening Cooperation"]

[Text] From 27 to 29 October Tunis is hosting an international symposium on "Arab Investment in the Arab Countries."

Mr Mzali, the prime minister, presided yesterday over the opening of the work of this pan-Arab meeting.

There are five fundamental points on the agenda: Arab investment and economic cooperation; unified agreement on Arab investment and its taking place in Arab countries; the current situation and the future of joint Tunisian-Arab projects; and the Arab contribution to Tunisia's development.

During the morning session the participants approached subjects relative to the results of this cooperation in Tunisia, as well as the difficulties standing in the way of its development. In that connection Tunisia is a typical example of the materialization of inter-Arab cooperation; the constant increase in the number of Arab investments participating in development projects is tangible proof. The speakers also reported on their respective experiences and stressed the positive aspects of such cooperation.

Concerning Tunisia's determination to encourage Arab investment, Mr Moalla emphasized that all socio-economic fields are open to all Arab investors, pointing out that the Tunisian government has resolved to strengthen semi-private companies.

At present Arab cooperation in Tunisia is primarily concerned with the tourist sector, which has been the beneficiary of a significant financial contribution (Kuwaiti, Saudian, the Emirates) for building important complexes (El Kantaoui port, Tunis-Nord-Monastir).

In addition to the tourist sector, there is Arab investment in the industrial sector. There is Arab participation in the chemical industries of Gabes and the ICM [Maghreb Chemical Industries].

However, this cooperation is being called upon to be strengthened, despite the economic or structural difficulties hindering its development.

Today we are willing to admit that regional cooperation is a necessity that is beneficial to all parties concerned in it. It can only have positive repercussions on the Arab economy in general and the economy of each Arab country taken individually.

There remains the problem this investment might encounter in the Arab world. Even if all the difficulties cannot be ironed out, participation of Arab funds in the development projects of each country cannot help but be profitable over the short and long terms and cannot help but serve the complementarity and unity of those countries.

As for legislation problems concerned with guaranteeing investment, they do not appear to be insoluble. Legal agreement on Arab investment is already a step in the right direction.

Participation of Arab capital in the development work of each Arab country is of course dependent on the existence of certain conditions, such as basic infrastructure, the country's ability to receive and absorb the capital, the adaptation of financial and economic channels to the transfer of capital and the existence of legislation for regulating and protecting the investments.

The formation of an Arab financial market being the goal, the objective toward which all Arab cooperation is aimed, it goes without saying that the creation of joint inter-Arab companies will contribute and contribute a great deal to strengthening the cooperation, shielding it more from the hazards of politics.

The forming of joint investment companies, common industrial projects, etc., must be done in this context.

Investment does not have to wait, in order to develop, for the radical transformation of the receiving structures, which can only evolve slowly. Likewise, the scarcity of the host countries' markets can be surmounted by creating joint projects having access to the markets of the receiving countries and the investing countries, and by expanding to other Arab countries, and even a third country, with the idea of a triangular cooperation.

MZALI'S SPEECH TO ARAB INVESTMENT SYMPOSIUM REPORTED

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 28 Oct 80 p 5

[Speech by Mohamed Mzali, prime minister, to the Symposium on Arab Investment in the Arab World, at the Hilton Hotel in Tunis, 27 Oct 1980]

[Text] I should like first of all to greet you and welcome you to Tunisia, your second fatherland, which is advancing with steady steps on the path of progress, led by its president, Supreme Combatant Habib Bourguiba, the man who liberated the country from the yoke of colonialism, restored dignity to his fellow citizens and continues to fight with the same vigor, the same determination, against the causes of underdevelopment, such as ignorance and indigence, with a view to winning the wager of civilization and the battle for development.

I should also like to thank you for having been eager, despite your pressing occupations, to participate in this symposium in order to discuss "Arab Investments in the Arab Country," a subject to which we attach a great deal of importance, for we consider the circulation of capital in the Arab countries in the form of investments profitable to all parties as the foundation of any Arab economic action.

The common Arab economic strategy to be discussed at the next summit gives this subject a position of choice, since it recommends putting Arab savings at the service of development in the Arab fatherland.

Honorable guests,

Tunisia, which has with satisfaction welcomed Arab investment by granting it guarantees and privileges, would like on the occasion of this meeting to evaluate its experience in this area by confronting it with other experiences, and to know the opinions and impressions of our brothers on the subject, so we may if necessary reconsider our laws pertaining to investment.

During the last few months we have taken stock of the development we have realized during the decade just ended, which enabled our country to clear important stages in its march toward progress. Encouraging results were recorded, especially in the investment field, in creating jobs, which enabled us to attain an appreciable growth rate.

The organs of the Plan at all levels are at present working out the development strategy for the decade 1982-1991, and for the sixth five-year plan, 1981-1986.

During that period the Tunisian economy will have to face a new big gamble: doubling the investment volume and creating a maximum number of jobs, so we may gradually arrive at controlling the problem.

Our effort in investment matters will be especially oriented toward agriculture and the sector of the processing and tourism industries.

Moreover, during recent years Arab investment, in the tourist and industrial fields, has contributed to the realization of a number of important projects, such as the Sousse-Nord tourist complex, industrial phosphates and chemical products.

We have every reason to hope that Arab investors will support our development effort more effectively during the sixth plan and the next decade. Such an action cannot fail to serve the interest of the Arab nation, to strengthen its economic complementarity, and to promote harmonious development there, supported by the joint efforts of all of us.

To that effect, it is my pleasure to emphasize that Arab investments are timely in the tourist and industrial sectors, for the realization of projects with or without Tunisian participation.

Concerning the agricultural sector, the Tunisian government intends to associate Arab investment with it by means of agricultural contracts or by establishing corporations charged with modernizing and intensifying farming, to respond to the needs of the local market and increase our ability to export to the brother Arab countries. In this way Tunisia intends to contribute to assuring food security in Tunisia and the Arab fatherland.

I am seizing this opportunity to emphasize to you the strategic importance of the agricultural sector in Tunisia and in the Arab world. In Tunisia, a country with great potential in this area--in particular a number of highly-trained technicians and middle managers, agriculture receives various kinds of encouragement. It was in this context that the Supreme Combatant's decisions were taken on raising the prices of certain agricultural products (grains) at the production level--decisions likely to make the farmer feel secure and encourage him to settle on the land. This was obviously an action with very positive political and economic repercussions. For when the citizen is sedentarized on the land of his ancestors and encouraged to create wealth where he is, the charm of the city has no more effect on him, and the problem posed by the rural exodus can only be alleviated. Consequently, sedentarizing the citizen is incontestably a determining factor in safeguarding the country's stability. For in reality, what can threaten companies and overthrow political regimes is overpopulation of the cities and the various problems that demographic phenomenon engenders at all levels.

This is why it is important to work toward achieving demographic equilibrium between regions, by settling the people in their native villages, by providing them with the conditions for a dignified life, which strengthens the foundations of the political regime in place.

The expansion of agriculture is a factor that should not be neglected in any way, because it is an important element in stability; and the Arab world, more than at any other time, needs that stability in order to develop.

On the other hand, a large part of the Arab population lives off agriculture, which young people are loath to devote themselves to; because of this agriculture tends to become the economy's poor relation.

In Tunisia, as an example, the average age of the Tunisian farmers is 55. Thus, it is easy to see how the rural exodus is seriously threatening the future of the agricultural land. This is why it is important to take a firm position vis-a-vis this question. To do so, it is advisable to promote educational methods to make the young people aware of this sector and to develop the rural world, in order to settle the farmers and their sons on the agricultural land.

In addition to the various production sectors, the work of development requires significant investment to put the finishing touches on the economic and social infrastructure, for weakness or absence of infrastructure constitutes the most dangerous obstacle in the path of development, since it reduces the capacity to receive investment.

The brother Arab countries have helped us through the last decade to finance many economic and social infrastructure projects. We hope to continue to benefit from this support, because the Arab development funds are, for Tunisia, the most important contribution, on which it must be able to count in order to build dams, to carry out canalization projects and water supply and electrical energy projects, to construct high schools, colleges, hospitals and roads.

In hydraulics, for example, I inform you that the phreatic layer of the Tunisian south contains significant levels of drinking water which, if we have available the credits necessary for drilling and exploitation, are capable of satisfying the needs of the citizens for drinking water and improving the land of the Tunisian south.

Such a project is easy to accomplish in that it requires, not peak technology but merely investment, to put it into operation.

Possibilities for investment exist in Tunisia, but what is missing are resources for financing and we hope our Arab brothers will furnish us the necessary credits to transform the face of the land for the benefit of men.

There is reason to emphasize, in this connection, that the fact that we are appealing to Arab financial resources to realize our economic projects, including infrastructure, comes from a political option based on the necessity of strengthening the Arab complementarity.

This meeting was organized to proceed with an enriching exchange of ideas on a subject that is vital to the evolution of the Arab nation. I have no doubt whatsoever that this symposium will result in concrete proposals that will enable us to strengthen our ties and further strengthen the cooperation and solidarity between members of the great Arab family, thanks to the virtues that must continue to motivate us: the sincerity of our intentions and our determination to mobilize our material and human resources for the good of our peoples and our young generations who aspire to a better future, one of prosperity and invulnerability.

I should like to point out, in this context and in reply to a question some people might ask about the future for capital invested in Tunisia, that investment, by enabling projects to be launched and creating new jobs, undoubtedly contributes to strengthening the political and social stability of Tunisia.

Unless we work to develop the country's economy and realize projects that generate jobs, unemployment and the disillusionment of the young can be sources of anxiety and disorder. On the other hand, if we invest, if we act together and if we gamble on Tunisia's development, the development of this developing Arab country, we can surmount all of these obstacles, avoid anything likely to [word illegible] to destabilization and discourage all those who seek to bring prejudice to the sovereignty of Tunisia.

Naturally, we must remember, in Tunisia the regime is strong, the Tunisian people is devoted to President Bourguiba. However, it is necessary to work to develop the economy of the country and promote the corporation. To attain this objective we must act--and be--self-confident.

With every new job we create we will be giving birth to a new citizen, integrated into society.

Likewise, every agrocomplex set up can only strengthen our agriculture and our agricultural production, which will naturally reduce our dependence on foreigners and hence strengthen as well our independence, our freedom of decision.

Investment has an economic aspect, a political aspect and a civilizational aspect.

That is why it is incumbent upon us as militants and men of action to assimilate the close tie existing between the economy, policy and civilization, and to set in motion all available means to translate these principles and objectives into deeds.

Once more I welcome you to Tunis and wish you a pleasant stay among us.

PLANS TO FORM TUNISIAN-ARAB BANKS OUTLINED

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 29 Oct 80 pp 1, 5

Article by Yahia Barouni: "Imminent Creation of Several Tunisian-Arab Banks"]

[Text] Certain Gulf countries are ready to welcome part of the Tunisian manpower.

Toward setting up legislation encouraging Arab investment.

The symposium on "Arab Investment in the Arab World" resumed its work yesterday morning at the Hilton Hotel in Tunis. The day before, representatives from Tunisia met in an afternoon working session with representatives of the Arab financial organizations attending the symposium, to acquaint them with the development plan and the Tunisian economic projects that may be financed by public and private Arab capital.

The morning session opened with a report by Mansour Moalla, the minister of Planning and Finance, who gave a brief survey of the next five-year plan and the prospects for financing that it offers Arab investors by virtue of the large number of projects written into it.

The ensuing discussion enabled the speakers to take up a great many themes concerned with investments, their security, the legislation regulating them in the receiving countries; the question of semi-private and multilateral corporations, etc.

The participants discussed the difficulties that get in the way of investment--difficulties connected with legislation and the actual capability of the host country to receive such capital.

During the same session the chairman of the symposium proposed that the discussion take up the following main themes: the financing of the next Tunisian plan; improvement of the climate (especially the economic climate) of the countries requesting capital; the risks attendant upon investing Arab capital outside of Arab countries; defining the time limit for Arab nationality for the investments; the role of the public and private sectors in financing the development of the Arab world.

Tunisia: a Solvent Country

On the subject of financing for the fifth plan, Mansour Moalla indicated that Tunisia, despite the mobilization of all the national energy and in order to best conduct its work of developing foreign aid in particular, still has need of the capital support that the brother Arab countries continues to furnish.

In this context he expressed the hope that the Arab cooperation which until now has represented 22 percent of the foreign aid will be raised to about 50 percent in the next plan.

Mansour Moalla added that Tunisia, a solvent country enjoying a certain credibility with the international financial authorities, envisages as part of the goal of making Arab investment in Tunisia more profitable, setting up joint investment banks, such as the Tunisian-Kuwaiti, Tunisian-Saudi and Tunisian-Emirates investment banks. to be started up in the next few weeks.

Discussing this section, the participants were led to debate the subject of Arab investment in Tunisia.

The representatives of the Tunisian and Arab financial institutions participating in the symposium were unanimous in noting that Tunisia, which so badly needs Arab investment to finance its socio-economic projects, has not in the past given enough encouragement to Arab investors to invest in our country.

On that subject they recalled certain difficulties that certain Arab financial institutions interested in the Tunisian market had previously been exposed to. They pointed out that the legislation drawn up for that purpose is general in nature and deals with foreign investments, with no distinction between them. Hence they recommended that an opportunity be provided to perfect legal texts appropriate to Arab investment in Tunisia and that substantial encouragement to that end be lavishly bestowed.

The participants emphasized the need to transcend the principle of political good will to establish Tunisian-Arab financial cooperation on legal and practical, clear foundations.

Imminent Creation of a Tunisian-Kuwaiti Bank

Speaking as part of the discussion, Mansour Moalla reassured Arab investors of the Tunisian government's determination to perfect, in the coming months, legislation that will take into account the requirements, needs and peculiarities of Arab investments. "Thus," he said, "in order to translate the Tunisian-Kuwaiti Investment Bank plan into actuality, we have arrived at defining a regulation appropriate to and specific for that Arab institution. There is no reason not to do as much with similar institutions."

Priority to Arab Manpower

On the subject of manpower, the speakers brought out the fact that priority will have to be given to Arab manpower in the requesting countries. In that connection the participants in the conference suggested creating, where Tunisia is concerned, a social attache post which would be concerned with this particular question and could put the requesters and the offerers of jobs in contact with each other whenever necessary. In fact, some Gulf countries have proposed to Tunisia that they welcome part of the traditional Tunisian manpower.

On that question Mr Moalla stated that he met with the Social Affairs minister to strengthen the social activity of the Tunisian embassies in the Arab world, to see to what extent the market could resorb the surplus of the Tunisians seeking jobs.

The Coexistence of a National Private Sector is Necessary

Concerning the role of the two sectors, public and private, the speakers declared that the coexistence of the two sectors is necessary. The public sector has to be concerned more with donations and loans, while ease of payment is of interest to the basic infrastructure of the Arab countries (heavy industry, energy).

The national private sector of each receiving country is also a necessity and an encouragement giving a feeling of security to the sought-after private capital. This private sector is not to be motivated solely by gain, for it should also be oriented toward Arab national interest.

Awaiting the Arab Common Market

Realization of an Arab common market proving to be difficult, one of the participants stated, it is profitable and logical to begin with a bilateral or multilateral cooperation, or a sectorial cooperation (protection of a particular product on the scale of several Arab countries), in the interest of the participating parties from the Arab world.

These were the main themes approached yesterday morning. In the afternoon a second meeting was to bring together the representatives of the Arab Development Fund and their Tunisian colleagues.

LIFT TOURISM BARRIERS, ARAB STATES URGED

Abu Dhabi EMIRATES NEWS in English 12 Nov 80 p 3

[Article by Maruf Khwaja]

[Text] Dubai, Nov. 11: It's about time Arab tourists stopped spending billions of dollars on junkets to Europe and America and diverted some of the expenditure to parts of the Arab world where strenuous efforts are being made to develop tourism as a major industry.

But in order for this to come about, it is necessary for Arab governments, individually and collectively, to remove barriers to inter-Arab travel, make greater investments in tourism infrastructures and promote efforts by Arab travel agencies to develop cheaper all-inclusive tours within the Arab world for Arab tourists.

This was the substance of the debate in the morning session of the first day of Arab Travel '80 conference which opened here today under the chairmanship of Asad Naar, head of Middle East Airlines.

Leaders of the Arab travel industry as well as top executives in the business from Europe are included in the three panels which will examine the potential for Arab travel in the decade of the eighties in sessions spread over two days at the conference theatre of the Dubai International Trade and Exhibition Centre. The conference, sponsored by Middle East Magazine in association with the Government of Dubai and DNATA, is part of the first trade fair for the Arab travel and tourism industry organised by ICC Expo Ltd., an Arab media company operating out of London.

The conference was inaugurated this morning by Sheikh Hashr Al Maktoum, Director of Information, Dubai, who underlined the importance of delineating the course of development for an industry that was assuming over greater importance in Arab economies and was a medium of unity and cooperation in the Arab world.

The holding of the conference in Dubai, Sheikh Hashr said, also pointed to the pivotal position this Emirate occupied in the furtherance of Arab tourism objectives.

The tone of the conference was set this morning by Dr. Abdul Rahman Abu Rabah, secretary general of the Arab Tourism Union, who, emphasising the geographic immensity of the Arab world with all its natural and cultural riches, called for a unified approach to the development of the Arab tourist industry. This development could not be separated from aspirations by all Arab countries to raise their economic, social and cultural standards.

Rabah noted that in the wake of conferences by Arab tourism ministers and recommendations of the World Tourism Convention in Rome, most Arab countries were pursuing new policies of tourism action. While overall Arab tourism resource and potential could best be identified by a joint survey, four areas of development in the fields of marketing, training and planning were immediately apparent. These were: promotion of Arab regional tourism; encouragement of investment in joint Arab touristic projects; increasing tourism consciousness to raise the level of handling services and facilities and, lastly, intensifying the activities of the Arab Tourism Union as an Arab coordination and cooperation agency.

Rabah said in its process of evolution, Arab tourism had passed through three stages: creation of national tourist organisations as part of ministries or autonomous bodies; provision of infrastructures especially in remote parts and archaelogical sites and simultaneous adoption of foreign publicity programs and, lastly, implementation of planning and marketing programs. Aid was sought and obtained where necessary, from experienced countries or United Nations agencies. Supplementing government efforts was the private sector to invest in the field. But Rabah also noticed the difference in emphasis between Arab countries of the West and Eastern Arab states where tourism was not given a pre-eminent position. Even so, stage had been reached where most Arab governments recognised the importance of the tourism industry now or in the near future and its place in overall economic planning. The most obvious manifestation of this awareness was the provision in many countries of basic infrastructual improvements such as in the road networks and public accommodation.

Rabah nevertheless pointed the need for further attention to a variety of services and facilities. In this connection he reiterated the recommendations of the Arab Tourism Union which were of a political, social and economic nature. Among these were:

—Abolition of visas for all Arab nationals.

—Introduction of an Arab Tourist Card which could eventually substitute complex travel documents.

—Use of group passports for group travel.

— Less cumbersome customs inspection and documentation and oral instead of written currency declarations.

—Introduction of a unified Arab visa for travel by international Arab tourists to any Arab country.

—Abolition of exit visas and police registration to speed up the tourist's freedom of movement across national frontiers.

— Exemption of transit travellers from all frontier formalities.

— Reduction of taxes and fees levied from tourists and the abolition of requirements to spend a minimum sum of money.

Rabah also reiterated the Arab Tourism Union's call for the extension of health cover to Arab tourists and their protection and assistance during visits. The creation of complaints departments at national tourist organisations would provide the needed human touch to their functioning.

Rabah called for initiation of joint touristic programs for Arab tourists at special prices and the creation, where possible, of tourist camp sites, villages and centres with all recreational facilities.

BRIEFS

IRAQI FIGHTING SUPPORTED--President Saddam Husayn has received more cables of support for the battle of honor and dignity fought by our struggler country against the racist Persians, as follows: We the masses of the struggler city of Aleppo congratulate you, Mr President, on the victories of our Iraqi army, the hero of Saddam's al-Qadisiyah battle. Go for more victories, O zealous army. Raise the Iraqi flag on the occupied Arab territory and fight bravely against the carlatan Khomeyni. Struggler president, it has become obvious to us that the regime of traitor Al-Asad is waging a campaign of suspicion against the heroic Araqi army. This traitor, who is the agent of Khomeyni and imperialism and its collaborators, had sent his army, tanks, armored cars and guns to Aleppo to kill innocent people and loot stores. Rif-at al-Asad had also sent his special forces with instruction to kill the people of Aleppo and destroy the city. These are the clear facts. Yet, they claim that they are the heroes of steadfastness and confrontation. Does the killing of innocent women, children and old people mean steadfastness and confrontation? You, the hero of al-Qadisiyah, are the true hero of steadfastness and the liberation of Arab territory. We sacrifice our souls and blood for you, O hero of al-Qadisiyah and liberation. The Iraqi military and political leadership is the devout leadership of the Arab nation. The Al-Asad regime is a traitorous regime. It is the enemy of the Arab nation and religion. March ahead, and may God grant you success. We are loyal soldiers under your wise leadership. [Signed] The Struggler Masses of Aleppo. GOLAN HEIGHTS-LEBANON BARTER--Kuwait, 13 Nov (KUNA)--A local newspaper Thursday reported that Syria had turned down an American-initiated Romanian offer for "bartering" the Golan Heights for North Lebanon. Quoting well-informed sources in Beirut and Damascus, AL-QABAS newspaper said that President Hafiz al-Asad had warned against partition of Lebanon which he feels has become more likely than ever now. The newspaper failed to mention as to when this Romanian offer was conveyed to Syria, but said that the proposal was initiated by the U.S. administration as one of the solutions for settlement of the Middle East conflict. AL-QABAS said that Syria had affirmed that it has no territorial ambitions in Lebanon or any other country and that it accepts no alternative for the Golan Heights which were occupied by Israel in the 1967 Arab-Israeli war. MAFIA ATTEMPT TO CIRCULATE COUNTERFEIT U.S. CURRENCY FOILED

Cairo AL-AKHBAR in Arabic 4 Oct 80 p 1

[Article by Nadiyah al-'Asqalani: "The Mafia Tried To Circulate 12 Million Counterfeit Dollars in Egypt"]

[Text] General Investigations Department men have arrested a Mafia leader who came to Cairo to flood the Egyptian market with US$12 million in counterfeit money. The purpose of the plot was to weaken the Egyptian economy and undermine confidence in it.

The Mafia leader succeeded in recruiting two senior Egyptian employees to circulate the counterfeit money. The Public Prosecutor ordered the imprisonment of the suspect and his two accomplices.

The General Department for Combating Monetary Crimes (the Economic Security Section) discovered that Dieter Pualap [transliterated], a German, was in Cairo, staying at a hotel.

Investigations revealed his contacts with the chief cashier of one of the major hotels, whom he recruited to circulate counterfeit $100 bills. Investigations also revealed his contacts with a senior employee at the student missions department.

When these investigations were compiled, Maj Gens Hasan al-Alfi, 'Ismat al-Rakhawi and Ahmad Rushdi, all assistant interior ministers for economic security, met and drew up a plan for surveillance of the contacts and telephone conversations made by the German, who was a prominent member of the German branch of the Mafia.

The General Investigations Department began forming investigation teams, headed by Col Fu'ad Jamal. Investigations revealed that the Mafia member had visited Egypt several times, had 24 previous convictions, and had previously been charged with forging documents, copying seals, theft, fraud, assault and armed assault, and was an international criminal.

Lt Cols Faruq 'Abbas and 'Ala' 'Abbas discovered his contacts with the two senior employees and recorded his telephone conversations with Germany and Italy, during which he asked his overseas agents to send the counterfeit dollars.

A plan was drawn up for arresting the Mafia leader. Lt Col Faruq 'Abbas went to him and pretended to be a member of the Cairo Mob who would circulate the counterfeit money inside Egypt. The Mafia leader swallowed the bait! It was agreed that the price of the counterfeit dollars would be 60 percent of their face value, and that payment would be in real American dollars.

Assistance was sought from the modern technical equipment at the technical assistance section of the Interior Ministry, and Interpol sent information proving that the German in Cairo was a fugitive from justice, was wanted for arrest and was carrying a forged passport.

It was agreed that the payment and delivery would take place in Italy, out of fear that the suspect would be arrested in Cairo. The Mafia leader got ready for the trip, unaware that all eyes were upon him and that all the evidence against him had been collected. During the final moments of the trip he was arrested. Cols Faruq Hafiz and Faruq 'Abd-al-Rahim seized two maps in his possession, one of Africa and one of Europe, a typewriter, a can full of letters used in printing and some counterfeit 100 Spanish Peseta notes.

The suspect was referred to the prosecutor for financial and commercial matters, and Chief Prosecutor Muhammad Mani' took over the investigation under the supervision of District Attorney 'Adli Husayn.

The suspect made a detailed confession to the public prosecutor, saying that he had come to Cairo to flood the Egyptian market with counterfeit currency in order to shake confidence in the Egyptian economy. The prosecutor ordered his detention, and overruled all objections to the continued detention of the suspect and his Egyptian accomplices prior to their trial.

The Mafia leader had tested the accuracy with which the dollars had been counterfeited by taking a $100 bill to a Cairo bank, which changed it without being able to discover the forgery.

PETROLEUM MINISTER OUTLINES SECTOR'S MAJOR INVESTMENT PROJECTS

Cairo AL-AHRAM in Arabic 1 Oct 80 p 7

[Article: "Deputy Prime Minister and Petroleum Minister Says that Oil Represents 60 Percent of Egyptian Exports"]

[Text] At a meeting of the Energy Commission, Deputy Prime Minister and Petroleum Minister Engr Ahmad 'Izz-al-Din Hilal announced that the petroleum sector realized a US$1.66 billion surplus in 1979, which will amount to about $2.15 billion this year. Petroleum sector exports account for about 60 percent of all Egyptian exports, and petroleum has become a principal source of foreign currency for the state.

The deputy prime minister said that the petroleum sector is helping reinforce the state's general treasury, for the Egyptian State Petroleum Authority and its companies contributed about 115 million Egyptian pounds to the general treasury in 1974, rising to 1.494 billion pounds in 1979. The figure is expected to rise to 2.021 billion pounds this fiscal year.

With reference to the most important petroleum projects now being carried out by the petroleum sector, Engr 'Izz-al-Din Hilal said that the petroleum sector is studying and implementing several major investment projects, the foremost being:

1. Construction of a new complex to produce lubricating oils at Alexandria, and increasing the current lubrication oil capacity at Suez and al-'Amiriyah to about 260,000 tons a year, thereby achieving self-sufficiency in such oils. At present we import about 45 percent of the local market's needs.

2. Studies for a proposed olefin complex to produce plastic from polyethylene. The local market's demand for this substance is increasing with the increase in development and industrialization activities in the country.

3. An almost-completed study on establishing a large refinery complete with the most modern technological methods of refining and processing.

4. Implementation of a project to build a 370-kilometer pipeline to carry crude oil from Shuqayrah on the Gulf of Suez to the refineries at Suez and Cairo, capable of carrying 8 million tons a year at the start, rising to 12 million tons during the 5-year plan.

5. Implementation of a project to collect petroleum gas from the Suez Gulf region for use in producing butagaz and manufacturing fertilizer.

6. A project for seeking natural gas in the Western Desert, the Delta and north Sinai, as well as looking into what must be done to encourage specialized international petroleum companies to prospect for natural gas in Egypt and to develop gas fields quickly.

7. Implementation of a natural gas grid for home consumption as an alternative to butagaz in the al-Ma'adi, Hulwan, Nasr City and New Cairo areas, whereby gas will be brought to about 160,000 residential units over a period of 4 years.

Under way now are the necessary studies for utilizing natural gas for home consumption in Alexandria and Gizah Governorates.

SOUTH SINAI COUNTING ON LAND RECLAMATION, OIL, TOURISM

Cairo AL-AKHBAR in Arabic 2 Oct 80 p 6

[Article by Muhammad 'Abd-al-Salam: "South Sinai Governor Tells AL-AKHBAR that New Oil Discoveries Will Be Announced During the October Holidays; 274,000 Feddans To Be Reclaimed and Handed over to Young People"]

[Text] Governor of South Sinai Maj Gen Fu'ad 'Aziz Ghali announced that new petroleum discoveries other than the Abu Rudays, Ra's Sudr and 'Alma Fields will be announced during the October holidays, and stressed that there are vast petroleum potentials in the South Sinai Governorate.

He stated that the way of life in the area began taking a new turn after President al-Sadat decided to change it into an independent governorate; that there are vast agricultural, mining and tourism possibilities, and that all resources are being concentrated on their exploitation. The governor invited the young people of Egypt to acquire at nominal prices the lands which are now being reclaimed in the governorate. The governor, in his statement to AL-AKHBAR, stressed the fact that planning in the governorate is aimed at increasing the population to 4 million by the end of the year 2000, as opposed to its current population of 40,000.

He added, "An agreement has been reached with an American company to reactivate the Abu Zunaymah manganese company, and 100 million Egyptian pounds have been allocated for this purpose. Production will begin in the second half of 1982."

Reclamation of 274,000 Feddans

The governor said, "There are tremendous agricultural possibilities in four regions of the governorate: the first located north and south of al-Tur, the so-called Sahl al-Qa' region, covering a total area of 120,000 square feddans; the second located in the Raqid and Wadi al-'Arish area, covering 60,000 square feddans; the third stretching from Ra's Sudr to Abu Rudays, covering 52,000 square feddans, and the fourth located in the Wadi Firan and St Catherine areas, covering 12,000 square feddans."

The governor of South Sinai added that these vast areas of land will be handed over to young Egyptian graduates of agricultural colleges and institutes at extremely nominal prices. These lands will contribute to the success of the food security plans now being drawn up to meet the future.

He said that in addition to these lands, the governorate has fish resources which have not been successfully exploited along 650 to 800 kilometers of the governorate's coasts. Some 120 fishing boats have been purchased to exploit these fish resources, of which 45 tons a month are now exploited.

Tourism Is the Hope

South Sinai Governor Fu'ad 'Aziz Ghali said, "There are several unique tourist regions in the governorate, and tourism is the hope for raising the social level of the governorate. During 1981, the governorate, in cooperation with the Reconstruction Ministry, will build a tourist village in the Moses' Bath area north of the town of al-Tur, with the assistance of foreign capital, as well as building another spa in the Pharaoh's Bath area, where the mineral waters reach a temperature of 72 degrees centigrade, even though it is located right on the Red Sea coastline."

He said, "An average of 9,000 tourists come to the Mediterranean each year. A contract has been signed with an Italian tourist company to bring several tour groups to the St Catherine area starting next month, each group averaging 900 tourists. The governorate's income from tourism amounts to about 40,000 pounds."

One Million Pounds for Health Care

Fu'ad 'Aziz Ghali said, "One million pounds have been allocated to build a general hospital, having 200 beds during its first stage of construction, in the town of al-Tur, to have all the medical specializations, as well as to increase the number of beds at the St Catherine and Abu Rudays Hospitals and to reinforce health care units at Abu Zunaymah and Wadi Firan."

The governor of Sinai ended his statement by saying that there are huge difficulties confronting the governorate, represented by a great shortage of employees in various specializations, especially in the upper management levels, and a lack of technical laborers."

The governor stressed the need to increase the incentives given to governorate employees, so as to encourage people to come to work in the governorate. Also, special facilities must be given to the public and private sectors to encourage employment in South Sinai. Early next year, al-Tur will become the governorate's capital.

WAR CONSIDERED TO HAVE CREATED 'UNITY,' 'REALISM'

Tehran KEYHAN in Persian 2 Nov 80 p 11

[Article by Naser Makaram-Shirazi]

[Text] This war has taught us to be more realistic and has taught the bloodthirsty, barbaric enemy that it is facing a revolution.

According to all estimations, the war started by Saddam in this sensitive region of the world is undoubtedly one of the maddest wars in history, even if we only bear in mind Iraq's own interests, since:

1. As for the Moslem nations who anxiously and with curiosity follow this destructive war (I am not talking about puppet governments, I am talking about the one billion Moslems of the world), they all ask each other whether these powerful and expensive weapons bought with the blood of the laboring Moslem people, these long-range airplanes being shot down and destroyed every day and all these fighters and pilots who roll in their own blood every day with their mangled, half-burned bodies strewn about, were they all for the purpose of fighting Moslems and a newly established, revolutionary Islamic regime, a regime whose enmity with the no one enemy of the Arabs (the United States and Israel) has been more open than others and has in practice proven that it will not compromise?

A regime, the Islamic Republic of Iran, whose constitution has greatly emphasized assistance to all the downtrodden of the world in general and the Moslems of the world in particular.

The Moslem nations of the world ask themselves: Does attacking such a country serve anything but the interests of the United States and the occupiers of Islamic lands, and will it have any results other than to escalate conflicts and disunite the Islamic countries?

Are a few patches of border lands, even if they are in dispute, worth giving Israel the opportunity to declare that it is happy about the continuation of this war because this will afford it peace of mind for the next 10 years?

That is, even if the Ba'thists who have not fired one shot towards Israel are overthrown and a regime that would be a bitter enemy of Israel would come to power in Iraq, it would not have sufficient military resources at its disposal, because Saddam has madly destroyed them all by fighting an Islamic country.

2. As for the financial damages, they have been so heavy and horrible that according to conscientious observers, in the early days of this forced war, before it had expanded as it has now, the daily damages were equivalent to "the cost of building a large steel mill," a great part of the damages being Iraq's.

Even if we could imagine for one moment that the Ba'thists could finally dominate the border regions they claim, they would never be worth the great damages which have been inflicted.

Is it possible for anyone with a jot of wisdom and uderstanding to allow himself to cause a country such as Iraq, which is behind in many ways and every bit of whose income must be used for economic reconstruction, to regress for a period of 10 years and to rob its suppressed and deprived people of every bit of their resources in order to repair the ravages of war in areas such as the oil industry and refineries, atomic plants, industry, and roads?

3. And, as far as internal prestige and credibility are concerned, all those promises that Saddam has given his people concerning victory over Iran (a quick, crushing victory) have turned out to be empty. Even if (supposing for a moment) he had had any prestige or credibility in his country, it has been destroyed. By starting a senseless and extremely barbaric war, coupled with extensive false propaganda and baseless claims, he has made the neutral people of the world become so skeptical about him that even those reporters who were invited to his country with warmhearted greetings and gifts began to criticize him. But he could not bear this criticism, so he had to withdraw his invitation and drive them out of his country, or at least curtail their activities.

Naturally, this war has brought with it many damages for us and undoubtedly the nature of the war itself is damaging and calamitous; but this does not suggest that wars in the end are calculated by adding up the outcome and the calamities. So many wars have opened up new chapters in the history of nations. And as the imam of the people has said, they have created movement, struggle, and motion and have awakened the people from inertia and sleep. By the grace of God, this war has had such an effect and will have other significant effects, including the following:

1. We have not forgotten that recently political oppositions existed at high levels, even in the Parliament, which, were it not for the effective warnings of the imam, would have spread further. As if they imagined taht the activities of all our enemies had ended and no other danger threatened us! But this sudden attack by the merciless, brainless, heathen enemy has violently shaken every intellect. It has become obvious what a great mistake we have committed in widening our differences, a mistake which would undoubtedly cause us to lose everything should we not rise up to correct it. The still warm, burning, spilled blood of the martyrs has washed away our differences. (And hopefully, this is not temporary.)

The pelting sound of enemy bullets, rockets, shells, and bombs, which have always been answered by our brave fighters, has muffled the murmurs of division. Sincerity, love, and friendship have blossomed in our hearts and chains of unity have united our battlelines on all levels of the society, especially on the lower levels, which are always full of love and sincerity. (If we only realize the worth of this unity and try to preserve it!)

2. The end of the period of political isolation is another blessed result of this forced war. Undoubtedly, if the prime minister had wanted earlier to go to the United States, to New York, to participate in the meetings of the Security Council to explain Iran's decisive position, he might have immediately been accused by irresponsible individuals of compromise. But the war has shown that we should not lose these golden opportunities because of mere weak excuses. We must not remain silent in the face of so much propaganda from the enemy, because through such trips we can make ourselves heard through the mass media of the enemy and even the television networks of our prime enemy, the United States. And we can occupy the first page of every newspaper in the world in order to somehow show that we are right. This is something that we could not have obtained at any price before. (Even the presence of Mr Raja'i in that assembly and coming in contact with the opinions of friendly diplomats will open a new chapter for Mr Raja'i himself.)

We must realize full well that the outcomes of wars are not determined on the battlefields alone. World communication systems play an effective role in them. And although these systems are under the control of the superpowers, we can make use of them, to some degree, and make our just voices heard by those justice seeking nations of the world. Otherwise, they will make of us such a horrible monster with whom no one will sympathize.

Realism and attention to actual issues (beyond slogans) have been other blessings of this war. On the battlefields, we realize full well how unrealistic and destructive were the slogans of those groups who said that the army must be eliminated.

When we hear that the president has freed a number of army prisoners because of their expertise and has sent them to the battle fronts and they, too, sincerely sacrifice their lives, we realize that indescriminate violent action, anywhere, against anyone, for any conviction, does not benefit the country. Instead, we must distinguish between serious and minor crimes. Dispatching various committees to different countries in order to explain Iran's views on this forced war and other world issues was another realistic step. Hopefully, in the wake of the painful incident of this forced war, while remaining adamant about our revolutionary positions, we can increase our revolutionary awareness and alertness and become more realistic in order to bring our revolution to fruition with the least amount of damage and along the shortest path and to make the name of Islam known throughout the world as a progressive, liberating ideology. Also, through the decrease in senseless pressures on the people of our country by some inattentive individuals, we will be able to transform disappointments and lack of love into sincerity and love and to create a united, alert movement and, in the name of God, to put such mad enemies as Saddam and his masters in their place.

SADDAM PRESENTED AS FOLLOWER OF 'WORLD IMPERIALISM'

Tehran ETTALA'AT in Persian 2 Nov 80 p 8

[Article by 'Abbas Tarrabyan]

> [Text] The coordinators of the movement of the Moslem people of Iraq are Islamic groups opposed to the Ba'th regime.
>
> Saddam's slightest suspicion is enough to destroy the most beloved of Iraq's Ba'th regime.
> Saddam knew well what a storm would rise if the martyred Ayatollah Sadr were alive.

The crimes of Saddam and the mad Ba'th party are broadening daily. These atrocities have reached such limits that they have surpassed even those of Genghis Khan and Hitler. Amidst all this, the suffering Iraqi people, who dare not even breathe under the American boots of Saddam, are confronting Saddam's regime with their blood boiling, following the rightful expectations of the Islamic people of Iran. But certain factors have overshadowed this uprising and defrayed somewhat the movement of the masses in Iraq.

There is no doubt concerning the alienation of the Ba'th regime from the Iraqi people. This alienation and the isolation of Saddam and his associates are the result of conflicts due to the Ba'th regime not having the support of the masses and, at the same time, the general discontent of the Iraqi people. There are absolutely clear signs of a general uprising but, because of certain factors, the main explosion has been postponed.

Suppression

Suppression is one of the most important of these factors. Suppression and terror are so evident in Iraq that the fighters against Saddam think of even breathing as a blessing. The slightest suspicion will even send the closest of Saddam's companions to death. This regime continues its infamous life through blood, fire, and treachery. And every day Saddam expands its information and spy institutions to new dimensions.

Lack of an Alert Leadership of the People

The second problem concerns the lack of a leader. Following the Iranian revolution and its victory, the Arab rulers and dictators were thrown into a whirlpool of fear. They finally reached the conclusion that a widespread religious movement threatens them. Among them, Saddam Hoseyn, in particular, sensed this horror more than the rest. The ineffectiveness of the shah's power against Emam Khomeyni, the leader of the Islamic revolution of Iran, had a powerful influence on him. He realized how leadership, especially if it is religious, can give a boost to a revolution. And, through extensive studies, he realized that the martyred Seyyed Mohammad Baqer Sadr possessed such an ability which, were it to grow, would before long cause Mohammad Reza's fate to be repeated for him as well. Naturally, Saddam and the Ba'th party had no choice but to destroy Ayatollah Sadr. In this way, it would be a long time before a religious leadership would be created in Iraq with a leader such as Sadr.

Lack of Religious Awareness

Lack of religious awareness is another reason for the forced though temporary silence of the Moslem people of Iraq. Saddam and his associates would be happy if the rest of the Moslem people of Iraq, with the exception of a small number, would follow a superficial, one-dimensional religion. For this reason, the Ba'th party attempts to familiarize the people of Iraq more and more with Western civilization and an amoral life. In this way, he is trying to force the people to accept hibernation. Saddam knows well that if true Islam were to begin to blow like a storm in the streets of Baghdad what a disaster he would face. The reports from various Islamic movements inspired by true Islam show that not a day passes when some of them are not destroyed. And although Saddam has confined the environment for their growth, they continue their activities of planting bombs and handing out leaflets in order to inflame the true anger of the people, due to their religious awareness. Perhaps we can say that religious consciousness which will cause an ideological struggle is a warning still not quite apparent in Iraqi society. Unfortunately, this is a problem for other Moslem strugglers in the Middle East as well. Until the day when these Moslem strugglers make their fight an ideological one and provide their people with the necessary religious awareness, they will remain targets for the blows of the enemies of Islam.

The Cooperation Between Different Classes

Divisions and clashes of ideas between different groups of the people of Iraq is another factor which has overshadowed the necessary finishing touch for the blossoming of a revolution--for example, the lack of a close cooperation of the Iraqi courts with other anti-Saddam strugglers who have not expressed enough compassion. Perhaps the only reason for this division is their nationalities, because, unfortunately, a sense of Arab nationalism has dug its roots into the people of Iraq. This has resulted in misunderstanding and separation between them and other people of Iraq.

The extensive propaganda of the Ba'thist Saddam, who has inherited the ambitions of the deposed shah, has made him spend large sums for propaganda [as published]. Recently, the extravagance of his regime has been witnessed in a new form through the distortions and praises of reactionary Western radio and television. The Western Zionist mass media has turned the news of the war upside down. They show the aggressive, monstous army of the Ba'th regime as heroes against the Iranian army and supporters of the Islamic people. Meanwhile, large masses of the people of Iraq, who, on the one hand, cannot consider the army and people of Iran as their enemy and, on the other hand, are under the influence of the mass media, pressure, and the suppression of Saddam, are awaiting a more opportune time to pay their debt to Islam. Given the aforementioned reasons concerning the absence of an uprising of the people of Iraq, a great responsibility rests on the shoulders of anti-Saddam groups who rise from the people. Everyone's eyes are hopefully watching the epoch-creating movement of these Moslem groups. Hopefully, under these war conditions, our struggling Moslem brothers in Iraq will take on the responsibility of coordinating the struggle of the people of Iraq and through the inspiration of the historical messages of Emam Khomeyni will make history move towards perfection--with the help of God.

FORMATION OF SUPREME DEFENSE COUNCIL CRITICIZED

Paris NAME-YE RUZ in Persian 25 Oct 80 p 11

[Text] Retired Major General Mahmud Key, an expert in world military history, wrote in a letter:

" I have read in NAME-YERUZ that, in its war with Iraq, Iran has recently entrusted all executive decisions concerning military operations to a newly formed council, the Supreme Defense Council.

I am not aware of the make-up of that council, the competence and rank of its members, or the existence or lack of intellectual harmony among them. However, the fact that two of its members are Majles deputies (one of whom is a clergyman), leads me to conclude that, by doing that, Iran has compromised the effectiveness and efficiency of its high command and military operations which call for absolute decisiveness. This is an ominous development: during an armed conflict circumstances often arise when decisiveness and immediate decision-making are vital and paramount. Such circumstances are incompatible with vacillation, wavering, and the involvement of councils and committees. One must bear in mind the important fact that war is an 'art,' with very well-defined rules and principles. In short, with all its irregularities and seeming disorganizations, war, at the same time, has its own clearly-defined, almost 'mathematical' rules and principles which are never guided by chance, accident, or divine decree. And one of the most important and fundamental of these principles is that of high command and its oneness.

In his masterpiece,"On War," Karl von Clausewitz, the Prussian general and writer on military strategy, indicated: 'War is a continuation of diplomacy by other means.' Thus war breaks out when politicians' efforts, maneyverings, connivings, and deals fail. Consequently when a country reaches this stage of impasse and choses the war option, it is absolutely mandatory that from that moment on it entrusts its high command and the conduct of its military operations in the hands of only one commander-in-chief and stops mixing military affairs with politics and politicians. Indeed, politics' peculiarity is that when it is allowed to affecta judgment, it destroys justice and when it is allowed to be considered in military matters, it impairs their effectiveness and obstructs its decisiveness. And any vacillation in decision-making by submitting such matters to councils and committees, and consequent futile discussions, will lead to certain defeat in war.

That is why the formation of a supreme defense council empowered with executive decision-making and high command is just the opposite of what ought to be done. The formation of the new council will no doubt make Saddam Hosein swoon with joy! I pray that it will not prove too costly for Iran and I fervently hope that the council in question will be dissolved and Iran's high command entrusted in one competent individual so that any vacillation and indecisiveness may be averted before it is too late. Otherwise, Iran's defeat in the current conflict with Iraq is certain. Indeed, a commander-in-chief ought to be able to conclude decisively and carry out his ideas and military strategies promptly , without the need of obtaining time-consuming prior authorizations."

'DISINTEGRATION DANGER' STRESSED BY FORMER TUDEH LEADER

Paris NAME-YE RUZ in Persian 25 Oct 80 p 12

[Text] In a communique Dr Fereidun Keshavarz, former secretary-general of Iran's Tudeh party, declared:

"Dear Iranian Brothers and Sisters, I am addressing myself to you, Iranians of every ideology, persuasion, religion, and social class. We all cherish Iran's soil and ancient culture because our parents and ancestors have lived there and are buried there. Because we were born there and grew up there. Iranians are attached to and proud of their homeland and their national honor. Despite their considerable suffering in the aftermath of the Islamic Revolution, Iranian soldiers and officers are nevertheless attached to Iran's soil and cherish its territorial integrity.

I also would like to address myself to my Baluchi, Kurdish, Azeri, Turkmen, and other Iranian brothers and sisters: you must bear in mind that despite the superpowers and today's world imperialism, it is in the interest of the world of tomorrow and the interests of all of us, Iranians, that, as in the past, we stick together, listen to, accept, and correct our mutual grievances. Otherwise, if we act like a divided flock, our enemies will easily destroy us by devouring us one by one.

Today Iran runs the risk of being broken up and disintegrated. The Iraqi government has invaded Iranian soil and blatantly threatens Iran's territorial integrity with its groundless claims. If Iraq is successful in carrying out its scheme, nothing will be left of our ancient land. Or, more exactly, today's aggressors will leave nothing intact.

Today, various individuals abroad are openly conniving and conspiring with various political groups in Iran and the remnant of the deposed Shah's agents in order to once again seize power and enjoy the enormous privileges of the past. Such individuals are playing politics over the corpses of scores of thousands youth who gave their lives for the Islamic Revolution. Today such individuals are showing their true characteristics, their real faces: they remain either silent or use any pretext to whitewash Iraq's invasion of Iranian soil. Furthermore, these individuals are becoming more blatant, vociferous, and shameless than in the past.

Dear Fellow Iranians, my 25 years of political experience convinces me that, in today's world, no foreign country, irrespective of its ideology or regime, feels sorry for Iran and its oppressed people. Today, for us, Iranians, whether Kurds, Turkmens, Baluchis, Persians, and Azeris, there is no more urgent obligation than to drive away the Iraqi aggressors from the sacred soil of our homeland. To achieve this, an essential pre-condition is the union of all of Iran's progressive and freedom-loving forces.

LEADER OF 'DEPRIVED' CALLS FOR PARTISAN WARFARE

Tehran ETTELA'AT in Persian 15 Oct 80 p 10

[Interview with Hojjat ol-Eslam Amir Majd, in charge of the Organization for Mobilization of the 'Deprived'.]

[Text] Experience has proven that there is not a better way to face aggression by superpowers than by partisan warfare.

Question: What mission has the liberation army of the "deprived" and how is it organized?

Answer: A booklet has been prepared about the organization and the mission of the resistance of the liberation army that will be distributed among people. It can be briefly mentioned here that it has two main missions. Its first mission is internal, that of protection of the country's independence and guarding the Islamic Revolution. Its second mission concerns matters beyond the nation's frontiers. Internal mission concerns the following matters:

1. Facing the Enemy's Psychological Warfare

People's awareness and their mobilization for the purpose of facing propaganda plots by the enemy is a necessity. This is because the enemy is trying to defeat our revolution and dominate us once again by spreading rumors, weakening our national spirit and by creating divisions among us. Our actions will remove our vulnerability and gradually prepare the people for quick and effective reaction against plots by the East or the West.

2. Fighting Against Fifth Columns

Our struggle on a wide scale could put an end to activities by individuals who have sold themselves out, and those who, for reasons of their connection with the old regime, and foreign agents, are plotting against our Islamic revolution. The Fifth Column includes all agents of the East and the West who, from the very beginning of our revolution, have been plotting in various ways against us.

3. Fighting Against Sabotage by Enemy Agents

After the assignment of responsibilities in the resistance army is over and the entire country is put under the devoted militants, infiltrating enemy agents who are trained outside the country to carry out sabotage against our vital installations, including oil pipelines, industries and communication networks, will be stopped. It is necessary that by training and by increased alertness of our resistance forces, especially those in the border areas, the mercenaries be apprehended before being able to do anything. I must emphasize here once again that in order to stop sabotage activities by infiltrating enemy agents we can rely only on people themselves. Without direct or indirect help of the people responsible forces will not be able to prevent sabotage by the enemy. This is because their numbers and the means at their disposal is so limited. If we are able to train people and familiarize them with the sabotage methods of the enemy agents, they can easily neutralize their actions. People are everywhere, and by recognizing and identifying suspected agents and reporting them to concerned officials, they can effectively help prevent sabotage. In every 22-man resistance group at least one person is in charge of information and of collecting news. In view of the fact that there are several such groups in every part of the country, the entire land will be covered by the intelligence collecting agents of the 22-million-man army [sic]. This is so because people consider the giving of information as a religious duty.

4. Reducing the Extent of Damages Caused by Enemy Bombing

By expanding training courses aimed at preparing the public to protect itself against air attacks, resistance groups will be able to make use of the previously chosen shelters such as basements of the strongly built structures and thus reduce the number of casualties to the minimum. By making proper preparations to meet air pollution created by chemical, microbiological and incinerable bombs, and by being prepared to give first aid, casualties could be noticeably reduced. Thus, the weakening of public spirit and the wasting of manpower capabilities of our fighting forces could be prevented.

5. Supporting Operations by the Regulars

When our regular forces are fighting the enemy at certain points in the country, the resistance army could support their operations in two ways:

One, by insuring security behind the lines of the regular army aimed at preventing operations by the fifth column and the saboteurs. Another way is to help and strengthen the regular army whenever a shortage of manpower is felt which could be done by dispatching handpicked men and volunteers from various resistance groups to join the regulars at the front.

I am happy to announce that at this point a number of our million-man army have already joined their brothers serving with the corps and the regular army, especially in the border zones, guarding the frontiers and keeping watch over the least enemy movements. And with their undestructible faith and strong spirit, they hold the initiative.

6. Taking Part in A War of Attrition

This stage is the most important mission of the resistance army during which resistance groups, employing partisan warfare tactics, will attack the enemy in towns, villages, hills, the desert and with a series of offensive activities will defeat and destroy the enemy. This tactic will only be used when the country is suddenly occupied by an overwhelming enemy force. That is when a superpower aggressor has been able to make operation by our regulars impossible through a sudden attack from the air, sea and land.

Experience has proven that there is not a better and more effective way to fight against aggression by superpowers than by resorting to partisan warfare.

7. Holy War for Defeating Impasses

Whereas the resistance army is the last and the most permanent base of the revolution and its supporters and its position is anti-imperialist and has always been fighting against the real causes of our problems and miseries and has, on the other hand, prepared itself for its great devine mission of giving assistance to the deprived in the world, it should not allow itself to become involved in small and petty matters. But when responsible organizations and institutions are incapable of solving social problems, mobilization organizations must act to remove the obstacles and help appropriate authorities by suggesting basic solutions.

Question: How is the army organized?

Answer: Organization of the resistance army is based on self-sufficiency, simplicity and flexibility. In addition, as it was mentioned before, no restrictions have been put on the age and specialization of those who want to join. Under normal conditions, coordination and guidance are conducted through a centralized hierarchy, but during an emergency, groups will act freely and the hierarchal system will not prevent them from free and fast action.

Question: What are the operational methods of the 20-million-man army?

Answer: War of resistance is an allout war which has no fronts. In other words, it is a war that is fought on every front. It is fought wherever committed individuals exist. That is where the front is.

Therefore, operations by resistance groups are based on partisan warfare. Members of these groups do not have to leave their homes and places of work such as factories, universities, schools, refineries and dams except under exceptional circumstances. They will perform their duties in their own prescribed areas. Members of the resistance army continue their routine lives and it is only in times of danger that they are called upon to organize and take up arms. Resistance groups in cities and towns will engage in street and house to house fighting, making use of small firearms and homemade tools, no matter how elementary. They may be lightly armed yet they will be armed with ideological discipline and faith to be able to stop the enemy and destroy the aggressor in ditch to ditch fighting.

MOSLEM DIGNITARY SEES PLO RECOGNITION OF ISRAEL

Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 23 Sep 80 p 3

[Article by Yehuda Ariel, HA'ARETZ correspondent: "Israeli Arab Extremism Directed at Occupation Not at State"]

[Text] "It is true that we oppose the Israeli occupation of the Gaza Strip and the West Bank, but we wish to live in peace and brotherhood with the Jewish nation. An Israeli withdrawal and the establishment of a Palestinian state, including good neighborliness with the Israelis will benefit both nations," the Qadi of Acre and Haifa Shaykh Haj Muhammad Hubayshi, stated in a special interview with HA'ARETZ.

According to the Qadi "the PLO is prepared to recognize Israel on condition that Israel recognize it, as well as withdraw from the Gaza Strip and the West Bank."

To the question how did the Qadi Shaykh Hubayshi arrive at the political and anti-Israel meeting in Shefar'am, he responded, "I was invited by my good friends Ramzi Khuri (a veteran RAKAH activist) and Ahmed Abu-Shan'ab. Never did I attend such meetings but this time I considered the wish of my good friend the mayor of Shefar'am, Ibrahim Nimayr al-Husayn, and that's why I went. At first I even refused to mount the podium of notables, but I could not continue my refusal when they repeated my name. Even so, I did not pronounce a blessing at the Shefar'am meeting, I spoke not a single word at this meeting."

The Land is Arab

In the Qadi's opinion the Arabs of Israel were 30 years too late in recognizing that the Mufti, Haj Amin al-Husayni, and the entire Arab leadership erred in their opposition to the establishment of the State. They should have recognized the tiny State of Israel that was proposed. Today we are against the conquest, but not against the State. Even the extremism of the Israeli Arabs, the young generation, including 22 and 24-year-olds is against the conquest the Israeli conquest and not against the State. Just as the Communists have been saying for many years."

Relative to the matter of the land being holy to Jews and Moslems, he said: "From a religious standpoint, the ground of this country was Arab just as it was in Spain. Jerusalem is holy and its borders were once again consecrated and all of East Jerusalem together with the other areas of Gaza and the West Bank in the years 1948 to 1967. Everything that the Arabs had before the Six-Day War is Arab ground."

The Qadi does not accept that these were incidental borders of the year 1948, but rather "borders consecrated to Arab land." The Qadi does not recognize the consecration of the land to Jews or a prior right of the Jewish people to the land. "We will remain Israeli Arabs for as long as the State exists, because this is our state and this is our birthplace. I, as one born in Acre and whose family has been here for many generations, am not prepared even to move to Haifa, because I was born in this city, and this is my place," he said.

At the start of the interview he reaffirmed something which had created an emotional storm 12 years ago: "Most of the Arabs of Acre still see it as an Arab city in accordance with the partition of 1947. Anyone saying otherwise is considered by many of the extremists as a traitor to his nation."

On this issue nothing has changed, he said.

CONTOUR PLAN READIED BY INTERIOR MINISTRY

Tel Aviv DAVAR in Hebrew 28 Sep 80 p 6

[Article by Yoel Dar: "In the Arab Section"]

[Text] The Interior Ministry has authorized the sum of 20 million pounds for the preparation of contour plans in all of the villages of the Northern Triangle within a year. The advisor to the Prime Minister on Arab Affairs, Binyamin Gur Aryeh, who reported on this noted that up to now the preparation of contour plans in 20 Arab villages has been completed, 20 other plans are on deposit, and another 15 are in the preparation and study phase.

According to the advisor, within a year of today there will be a contour plan for every one of the large Arab villages. Unlike in the past, the local Arab councils will not be burdened with half of the expenses, but rather all of the financial burden will fall on the Interior Ministry.

Contour plans are intended to support the accelerated development of the Arab village and to supply the needs of the rapidly increasing population within the next 20 years. It must be assumed that if the trend of increase of this population continues at the present rate (3.4 percent per year) the number of Arabs in the country will double by the year 2000, in other words--there will be need for doubling the areas allocated to Arabs for residences, for public buildings and for development.

The Interior Ministry hopes that contour plans will eliminate or significantly slow down the tempo of illegal construction, a phenomenon especially apparent in the villages of the Gaililee and the Triangle and along the road between Beersheba and Arad.

It is doubtful whether experts of the Interior Ministry know the scope of the illegal construction in the Arab section and how many houses have been built there on national territory or on areas which have been set aside for environmental development. The favorite excuse of the builders is, that they have taken this step because of red tape, because of a lack of contour plans and the failure to grant construction permits. Perhaps there is something in these reasons, but not always.

Thousands of homes have been built on national lands in areas surrounding villages. Will the new contour plans, and intensification of supervision over illegal construction, and cooperation between the Interior Ministry and police indeed bring about a limitation of this phenomenon? Time will tell.

In the near future, thousands of Moslem citizens of Israel will cross the Allenby Bridge on their way to Mecca. Unlike the last 2 years, this time there is no enthusiasm at all felt among those leaving. This journey, although its price is 100,000 pounds, is no longer an unattainable aspiration for Israeli Moslems, but that is not why their ardor has cooled. The reason lies in the attitude of the Saudi Arabian and Jordanian authorities toward their brethren who are residents of Haifa and Jaffa.

The Moslem pilgrims complained last year that their hosts did not concern themselves with providing sleeping places for them even though they paid all the money demanded of them and they did not always enjoy proper humanitarian or medical treatment.

Because of the many protests, the Jordanians decided to set up a special commission to deal with their matters. Jordanian buses belonging to the Jordanian Religious Ministry, will carry them from the Allenby Bridge to Amman and from there they will be transported by Iranian air-conditioned buses to Saudi Arabia. This is the way in which it was decided to compensate last year's pilgrims for the damages they sustained.

It appears that the Jordanian and Saudi Arabian authorities have understood that such conduct would mar their reputations in the eyes of the Zionist enemy and in particular would distort the fatherly image that the Arabs, and especially the Saudis, are attempting to create for themselves.

The public discussion about moving the graves from the Moslem cemetery on Gibborim Street in Haifa to another cemetery has recently been renewed.

A group calling itself the Moslem Initiative Commission released an announcement, in which it seeks to condemn the plan because it contains "elements of profanation and is damaging to the families whose dead are interred there." Another part of the Moslem community rejects these allegations and explains, that the intention is to utilize this space for the construction of 88 apartments for low income Moslem families.

Qadi Shar'i, the Shaykh Muhammad Hubayshi, ruled that transfer of the remains is in accordance with tradition (al-Shari'a) since according to Moslem tradition in which burials have been discontinued for 30 consecutive years is no longer a sacred site and its area may be utilized for another public purpose.

According to this plan, fraternal graves will be established elsewhere for all of the deceased, in order to prepare the area for public construction so that the entire community may benefit.

On the surface, the discussion is traditional-religious, but it is easy to discern two camps behind it: one camp which is in sympathy toward what is called the radical circles and a second camp in sympathy with what is called the moderates and cooperators. The plan has not yet been carried out, but the two camps are girding and casting threats into the air.

FAR-REACHING ORGANIZATIONAL REFORMS IN IDF CALLED FOR

Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 23 Sep 80 p 11

[Article by Matityahu Peled: "Weak Points of the IDF"]

[Text] From time immemorial, the public knew of the condition of the IDF mainly from those who were appointed over the security of the state--the minister of defense and the chief of staff. This information was never given out in full detail, but rather as a summary estimate only. The restrictions against giving detailed information to the public are understood and the need to rely upon the general good-faith of those appointed over our security has always been accepted with understanding.

This year, also, with the start of the new year, we have received from the defense minister and the chief of staff their estimates of the power of the IDF. But this time, perhaps more than ever, nothing in the words of encouragement that were expressed seemed to remove doubts. The defense minister, for example, making known to the personnel at the Defense Ministry on the eve of the New Year that he himself did much traveling around the world, but has yet to meet a military which was superior in quality to the IDF. This is a statement which is not comforting. For, where would Mr Begin have been able to come across other armies during his travels and have been able to test their quality? In his capacity as prime minister, it would appear that during his travels he did not come across anything but saluting parades and military bands. We never heard of his devoting time to undertake an actual visit to foreign armies, with the purpose of learning about their organization and their equipment.

Napoleon's Line of Thought

Had he decided, ever, on such a learning trip he would have discovered without a doubt that the matter requires a great deal of time and effort: it is necessary to meet with senior commanders and hear detailed briefings, to visit training and maintenance installations, to be present during the training of units and groups. Such a learning visit, even if highly speeded up, could not last less than several weeks in every one of the armies of the world. Mr Begin has neither the time nor the capability of devoting himself to this kind of learning and research and it is therefore difficult to accept his testimony, based upon his personal impression, that there are indeed no forces superior to the IDF.

Even the remarks of the chief of staff on the night after Yom Kippur were not such as would implant total confidence that the IDF is indeed prepared for its missions in maximal measure. He declined to answer the important question which he was asked on the matter of the organization of the IDF. That is, he did not say that the IDF is organized today as a totally modern army and that he does not believe that from this standpoint the IDF is not suffering from a lack. The chief of staff is to be commended on his forthrightness, but with that the question can be asked: Is it possible for an army to be prepared for its mission if it is defective in its organization?

The stress placed upon the quantitative strengthening of the IDF must arouse dissatisfaction in anyone familiar with such matters. One of the truths upon which the IDF was structured from its start was that it is not within the power of Israel to compete quantitatively with its enemies. As regards Ben Gurion and the chiefs of staff who served in his time, it was not the quantitative strength that was the main element, but rather the capability of drawing forth the little that the state was capable of putting at the disposal of the IDF and to elicit from that the maximum power. The line of thinking which guided the builders of the IDF, matched that of Napoleon as expressed in his summary of his victory over the Mamluk armies in Egypt: Even if the individual Mamluk is superior to the individual French soldier as a fighter, yet 10 French soldiers are not inferior to 10 Mamluks, and 100 French soldiers surpass 1000 Mamluks on the battlefield. In other words, the organization of an army, its level of command and the staff work in it--outweigh the quantitative value.

With regard to the IDF in its relationship to the Arab armies, the situation was several times more advantageous, because never did the individual Arab soldier surpass the Israeli fighter in battle capability. As the level of a unit rose, so did the superiority of the IDF increase, and its status, in direct proportion to the most forward organizational level that the IDF formed immediately upon its founding. Advanced organization is not characterized merely by the degree of savings and equipment and in manpower as is required of it, but rather mainly in its ability to provide advanced military response, to develop quality of command, technical skill, etc. When the IDF became a topic of admiration among connoisseurs ["mayvins"] in the world, it was not the quantities of equipment it owned, and not the type of the systems of battle gear which brought this about. The marvel stemmed from the originality which was evident in the IDF in the areas of organization, planning and theory.

Resting On Laurels

However, already during the decade of the sixties, points of weakness began to appear in the organization of the IDF. Visits paid to friendly armies revealed that the tendency to rest on its laurels had begun to strike root in the IDF also. Military history teaches that this tendency is stronger particularly among armies which have chalked up in their favor impressive accomplishments. The most notable examples are of the Prussian army, which was undefeated from the days of Friedrich the Great and was defeated handily by Napoleon at Jena (1806) and that of the French army, which was considered the best in the world until it was vanquished with shocking ease by the Germans during the Second World War.

If Mr Begin had really conducted a learning tour among the modern armies of the world, he would have discovered that one of the problems engaging them most during this period is how to avoid any evidence of resting on one's laurels from an organizational standpoint. It may be said that since the end of the Second World War the recognition of the need to maintain repeated and ongoing inspections of the entire organizational system has become one of the characteristics of modern military theory. However, when the former defense minister, Mr Ezer Weizman, put forth the need to reorganize the ground forces of the IDF, he noted as well that since the establishment of the IDF there had been practically no substantive changes made in it. This was also the determination of Maj Gen Tal, who had been requested by Mr Weizman to investigate whether there was a need for a reorganization of the IDF.

If these determinations are correct, then since the founding of the IDF in its present structure, during the early years of the fifties, there have been no far-reaching organizational changes in it; and if indeed that is the situation, then there is room for ample worry. The meaning of this is that the IDF today is a very antiquated army. We have heard from the deputy minister of defense, who himself is a veteran officer of the IDF, that on the way to organizational reform there are strumbling blocks of prestige and power struggles among the top ranks of the IDF. For the sake of truth, an antiquated structure and prestige and power struggles are intertwined always. This is a lesson which is not based upon the experience of the IDF, but rather on the experience of many armies in the course of history.
